In fact, Jinda was caught in January this year by the police and interrogated for several hours and from the interrogation report he emerges as a young man who likes new cars and girls, who eats in expensive restaurants and who commits crimes merely to fulfill tastes that are unusual for someone regarded as India's most dreaded killer.

Jinda or Harjinder Singh, is described in police records as being of "wheatish complexion, long face, medium build, height 5 ft 7 inches, black mole on the right side of the neck, two healed wounds on right leg". He was born on April 4, 1962 in Gadli village near Jandiala, a small town in Amritsar district which has become notorious for the number of terrorist incidents committed in it. He went to school in Jandiala and then to the Khalsa College, Amritsar, but never managed to get any kind of degree. While at college, a school friend called Bakhshish Singh, who had given up his studies to become a smuggler, introduced him to a fellow smuggler called Upkar Singh Sandhu, brother of Harmindar Singh Sandhu who had already gained infamy as one of the late Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale's main spokesmen.

Jinda himself appears to have shown little interest in the wave of political and religious fundamentalism emanating from the Golden Temple and claimed during his interrogation that he only went there once when he was sent for by Bhindranwale who wanted to settle a dispute between rival gangs of smugglers. In his free time Jinda concentrated on committing daring bank robberies in places as distant from the Golden Temple as Delhi's genteel Connaught Place. In 1984, just before Operation Bluestar, he went off to Singapore and managed to smuggle in VCR's, TV's and other electronic equipment which he then sold in Hall Bazar in Amritsar.

At the time of Operation Bluestar he was at home in Gadli but fled shortly afterwards fearing that he would be picked up by the army. In June, he made his way to Pakistan across the Rajasthan border with the help of a cousin in Ganganagar. He claims to have met several Pakistani officials who took them to safehouses where other Sikhs were staying, many of them former residents of the Golden Temple. He met Atinder Pal Singh, a suspect in the Indira Gandhi murder case, but did not admit to having been given any training.

HARISH SHAH

Jinda: elusive killer

According to him, after about six months he asked Atinder Pal Singh if he could return to India. He also asserts that he was not given any arms when he was sent back. He arrived in Amritsar in February 1985 but moved soon to Delhi where he stayed in Anand Parbat with a friend called Daljit Singh. To earn money, they started on a career of bank robbery which began with a bank in Anand Parbat. He admitted that they looted Rs 44,994 and said that the money was taken away by Mathura Singh, another wanted terrorist, who was also involved in the bank robbery.

Jinda then moved to a house in Tagore Gardens and supported himself by looting more banks. He bought himself a red Maruti car from Delhi Motors in Lajpat Nagar and somewhere along the way managed to pick up a couple of girls called Renu and Pammi. He and a friend and the girls often dined at restaurants in the Siddharth Hotel and at the Nirula's cafe in Chanakyapuri. They would also go for walks, according to him, in Buddha Jayanti Gardens and see films at the Rachna cinema. Whenever they were short of money they would indulge in more armed robberies. Jinda admitted to having gone to Ahmedabad in January this year where he also robbed a bank.

It was after this robbery that he was caught. They had returned to Delhi and sold the red Maruti to buy a white one and had arranged to meet near the Treat restaurant in Connaught place to share out the takings from the Ahmedabad robbery when a police party raided the shop where they were meeting. Barely two months after his arrest, while he was being taken back from a court in Ahmedabad on April 3, he casually slipped away from the constables escorting him, and escaped.

Jinda is believed to have been involved in the killing of Lalit Maken and his wife and Arjun Dass but his interrogators appear not to have succeeded in getting him to confess to these. In fact, one of the most extraordinary aspects of the confession is the fact that Jinda admits to no acts of terrorism whatsoever. The police, however, are convinced that he is the man they would desperately like to get their handcuffs on—this time for good.

FILMS

A New Dimension

IT IS now the hour of the video quickie. While movie moghuls bemoan the bygone age of the blockbusters and queue up at Doordarshan's door with scripts and pilots to feed the insatiable small screen industry, businessmen are poised to flood the market with local feature films made exclusively for video.

Until recently, only a few companies like Surya Bharti and stray individuals were making video feature films for the Indian market. The scale was small, the marketing limited. But last month, non-resident Indian magazine magnate, Nari Hira (Stardust, Society and Savvy) began his blitzkrieg of the video world with Siyani launched by his company Hiba Video, and in Madras, S. Charuhasan, noted Lawyer, actor and film producer and elder brother of film star Kamalhasan, inaugurated Goodwill as the second video film company in the country.

The race to make tightly budgeted films for video libraries (Bombay has nearly 1,500 and Madras 2,500), cable television in apartment houses, hotel chains and the airlines is on in earnest. Hiba Video has already completed five films, and even movie moghuls like B.R. Chopra, the Sippys and the Sagars have established their own video companies, though they are still on standby, with one eye on television and the other on the big screen.

But the pot of gold at the end of the video rainbow will be the proposed move to legitimise video parlours throughout the country (in Punjab, the state Government has already licensed video parlours). Once that is achieved, video theatres will not be far behind. Says Hira, conscious that he is on the threshold of a brave new video world: "The Indian market could easily absorb 3,000 to 5,000 cassettes for each film."

While Hiba is making Hindi films for north Indian and non-resident Indian homes, Goodwill is planning to make Tamil films solely for the domestic market. Working out of a video factory situated in Marve on the outskirts of Bombay, Hira's films contain the melodrama and hyped up emotion of the Bombay feature film but none of the big stars, big budgets, or big locations—thus reducing drastically the risk factors. "I can shoot a film for Rs 7 lakh or 8 lakh and easily recover the money from television or video," said Anil Tejani, director of two of Hiba's films.

At present Hiba takes a month to make a film; Hira's target is to release a film every 20 days: "It is just like bringing out a magazine. We have just made one film, we are in the process of filming another and we are already planning a third." Copying the old Hollywood studio contract system, Hira has a kind of repertory of stars and directors. While the first two films have fairly well-known stars (Persis Khambatta, Marc Zuber, Vijayendra Ghatge and Kanwaljeet), Hira has cleverly introduced a pair of new-comers, Aditya Pancholi and Nita Puri, on contract for Rs 5,000 a film. Explains Hira: "By the time the third film is out, these two whom I am grooming will have become known faces and I will not need any more stars. After a few films, I will introduce another pair."

Charuhasan too has rationalised his entry into video film-making on similar grounds. He is convinced that regular feature films are not tailored for home viewing because of their length. "People just do not have the time to lock themselves up in a room and watch 14 or 15 reels of a full-length film. And they tend to get irritated by the song and dance sequences and prolonged fighting scenes." In response, the grey haired, bearded entrepreneur plans to make "tight Tamil films of 90 minutes each and sell them in video cassettes."

Charuhasan feels that Tamil Nadu can absorb about 25 films annually. The production cost of each film is estimated at Rs 5 lakh and the veteran film director R.C. Shakti has begun working on Goodwill's first film Vai Puttu starring S.V. Shekar and Saritha. "So far we have signed up directors for six films that we are planning to make, and heroes and heroines for a couple of movies. Making serious video films is an opportunity for talented film makers and actors who feel that they want to do something creative apart from catering to the masses and making money," says Charuhasan.

Charuhasan feels that there are enough Tamil-speaking video viewers to justify the creation of a business to cater exclusively to them. Customs authorities in Madras say they have cleared about seven lakh VCP's and VCR's to date and, even at a conservative estimate, there are over a million potential customers in the state. Video libraries in the state have an estimated turnover of Rs 100 crore a year. "Making Tamil and other films exclusively for video is therefore a very viable line of business," observed S. Kumarakrishnan, a marketing and advertising professional who has joined Goodwill. Goodwill is also planning to have brief advertising spots in the film, adding to the profits.

Goodwill is laying down its own elaborate network to reach Tamilians in non-Tamil areas in the country. Using a scientifically worked out strategy, Goodwill plans to sell a pack of three duplicate cassettes at Rs 300 each to video libraries. This cost structure is to ensure that video libraries can keep pace with the demand, and also to discourage video pirates who might find it financially unrewarding to make pirated copies.

Hira too has formulated a multi-pronged approach to deal with the video pirate. In addition to assuring production of a film every 20 days, Hira has set up an anti-video piracy cell which will be headed by a former inspector general of police and manned by three retired assistant commissioners, a former deputy commissioner and 20 private detectives. Charuhasan and Hira are, obviously, hoping to trigger off another phase of the video boom.

THE ARTS

CORPORATE PATRONAGE

Culture Consciousness

RUDI von Leyden, modern Indian art's first corporate patron, would survey the art scene in the country today with a sense of pioneering pride. When von Leyden came to India in the 1940s as boss of Unilever, he had discovered that culture and big business just did not mix. Undaunted, he promoted the first ever cohesive group of Indian painters, the Bombay Progressives—M.F. Husain, Francis Newton Souza and the late S.H. Arya, who, incidentally, was von Leyden's former chauffeur. After his departure, it was only his friends, Dr Homi Bhabha and brother Jehangir, who kept the momentum going.

But today, after 40 years of gestation, the seeds planted by von Leyden have begun to sprout in frantic fruitfulness, metamorphosing the Indian culture scene like nothing else. Indian big business is today pouring money into every conceivable kind of cultural activity, from the fine arts, music and dance to book publishing, cinema and handicrafts. "Corporate patronage of culture has really taken off in this decade and today it is impossible to miss the corporate association from any major cultural event in the country," says Shyamanand Jalan, the Calcutta solicitor better known for his dance and drama group, Padatik.

Today, even the most obscure of cultural troupes can rope in a sponsor, chiefly the top three tobacco companies, which collectively spend about Rs 1.15 crore annually on the arts. "Big business has suddenly become so culture conscious that at times it seems they are literally throwing away money on culture," says Dr Sunil Kothari, professor of dance at the Rabindra Bharati University. Examples:

► An exhibition of four contemporary artists—Ganesh Pyne, Bikash Bhattacharya, Somnath Hore and Jogen Chowdhury—at the Birla Academy in Calcutta was sponsored by Duncan Tea.

► Every episode of "Satyajit Ray presents" being broadcast by Doordarshan also sports the Duncan logo.

► In Hyderabad last April, the Indo-Pakistani Musharia featuring Majrooh Sultanpuri, Ali Sardar Jafri, Pakistan's Qateel Shifai and Himayat Al Shiyar, was courtesy Vazir Sultan Tobacco.

► The recently-instituted annual Shiromani Puruskar for excellence in the arts has been established by Asian Paints.

► ITC, the makers of Wills Filters, is sponsoring a feature film starring Victor Banerjee and Mallika Sarabhai called Kehkashaan, to be released next year.

In Calcutta, Asian Paints is reviving the famous Banga Sanskriti Sammelan—an annual cultural extravaganza that had died out decades ago—under the name of Banga Sanskriti Utsav. The Shri Ram Group has its Bharatiya Kala Kendra and the Centre for Art and Culture in New Delhi. The Lalabhais have the Lalabhai Dalpatbhai Institute of Indology in Ahmedabad for students of Indian Antiquity. The Kanoria group has set up the Kanoria Centre for schooling budding artists, and industrial baron R.P.Goenka is setting up a performing arts centre in Calcutta.

Other companies are less blatant about announcing their involvement. Few people, for instance, know that the Welcomgroup hotel chain is one of the largest buyers of contemporary Indian paintings and has a collection worth nearly Rs 1 crore, including the giant mural at Delhi's Maurya Sheraton by Krishen Khanna. The fabulous Tata Art collection built up by Jehangir Bhabha now rivals government-funded galleries. Equally unpublicised is the growing practice of hiring classical dancers and musicians at business conferences. Top classical dancers like Raja and Radha Reddy Kannan Krishnamurti and Sonal Mansingh regularly feature on the corporate circuit, charging Rs 10,000 to Rs 15,000 for a performance.

IN TERMS of returns, the pay-off for corporate patrons, though often intangible, is diverse and substantial. "We can't quantify the impact of our patronage of the arts but it gives us an extra edge in marketing, in reaching our consumers better," explains J.'Nari' Narayan, ITC's tobacco division chief. Admits Duncan Pick's Pradip Kakkar: "We are committing large sums of money on art and culture ultimately for commercial ends and not just for the love of it." And with increasing sponsorship, companies are spending unheard of amounts to get the best in the field. "When we wanted to use TV for promoting our teas we needed something impressive. We got Satyajit Ray and money was not a factor," explains Kakkar. A few years ago, TISCO's Modi hijacked Husain to Germany for the Hanover fair to paint the mystic panels for the company's exhibit. Now Nari Narayan has now roped in Husain for the company's "Raga Extravaganza" to be held all over the country to depict 20 "ragamalas" (paintings depicting different ragas) which will be exhibited at the performances.

Culture also spells class. For the cigarette company NTC, cultural association has overhauled its corporate image. "In the beginning we were known as the number ten company," recalls NTC marketing head, Rana Sengupta, "but in the last five years we have built up an association with the arts and our corporate image has soared—today we are recognised as the Regent Company."

TISCO Chairman Rusi Modi, a leading patron of the arts, offers a more hard-headed reason for supporting the fine arts: "Paintings have become an investment these days. I have just Rs 30,000 in bank savings and all I have is my art collection," he says.

The most salubrious effect of corporate patronage is the self-confidence it has instilled in the practitioners of Indian culture. "For a long time, the West was the best, it was the touchstone of cultural accomplishment," explains Dr Kothari, "but today our culture has fortunately acquired value in our own country and we have begun to experiment and evolve."

This is certainly true of dance, where veteran dancers like Mrinalini Sarabhai of Darpana, set up by the Sarabhai textile group, and Kumudini Lakhia of Kadamb, a dance school promoted by the textile tycoon Harshvardan Mangaldas of Ahmedabad, are today experimenting to break out of what Madras-based danseuse Chandralekha calls "the mummification of Indian Art". And catalytic in these changes has been the National Centre for Performing Arts (NCPA), which is being developed by the Soli Dorabjee Tata Trust since the late 1960s with a total proposed expenditure of Rs 10 crore.

Books on art and culture are also increasingly coming under the domain of corporate support. The Tata group's MARG, which for the past 25 years was the only private sector art books publisher, will now face competition from Vazir Sultan's art books series. And Aveek Sarkar, managing editor of the Ananda Bazar group of publications and one of Calcutta's largest art collectors, plans to bring out books on paintings.

Art books publishing has thrown up one of the most striking successes of corporate patronage: Navin Kishore's Seagull Books. ITC set the Seagull empire sailing three years ago by providing seed capital of Rs 5 lakh. Says Kishore: "Art books are slow selling items and we could not have got going without ITC's support."

But tight as the culture-big business nexus has become, many top executives and industrialists believe it can only get closer. Explains TISCO's Modi: "I enjoy my work, I work hard but I also feel that is not the end of life—there are things to be enjoyed like art, like living well." Adds ITC's Narayan: "Our spending on the arts is not simply motivated to get business returns. Art bridges a gap." Culture will obviously have its corporate patrons as long as Indian business keeps growing and industry moghuls realise there is more on earth than dreamt of in their philosophy.

◆ The men were dhoti-clad and foul-mouthed, the women overpainted and fat. They gyrated to loud, cacophonic music, spouted double meaning dialogue and ended up in a rib-cracking clinch that sent cheap thrills down the front rows. The scene remained much the same through his films and Dada Kondke made it to the Guinness Book of World Records with a string of silver-jubilees. Until the titillations got a bit too much and the Government decided that enough was enough. When his latest, Andheri Raat Mein Diya Tere Haath Mein (pun intended), was banned last fortnight, it came as no surprise. Except to the actor-director himself, who appealed in court against the ban and wailed innocently: "When I speak, the dialogue automatically acquires a double meaning. Even if I do namaste people find a hidden meaning in it."

◆ The biceps that once rippled like ropes of steel are now buried under folds of fat, the mighty chest heaves with the weight of years and burgeoning pounds, and the brawny body has gone the way of all flesh. But when Balbir Singh, 13 times national weight-lifting champ, bagged the Pierre de Coubert International Trophy for Fair Play last fortnight, the glow of idealism in his honest eyes was still the same. Today, at 51, Singh remains the same man of principle who gave up his career of 32 years in 1972 because a rival feared that he didn't stand a chance against the colossus. Said the gentle giant, who is now a joint manager with FCI in Delhi: "Naturally one would feel thrilled. And I'm no exception. I am happy that with this award, I've been able to do a bit of humble service to my nation."

Balbir Singh: fair play

de Paul: happy hunting

◆ Judith de Paul has a secretary called Miss Relic. But it is Miss de Paul herself who belongs to another era. She wears her make-up two inches thick, produces minor epics like Mountbatten—The Last Viceroy, carries herself with all the hauteur of a Liz Taylor and sincerely believes that de Paul is no less (if not greater) than de Mille. The producer was in Delhi last fortnight, braving the August humidity and—when not posing with roses in five-star foyers—finalising the cast and crew for her next project, Queenie, the life story of the famous India-born Hollywood actress, Merle Oberon. When last heard, the lady was torn between Shyam Benegal and Satyajit Ray and wanted "some of your terrific Indian actors" though she didn't know their names. All that she seemed sure about was that India was a terrific locale. "I don't want to come back for just two but many more movies. I'm very happy here. India has been very kind to me."

He brought to life the poignant love legends of Punjab and the human side of Sikh history. His cottage in Andretta in the Kangra Valley still bears the motto that he lived all his life: "Grow More Good." What has been the Government's most significant initiative? You decide.

Was it the anti-defection bill? Or, say, the Assam accord? What about the rationalisation of taxes, the eradication of rural poverty, the raids on economic offenders, improving relations with neighbouring countries, and the Mizoram and Punjab accords?

This, the last Opinions Today poll, is your chance to decide.

Your task : to rank the Government's major initiatives in terms of their impact on the country as a whole.

Thus, when you finish, each initiative will carry a number from 1 to 8, besides it. Since this is a ranking, no two initiatives can have the same number.

Explain your first choice.

If 'X' is your number one choice, then, in not more than 50 words, you have to tell us why.

If your entry ties in with the national average (evaluated by computer), you'll also become a contender for the awards associated with Opinions Today.

With this poll, the Opinions Today series comes to an end.

Over its three month tenure, we've received a flood of entries. Indicators of the pulse of a changing India – as seen by INDIA TODAY's readers. And indicators too, of the fact that our readers can and will 'speak out' on the issues confronting them.

CALCULATING LOBBYISTS

Your cover story ("The Hidden Persuaders", September 15) was bold, frank and absorbing. It is evident that due to lobbying by top industrial houses, goods of inferior quality are purchased over better ones. The various irregularities and corruptions in the deals by lobbyists will be a great loss to the country, especially in the procurement of defence equipment.

Jamshedpur BHUPEN BOSE

■ The atmosphere in the corridors of power is becoming more and more conducive for the calculating lobbyists. They have the capacity to alter the most crucial government decisions by bribing the powers-that-be. The art of lobbying acts as a catalyst in securing lucrative government contracts and from the look of things the lobbyists are certainly here to stay.

Bangalore K. CHIDANAND KUMAR

■ Your article is in bad taste as it creates an impression that all retired officers who are working as consultants have no calibre. All the officers mentioned are generally known to be competent. It is wrong to suggest that substandard equipment is being inducted into the Indian Army on the representation of retired officers empolyed by armaments firms. The writers should have given concrete examples of money changing hands.

New Delhi UMA PANT

■ It is most unfortunate that you have cast aspersions on the conduct of retired senior service officers. Motives are being attributed if they try to earn an honest living by doing the only reasonable thing they can—offer their expertise and experience in the field of defence equipment to the dealers who require it. To be a consultant is not a crime.

New Delhi Lt-Col.V.S. MATHUR

PAINFUL KILLING

The terrorists who shot General Vaidya ("The Killing of a General", August 31) have not only killed the general but also the morale of all duty-conscious citizens. Which policeman would like to question a criminal knowing that the system for which he is willing to lay down his life will not be able to protect him in his hour of need?

New Delhi AMRIT KUMAR

■ The dawn of our 40th Independence Day was marred by the tragic memory of Vaidya's killing. It requires no intelligence to understand that the terrorists have been proving much more intelligent than the Intelligence!

Ahmedabad NILAY V. ANJARIA

TOO MANY COOKS

Your opportune comment ("Acting First Thinking Later", September 15) has done well to elucidate the haste with which our prime minister and his advisors deal with the issues of momentous importance. Mr Gandhi's Government is replete with advisors, who in their urge to earn his goodwill, are vying to feed the prime minister with thoughtless advice.

Ahmedabad M.V.RAVINDRAN

Carbon monoxide. Nicotine. Nitric oxide. Nitrogen dioxide. Hydrogen cyanide. Arsenic. Tar. Just a few of the many toxins in cigarette smoke. They cause high blood pressure, hardening of arteries, heart attacks. And cancer.

Tar penetrates into your delicate air passages and lungs, eventually causing cancer. Some of the danger symptoms: persistent cough, blood-specked sputum, chest pains. That's the bad news.

Now the good news. Cancer is curable if detected early. That's why you must get checked for cancer once a year.

Visit any detection centre of the Indian Cancer Society. Or consult your own physician.

And, if you're a heavy smoker, try to give up — or at least cut down.

NOW, CANCER INSURANCE!

The Indian Cancer Society offers India's only insurance policy against all expenses of cancer diagnosis and treatment. For just a small sum, both you and your spouse get coverage upto Rs. 40,000. Call us for more details.

SATHE'S SALVO

I am glad you have put forward a most glaring and obvious truth ("The Challenge of Change", August 31). If Vasant Sathe is taken to task for being morally upright and outspoken, a characteristic conspicuous by its absence in Indian politicians, it would be a shame for this country and its new, "forward-looking" leadership.

SANJAY MADGAVKAR
Calcutta

■ You have showered bountiful praise on Vasant Sathe for his so-called forceful articles on the functioning of the public sector. But why did it take so long for it to dawn upon Mr Sathe that all is not too well with the public sector? He is obviously shrewd enough to gauge his master's mood and wrest the initiative.

RESERVATION ROW

The move of the Andhra Pradesh chief minister to raise reservation for the backward classes from 27 per cent to 44 per cent ("Reservation Ruckus", August 31) represents yet another illogical and whimsical decision by him, and he is becoming increasingly famous for such decisions. Reservation for backward classes is no doubt, a noble gesture. But, in the hands of our politicians, it has become a vote-catching gimmick.

K.A ANANTHARAM
Bombay

■ All my sympathies are with the "forward" communities of Andhra Pradesh, who have so rudely been shaken by the new reservation policy of the NTR Government. Let us hope Andhra Pradesh does not become another Bihar or Gujarat over this issue.

UNHOLY FATHER

The Christian church administration in India would only lose credibility if it tolerates malpractices like those of Father Puthenpurakal ("The Nun Runner", August 31) within the church. The 'priest' should have been expelled from his office forever in the early 70s, as he was found involved in the 'export business' of Keralite girls to western Europe. I doubt whether he would have been in a position to repeat the same mischief in 1986, without the indirect consent of the authorities.

DR GEORGE THODUKA
Bangalore

■ Your article reveals a definite lack of knowledge of the Christian and human values existing in convents. You say that girls are treated "like domestic servants", but who, among us, can survive without doing a certain number of domestic chores? Work becomes an object of ridicule when we dislike it. Also, by saying that "the market rate in Europe for a Malayalee nun is $2,000 per person", do you mean that Malayalee nuns are a product for sale and not a dedicated lot serving humanity?

LISSY KURIAN

NO, MINISTER

The manhandling of the bank manager by A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury should be condemned strongly ("Tough Tactics", September 15). Instances of our ministers throwing their weight around are nothing new in this country. However, a minister stooping to physically assault a public official is something which cannot be condoned.

P.G. MENON
Bombay

■ Apropos your report we have to point out that it is not Union Bank alone but all the bank branches as a whole which have consistently achieved or overshot the targets in respect of IRDP and other government programmes. Further, the credit deposit ratio in Malda district is around 56 per cent and not 80 per cent as quoted. Also, we regret that you have failed to pronounce on the misdemeanour of Ghani Khan Chowdhury at Sujapur.

J.P. MISHRA
Malda

GORKHA GROUSE

Your report ("Gorkhas: A New Belligerence", August 15) was well-balanced. Jyoti Basu has failed to recognise the Gorkha movement in Darjeeling as a political one. His charges against the GNLF as anti-national and secessionist cannot be justified under the framework of the Constitution of India. Guns are no solution to every problem—they make too much noise.

DINESH GURUNG
Gangtok

HARSH CRACKDOWN

Your article ("Bihar: Church vs the RSS", August 31) is quite objective. The harsh crack down by government officials on Christian leaders in Ranchi is poor testimony for a secular, democratic country like India. The Christian leaders were only cautioning their own flock, for what they thought was an onslaught on their religion. They were not inciting violence or hatred.

CHHOTE BHAI
Kanpur

■ I was surprised to come across such a partial and one-sided write-up. While your correspondent had taken all the pains to clarify the stand of the Christians vis-a-vis publishing the views of the Archbishop of Ranchi, he did not find it necessary to check up details of the growing religious tensions with any of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) functionaries in the area. Perhaps he would have received actual proof of the anti-national activities of the so-called service-minded "Fathers".

SHARE PRICES

In your article on the markets ("Bearish Phase", August 15), your correspondents say that the prices of shares of several companies have lost even more heavily than of Reliance over the fortnight. Among them were SPIC, Vulcan Laval, Ingersoll-Rand, and Hind & Dorr Oliver, which are now quoting ex-bonus. The post bonus price of Hind & Dorr Oliver and Ingersoll Rand as on July 23, 1986, were even much higher than the price as on July 1, 1986. Hence the chart which was showing the percentage decline of share prices is not at all correct for the first four scrips.

POLL 3 RESULTS—SPORTS

A Unanimous Choice

IN this, the third in the series of opinion polls, INDIA TODAY invited its readers to nominate the sportsman or sportswoman who, in their opinion, has contributed the most to Indian sport from a list of eight contenders. Slightly over 20,000 readers responded to the poll. For an independent assessment of the results, INDIA TODAY commissioned Dr V.L. Mote, a founder professor of the Indian Institute of Management, Ahmedabad. Professor Mote also holds a doctorate in statistical methods from the State University of North Carolina in the US. His analysis.

IN making the transition from politics to sports, it would be logical to assume that the pattern of responses would be radically different from the earlier polls on political subjects, specially with cricket and Asiad fever in the air. But the response in the poll seems to indicate that India's sporting heroes are measured on the same scale as its political luminaries. In both worlds, it is only the fittest who survive and the popularity or otherwise of any individual sport is no indication of reader's preference when measured on the overall sporting scale.

The results revealed that cricketing superstar Sunil

Gavaskar, perhaps not surprisingly considering his long and invaluable contribution to Indian cricket, tops the poll followed closely by current cricket captain Kapil Dev. But the fact that the most highly rated and most poorly rated sporting personalities are cricketers indicates that the excessive popularity of the sport does not detract from the reader's assessments of the contribution of sports personalities from other disciplines. An analysis of their views is presented in Figure 1, Table 1 and Table 2

An analyis of the percentage of total respondents who ranked each candidate at the various positions together with the average scores are reported in Table 2 while Table 1 shows the ranking pattern by sex and age. In this table we also report a ratio, which in statistical terms is known as "coefficient of concordance". Stated briefly, this ratio is so computed that it takes a value between zero and one: zero when there is no agreement amongst the respondents and one when there is perfect agreement.

Four salient features emerge from the data. These are:

► In Bombay and Calcutta, P.T. Usha ranks number 5 while on the national level she ranks third. In Delhi and Madras she ranks fourth. Much of her backing it seems, comes from non-metro areas.

► Women give P.T. Usha a slightly higher score than what she obtained from men as well as on the national average. However both women and men rank her an overall third.

► As far as the cricketers are concerned, Sunil Gavaskar seems to have an edge over his nearest competitor Kapil Dev as far as scores from women participants are concerned.

A total of 42 readers sent in entries that corresponded with the final national score. To select the three winners, a panel of four judges assessed the reasons they had given for ranking Sunil Gavaskar first. The judges selected the winners on the basis of their assessment of the contribution made by Sunil Gavaskar to Indian cricket and Indian sport as a whole.

According to statistical tests, the values of the ratios show that there was an agreement amongst the respondents on the rankings they have given.

It was perhaps somewhat inevitable that Sunil Manohar Gavaskar would be the unanimous choice among the respondents for the number one ranking, even though fellow cricketer Kapil Dev came in a fairly close second on the basis of his exceptional ability as an all rounder and as the current captain of the Indian side. For the last 15 years, Gavaskar has been the indestructable pillar on which the fortunes of the most popular spectator sport in the country has rested. In that period, he has broken virtually every batting record there is and, at an age (37) when most sportsmen are taking out retirement plans, he is still going strong. The recent uproar over his exclusion from the Indian team for the one day internationals against Australia which led to his hasty re-inclusion, offers adequate proof of the legendary, colossus-like domination he continues to exert on international cricket.

The computerised analysis of the results shows that a wide gap exists between the first two choices, Gavaskar and Kapil, and the rest of the candidates, though the fact that the last-ranked, Ravi Shastri, also happens to be a cricketer would indicate that the popularity of the sport in India has not been taken into account by the respondents in their individual assessments. Most of the respondents, in their reasons for selecting a particular candidate, laid considerable emphasis on the contribution made by the candidates towards placing India on the international sporting map and also what they have given back to the sport. Thus, tennis star Vijay Amritraj scored heavily in being placed fourth for his sportsmanship, his contribution to the Indian image in the international arena and his efforts to encourage and help younger tennis players improve their performances.

Similarly, cueists Michael Ferreira and Geet Sethi and badminton star Prakash Padukone have been ranked highly by some readers for their success in elevating a sport which has limited following in the country, to international levels. All three have won world titles in the course of their careers. However, the most significant finding in this poll is the exceptionally—and deservedly—high ranking given to P.T.Usha who figured third in the overall rankings. Indian athletes, specially women athletes, have traditionally been ignored when such comparisons are made and it is a tribute to Usha's phenomenal talents and her outstanding performances in the international and Asian athletic arena that she has been given a consistently high ranking by the respondents.

Samples of the respondents' comments on the seven candidates other than Sunil Gavaskar gives an indication of the reasons why they rate some prominent sportsmen ahead of others in terms of their individual contributions to Indian sport.

KAPIL DEV

His explosive performance on the playing field supported by good fortune has put India on the world cricketing map.
Ranchi — Kedar Nath Laldas

● Kapil's status as one of the top all-rounders in the game puts him in the number one spot.
New Delhi — Piyush Agarwal

● It was under his leadership that India proved a champion side in instant cricket and now with a convincing series win in England.
Faizabad — Kumar Heramb

P.T. USHA

Her training has been largely indigenous. She consistently continues to further improve on her performance.
C/O 56 APO — Ranjit Virk

● Usha has consistently proved that besides having players of distinction in specific games, India can also produce world class athletes.
Lucknow — Diwakar Bhatt

● Usha has broken a lot of barriers and inspired a new generation.

VIJAY AMRITRAJ

Vijay has distinguished India through his exemplary sportsmanship and is grooming youngsters for the future. He has given back his gains to the game and the country.
Thane — Venkatesh Manthri

Calcutta — Ananth Ramachandran

GEET SETHI

By beating stalwarts like Michael Ferreira at a young age he has brought to the fore the hitherto little known game of billiards.
New Delhi — Vinesh Tanwar

PRAKASH PADUKONE

He is the epitome of courage and determination.

SPORTS

The Burden of Politics

FOUR years ago, at this time, the people who matter today—Rajiv Gandhi and his men—had only one concern uppermost in their minds: the holding of the ninth Asian Games at Delhi. Even as doubts were raised about the expenses involved—the Government continues to claim that a modest amount of Rs 70-odd crore was spent though the real figure was in excess of Rs 1,000 crore—Rajiv Gandhi's whiz kids had laboured away unfazed to stage a spectacular that did the nation proud. The protagonists for the games argued, and quite correctly, that not only would the Asiad leave a legacy of stadia of international standards in Delhi but would spread consciousness about sports in the country and end the country's famine in international laurels in all other Olympic sport apart from hockey. Now with the Seoul Asiad upon us, the time has come to ask: have the hopes been realised? Or is colour television the only lasting legacy of the Delhi Asiad?

AJIT NINAN

The answers, unfortunately, must be 'no' and 'yes'. Delhi's impressive infrastructure of stadia emboldened the Indian Olympic Committee to entertain dreams of bidding for the 1992 Olympics but has not been utilised for what it should have been: taking sports to the people. Thanks to the Delhi Asiad, India's sportspersons have been initiated into—and habitually use—the best of international equipment but the environment and sports consciousness necessary for laying the basic foundation is still missing. Government restrictions on officials clinging to positions of power in the various federations have resulted in a lot of heads rolling but Tweedledum has been replaced by Tweedledee and their whims still ruin the careers of many a talent. A plethora of agencies have been created to spot and train sportspersons but the Sports Authorities and the Olympic Committees are too busy sniping at each other to have time for anything else. The need of the hour is to 'catch them young', give them the best of facilities and incentives, train them to be the best in the world but talent spotters have yet to come up with anything.

The bane of Indian sport are the politicians who dominate the various federations, using them as an extension of their sphere of political influence and fighting their political battles through the organisations they head. And nothing has changed there. We thus have the unedifying spectacle of the Indian Olympic Committee President Vidya Charan Shukla, a political castaway, ramming through amendments extending the tenure of officials in direct defiance of the Government's directives and the Government responding by denying patronage to such officials for the trip to Seoul. Vis-a-vis Shukla that is not all that has happened. Union Minister for Human Resources Development, P.V. Narasimha Rao, who surely has his hands full with such a crucial charge, has replaced Shukla as the head of the Society for the National Institutes of Physical Education and Sports, which controls the affairs of the various sports institutes in the country. As the crowning insult, Shukla has been excluded from the official government delegation to Seoul.

Constitutionally, sports is a state subject—and Kerala has shown the way to unearth talent. But the Central Government controls the purse strings—and, most importantly, doles out foreign exchange—and is clearly not keen to loosen its control. The Ministry of Sports is now over four years old and "has promised to translate into action the newly adopted Resolution on National Sports Policy by giving high priority to the development of infrastructure and facilities for sports and games at grass-root levels" (so says the seventh plan document) but the words continue to sound hollow. The achievements of nations like East Germany may be difficult to duplicate but models are not lacking closer to home. China has schools for physical culture all over the country which train youngsters between the ages of 15 and 18. There is one school for each province and nine out of 10 China's international athletes come from these schools.

Or take the case of South Korea which will illustrate in the tenth Asiad that long-term planning is the only way to get the golds. Also hosts for the 1988 Olympics, South Korea started its preparations for the two events in 1982 itself, selecting a lakh children around 12 years of age from out of six million for further tests. After further screening, the figure was narrowed and still later pruned to 5,000. These 5,000 will form the core of the country's challenge in the Asiad and the Olympics and South Korea, which finished ahead of India at Delhi, is bound to run China and Japan close for the top spot this time.

Even today, the success of any Indian athlete—a P.T. Usha or a Prakash Padukone—is a matter of an individual's commitment to excellence with little or no help from the system. Again, it is pointless to talk about a nation with a population of over 700 million failing to get a single Olympic gold in an individual event when three out of four Indians have neither the time nor the inclination nor the facilities for sports. Those who do, are inspired primarily by examples—witness the revolution a Bjorn Borg has wrought in Sweden's tennis—and that's where we get back to the classic chicken and egg situation. India's sports planners have to get their act together fast or we will be entering the 21st century not only sans an Olympic champion but without mass participation in sports.

TRAM STOP

■ With Calcutta's Metro still streets away from completion, the city's commuters are at the mercy of other means of transport, like the twin-car tram service that rattles through various parts of the city—power permitting. The trams are operated by a driver with a conductor in each of the cars. A string leading through the cars attached to a bell in the driver's compartment signals the driver to start moving again.

Last fortnight, during rush hour at a tram terminus, one particular driver, seeing his cars crowded, hopped nimbly into his booth and set off with undignified haste. He rattled past the potholes for a good distance till the first stop where he waited, and waited, for the bell to ring. Determined to get to the bottom of things, he got down from his perch and peered into each cab till he realised that, in the rush, he had left his conductors behind. Ignoring the howls of protest, he announced his intention of retracing his tracks till he found the missing conductors. Rules, he stated, were rules. Fortunately, just when the passengers were contemplating the first tram hijack in history, the missing conductors arrived puffing and panting and the chaotic caravan set off for the next stop.

NAME GAME

■ At a time when communal and religious bonds are gradually garroting the unity of the country, the example of a Muslim youth, Alimuddin, from Ghaziabad in Uttar Pradesh, would stand out like a torch of hope—were it not for the sad fact that the batteries would have to be supplied by the bureaucracy. The youth, a student in a local government college, submitted an application to the college authorities requesting a change of name and religion. He also filed a similar application in the district court. His new name was given as Bharat and his religion as Bharatmata. The reasons he gave were uncomplicated enough—that he did not believe in any other religion except in the religion of humanity and the community of the country.

But such soul-stirring sentiments cut little ice—or red tape—as far as the bureaucracy was concerned. The court, going by the fact that 'Bharatmata' is not listed as a religion, has avoided giving a decision and the college has cleverly followed suit by awaiting the court's decision before taking action. Latest scores: Bureaucracy: 2; Patriotism: 0

GRAVE ISSUE

■ For residents of the Harijan Colony in Malappuram in Kerala, it was an extremely grave issue. An old man had died and his last wish was that he should be buried alongside the grave of his father. But this was easier expressed than executed. The site had changed ownership and therein lay the rub—it was now owned by the state Government. Under local law, Harijans were given a special cemetery plot in the colony itself. But the sons of the dead man dug in their heels and insisted that their father's last wish was sacrosanct and the entire colony promptly staged a satyagraha in support.

But it was a different kind of support that was the problem. Under local Harijan custom, once a dead body was lifted from its last place of repose, it could only be put down in the grave. The first day, the dead man's sons held up the body, then the relatives took over and so it went for three days—with the Harijans raising a stink while the local administration engaged in heated negotiations. The issue was finally settled when the administration agreed to let the old man's body be finally lowered to the ground he wanted. For the victors, it was a case of better late than never.

COP CAPER

■ The long arms of the law often end up clutching the wrong end of the lathi. The case of one Delhi constable illustrates the point. Intent on busting a local racketeer dealing in dollars and dope, he asked his superior for permission to approach the man as a customer and lay his hands on the evidence required to nab his target red-handed. Permission given, he slipped into civvies and set off.

The sting proceeded smoothly and the constable, his pockets loaded with evidence, emerged from the alley waiting for his back-up team to rush in and wrap up the case. The police posse duly obliged, but grabbed him instead and charged him for possession of narcotics and foreign exchange. As it transpired, a rival police officer had heard of the operation and sent his own team instead, hoping to earn some bonus points. They knew the location of the alley but not the description of the peddler. Our hero was emerging furtively from the alley, his pockets bulging with illegalities. Moreover, his back-up team was delayed because the bus they were in broke down. So he copped it instead.

Dressing Down

● Just about every senior minister in the Government, by virtue of his sartorial attire, would probably be bounced from Delhi's prestigious Gymkhana Club. The Gym has recently gone in for a tailor-made dash of the old Raj—through posters and private circulars reminiscent of puritanical Cromwellian edicts, the Gym has asked its members to dress up or ship out. Strict dress codes have been drawn up for the bars, dance floor and bridge rooms. No shorts or jogging suits. And tuck that shirt in please. The club's earnestness became evident last fortnight when some senior government officials, who have been members for more than a decade, loitered in for a round of beer dressed in crisp kurta-pyjamas. To their zipless bewilderment, they were told by the club bouncer that they could not enter. At the Gym safari suits are in. Kurta-pyjamas out. And some of the members, now hot under the collar, have decided to roll up their sleeves and needle the club's management on the issue because the new regulations would bar the entry of anybody—including the prime minister—sporting the national dress. A committee has now been appointed to iron out the differences. Looks as if some scissor work will be necessary.

Prime Mover

● Rajiv Gandhi has obviously been smitten by travelmania. He is emerging as the most peripatetic prime minister the country has ever had—except that his navigators seem to have a marked preference for foreign airports. Last fortnight when Rajiv returned from his nine-day trip to Harare, the former airline pilot had globe-hopped 180,000 km in a total of 12 trips. The prime minister and his staff have spent the equivalent of one day every week abroad, remaining out of the country for a total of 77 days out of 559, since March last year when Rajiv began his high-profile diplomacy with his first official visit to Moscow. He has since visited every major capital including Washington, Paris, Moscow, Tokyo, Amsterdam, Geneva, Mexico, London and Havana. During the total of 11 weeks spent abroad, he visited 25 countries. The cost of these frenetic forays is—and now hang on to your seat-belts—Rs 20 crore so far. Next stop is the land "Down Under", millions and millions of kangaroo hops away.

Vested Interest

● The trials and tribulations of being a minister on the terrorist hit-list must make politicians wish that they had never entered the profession. Many of them say that more annoying than even the death threats is the day-to-day drudgery of having to take careful precautions. Security guidelines prescribe, for example, that the ministers must regularly change the routes they take from office to home and back as well as make detours of as many as five km. Several VIP's, as a result, find themselves at sea almost every day in the capital, because their drivers lose their way on unfamiliar routes. They find it difficult to keep appointments or even to socialise with friends. But the real cropper is the bullet-proof vest that all these ministers are required to wear. The ones provided by the Government weigh a tonne—well 10 kg to be exact. The weight is not the only burden. Wearing the vests in this weather is like being in a sweater in the middle of summer. One minister confided that he unburdens himself of this gear any chance he gets. But security men have strict instructions to check on these VIP's to ensure that they are properly vested. If they are not they are politely asked to comply, which sometimes entails a trip home.

Suite Surrender

● Even in real life Amitabh Bachchan always wins. The super-MP has his favourite spots and one of them is the Taj Coromandel hotel where he likes to stay when he is in Madras. And Bachchan has a favourite suite on the fifth floor. But last fortnight he had competition. In Madras briefly during that period, Bachchan was told by an embarrassed management that the President of Male, then on a visit to Madras, also had his eye on the suite. In a gesture of diplomatic magnanimity, he agreed to stay in another room until his departure. After the president left, Bachchan asked to be shifted to the coveted suite. Again, there was an embarrassed silence—Jagdish Tytler, minister of state for civil aviation, had just booked the suite for himself. When a hotel official quietly informed Tytler of the dilemma, it was the minister's turn to make a diplomatic gesture. The suite, Tytler said decisively, should go to Bachchan, and he would simply move into another room. And there the matter ended, sans a single unnecessary dishum.

ALMOST two weeks after the September 5 hijacking of a Pan American Boeing at Karachi airport reached its grisly climax, the welter of confusion that has made it the most intriguing hijack in aviation history continues to cast a lengthening shadow over the tragedy. The contradictions in initial statements made by Pakistani officials handling the crisis; the obvious bungling by security forces that led to the death of 23 passengers and grievous injury to another 130; the glaring loopholes in the security set-up at Karachi airport that allowed the hijackers access to the parked aircraft; the predictable mechanical failure that provoked the massacre; the unconvincing stand taken by Pan Am officials regarding the flight crew's unprecedented action in abandoning the passengers and, above all, the actual motives and origins of the hijackers themselves.

Wounded passengers at Karachi and Bombay and the coffin carrying the body of one of the victims have all added high-octane fuel to an event that threatens to balloon into a major international controversy.

The fact that a majority of the passengers—and the 23 people who were killed in the bloodbath—were of Indian origin has added another hostile element to Indo-Pakistan relations, best symbolised by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's strong condemnation of Pakistan's "bungling" of the hijack in the middle of the Non-Aligned summit in Harare, where President Zia-ul-Haq was also present. Despite the unstinting praise for Karachi's handling of the crisis from US President Ronald Reagan and Pan Am officials—which would have been highly unlikely were American passengers among the dead—the Indian Government, international aviation experts, eye-witnesses and the passengers on board the ill-fated aircraft who survived the 16-hour nightmare are convinced that the bloody denouement was exacerbated by a series of unforgivable blunders on the part of authorities managing the crisis at Karachi airport.

Right from the moment the hijackers, dressed in the sky-blue uniforms of Pakistan's Airport Security Force (ASF) and driving a Suzuki van fitted with a siren, flashing lights and antennae on the roof raced up to Pan Am flight 73 at Karachi airport and commandeered the stationary aircraft, it was evident that local authorities had little control over the subsequent tragic sequence of events. What is more glaringly evident is that, contrary to Pakistan claims, the anti-hijack commando force was nowhere near the scene of action till long after the gruesome drama ended in a hailstorm of bullets and the hijackers had been hustled into custody.

Now that the cloud of confusion surrounding the hijack has cleared sufficiently, the actual sequence of events pieced together from passengers and crew members leaves no doubt that senior Pakistani officials blundered fatally in their handling of the crisis. The Pan Am flight landed at Karachi airport at 5.25 a.m (4.55 a.m. local time) from Bombay, where it had originated, for a one hour scheduled stop-over. On board were 394 passengers and nine infants apart from the 13 recently-hired Indian flight attendants and the American flight crew. There were 207 Indian citizens, 85 Pakistanis, 44 US citizens and 58 other passengers of European and other nationalities. Over 50 of the US and British passport holders were of Indian origin, returning after holidays in India.

A total of 109 passengers disembarked at Karachi and the first bus-load of passengers boarding at Karachi had barely reached the aircraft when two heavily-armed hijackers jumped out of the security van and rushed up the ramp leading to the left front door where Neerja Mishra, 23, a flight purser with six months experience, was waiting to welcome boarding passengers. Showing admirable presence of mind, Mishra rattled off the special code number over the intercom which alerts the cockpit in case of a hijack. By this time, a burst of gunfire outside the aircraft—which wounded two airline staff members working on a Kuwait Airline aircraft nearby—had already sounded the alarm. The two hijackers were joined by two others, one dressed in the traditional Pakistani salwar kameez and carrying a brief-case loaded with grenades. The time was 6.05 a.m.(Indian Standard Time), 40 minutes after Flight Pan Am 73 had landed.

"Most of us were asleep and at first we couldn't figure out what was happening," says Manoj Seth, 58, a businessman from Surat who was taking a package tour of Europe and the US along with his wife. Most passengers mistook the hijackers for Pakistan security personnel because of their uniform. The passengers were also unaware that the captain and his cockpit crew had already abandoned the aircraft through the Inertial Rail Escape Device, a metal cable attached to the roof of the cockpit which enables the crew to open the emergency hatch of the cockpit and slide down to the ground 36 feet below.

The passengers only realised it was a hijack when the leader, attired in Pakistani dress and speaking English, grabbed an air hostess by the hair and holding his gun to her head, ordered that the aircraft doors be closed, the window blinds pulled down and passengers from the first and clipper class move into the economy section and crouch down with their hands behind their heads.

That the hijackers were deadly serious was soon tragically evident. Rajesh Kumar Patel, 28, a naturalised American citizen and a prosperous motel owner from Huntingdon Beach, California, mistaking the hijackers for Pakistanis, rose up from his seat and shouted: "I am an American citizen." The hijackers pushed him into the vacated front section, shot him and threw his body out onto the tarmac. Patel's 82-year-old grandmother who was accompanying him to the US, was one of the 21 passengers who died in the bloody carnage 16 hours later.

Bodies of victims lined up at Karachi airport

Patel's death had a sobering effect on the rest of the passengers. By now, it was obvious that the hijackers were Arabs. The flight attendants were asked to collect all the passports and separate the American ones. The air hostess who was handed the passports managed to conceal the 44 US passports under a seat. At first, the leader of the hijackers was infuriated by the absence of American passports but the air hostess succeeded in convincing him that all the passengers on board were Indians or other nationalities. "We are not against you. Today is my birthday and we want the US Government to know that the Palestinians are against them," said the leader, whose false passport gave his name as Bomar Hussein, later identified as Mustafa. They then asked a stocky man reportedly an Britisher, to come to the front section. But as he was being led away, he started chanting: "Allah. Allah." The terrorist leader smiled and said: "Okay, you're not an American. You can sit down."

Two hours after the aircraft was commandeered, the passengers were allowed to relax and sit back in their seats. The next 16 hours were a long and agonising ordeal as negotiations with Pakistan authorities began. At first, the hijackers set a 7 p.m. deadline and demanded a relief crew to fly them to Larnaca, Cyprus. They also demanded the release of three of their comrades imprisoned in Cyprus. The deadline was later extended to 11 p.m. when the hijackers were informed that a relief crew was being flown in from Europe. Inside the aircraft, the initial fear had evaporated and the hijackers even joked with passengers, assuring them that they would not be harmed. Recalls Janaki Patel, one of the passengers: "Mustafa was extremely handsome and carried a machine-gun but he did not seem the type who would ever pull the trigger. He was playing with the boy and even allowed the boy to touch his gun." The hijackers even asked a flight attendant to announce on the public address system that they did not mean any harm since the passengers were all behaving well.

THEN began the series of blunders and misfortunes that triggered off the blood-bath. It took the Pakistani authorities over two hours to establish radio contact with the hijackers. At first, they tried communicating with a portable loudspeaker. When there was no response, they hunted around for someone who could speak Arabic. Finally, a Pan Am mechanic, Meherjee Kharas, who was already on board checking the cockpit radio and was trapped inside the aircraft when the hijackers took over, was asked to establish communication links with Karachi control tower. The initial negotiations were conducted by Pan Am Director for Pakistan, Hirat Daroga, but he was elbowed aside by the Governor of Sind, Jehandar Khan, who, along with other senior politicians present, took "supervisory" charge of the crisis. Shortly after 9 p.m., local time, negotiations with the authorities broke down inexplicably. Kharas, the radio mechanic, was shot in the cockpit by the hijackers and seriously wounded.

At 9.55, the Auxiliary Power Unit (APU) located in the tail of the Boeing (see illustration) supplying power to the aircraft suddenly switched itself off because the lubrication oil reached a dangerously low level and one of the two sensors automatically switched the APU off. The lights flickered and the battery-powered emergency lights came on and quickly started dimming as the battery power ran down. Shortly after, the Boeing was plunged into pitch darkness. The hijackers, in a panic and evidently fearing a raid, shouted to each other in Arabic and sprayed the aircraft with automatic fire and flung their grenades. Six grenades exploded and turned the inside of the aircraft into a charnel house. One of the first to die was Neerja Mishra, who was standing next to one of the hijackers and took the first burst from his Kalashnikov across her waist.

The killing spree lasted barely 30 to 60 seconds. It was later established that two of the hijackers had Kalashnikov automatic weapons and fired one clip each but, in that enclosed space, even that limited fire caused havoc. Finally, one of the flight attendants managed to open the door over the wing on the left side of the plane. But since she had put the door on manual rather than automatic, the chute did not open. Most passengers, in panic, risked the 14-foot drop to the tarmac, suffering major fractures and broken legs. Another attendant opened another door and the chute popped open, allowing the remaining passengers to slide down to safety.

The terrorist leader was apparently injured in the cross-fire between the hijackers but the other three, having run out of ammunition, joined the passengers running towards the terminal building. They were arrested by airport police after passengers pointed them out. Passengers are unanimous in their conviction that there was no warning given to the hijackers about the power failure—a fact that could have saved many lives—or that there were commandos anywhere near the aircraft when the lights in the plane went off, indicating that security forces were preparing to storm the aircraft.

The three captured hijackers were whisked off to a top-security military base in Karachi and were later identified as Abdullah Khalil, Nazir Hussain and Fahd. The leader, Mustafa, is in hospital, surrounded by armed guards. All four were travelling on false or forged Bahraini passports. Regardless of the nationality of the hijackers, however, or their motives, the manner in which the hijacking was handled has raised a number of serious questions that demand urgent answers.

IT is now quite clear that the hijackers could not have carried out what appears to be a well-planned and well-executed operation without local help. Pakistani authorities have arrested the tailor who stitched their uniforms but have made no mention of the man who actually drove the van onto the tarmac and escaped in the subsequent confusion. Investigations have established that the first of the terrorists arrived in Pakistan barely 18 days before the hijacking which meant that they would have had no time to acquire weapons, including grenades and Sten guns, the uniforms, fit the hired Suzuki van with the police-type additions on the roof, and most important, to familiarise themselves with airport security procedures, which they seemed to know intimately, without some local collaboration.

According to senior Pakistan security officials, it is probable that the hijackers arrived at the airport around midnight and parked in the unguarded cargo area. Investigators later found packets of potato chips and half-eaten sandwiches in the van which indicated that they had spent some hours inside the vehicle. They then raced up to the gate where the security guard was just about to close the unwieldy, wheeled gate after letting through an airport baggage vehicle. Rather than reopen the gate which was malfunctioning because of two broken wheels, the guard waved the hijackers through.

More vital, the security breach came just one week after a high-security alert had been declared at all airports in Pakistan following a warning from Washington that a Palestinian suicide squad had entered Pakistan. Brigadier Tariq Rafi, commander of the ASF, accepted blame for the breach: "I offer no excuse for the serious security lapse."

The second obvious blunder was in not anticipating that the APU was going to switch itself off due to lack of lubricating oil. Initially, Air Marshal Khurshid Mirza, director-general, Civil Aviation Authority and the chief Pakistani spokesman on the hijacking, stated in his first press briefing on the night of the hijack that they knew that the lights inside the aircraft would go off at around 9.30 p.m. when the fuel ran low. He also said that the tarmac lights were put off to facilitate the commando action. But in his very next briefing—which took place the following

AHMEDABAD

Cruel Fate

FATE can be agonisingly cruel at times. Avishkar, the 22-member dance troupe from Ahmedabad, were not scheduled to board the ill-fated Pan Am flight since they did not have confirmed reservations. But shortly before the scheduled take-off, they were informed that their seats had been confirmed. Janaki Vyas, daughter of former Gujarat health minister, Kokila Vyas, had a strange premonition and was reluctant to board. But since the rest of the troupe had been looking forward avidly to making the trip, she boarded the aircraft with the rest. They were to give performances in a number of American cities.

The US visit had been conceived only after the birth of Avishkar in June this year. Trupti Dalal, director of Avishkar who died in the hijacking, was an upcoming young dancer and singer. Tragically, this was their first visit abroad. With the death of Trupti and Rupal Desai, another dancer, and injuries to 10 others, the trip was abandoned. Rupal was to get married in December.

All the dancers, in their early 20s, were quite excited about going abroad. Since their tickets were confirmed at the last minute, their seats were not together. It was just another quirk of fate. Shirin Kureshi, a law student from Ahmedabad, who was one of the troupe members was persuaded to change her seat by Rupal as she wanted to sit and chat with another friend with whom Shirin was sitting. Shirin readily agreed. Today, she realises that it was changing the seat which saved her life as the new seat was behind the service cabin which shielded her from bullets while Rupal was caught in the line of fire and died.

When the hijackers took over the aircraft at Karachi, none of the dancers took it seriously. At first, they thought they were just security men as they were dressed in uniforms which even had badges on it. It was only after one of the hostesses was dragged by her hair and a pistol held to her head that they knew it was a hijack. One of the hijackers was patrolling the aisle with grenades in his belt. One of the grenades was in his hand and he was playing around with it like a ball. As the hours passed, the atmosphere had relaxed a great deal and the air hostess had even come on the public address system saying that the hijackers never meant any harm as all were behaving well. There was also another announcement at the behest of the hijackers that any movement would invite death.

Coffins of Trupti and Rupal at Ahmedabad airport

That was till the air-conditioning went off and then the lights. The window shades had been pulled down and it became pitch dark. The hijackers started shouting commands to each other in Arabic. One of the hijackers standing next to Trupti removed the pin from his grenade. Within minutes, panic gripped the troupe with their screams echoing in the aircraft as firing started. Shirin, for one, still thought that these were only crackers to frighten them. But when warm-blood from different directions soaked into her kurta she knew that the worst had happened. She clung to an air hostess sitting next to her and both of them were saved from bullets and grenade splinters by the cabin in front. One grenade exploded near Trupti and her clothes were soaked with blood. Rupal also was hit by bullets and splinters. As she lay in a pool of blood, another dancer, Urmi Parikh, kept calling out "help my friend, please help". But in the rush and desperation to save their own lives, people panicked. Travelling along with the troupe was Trupti's son, Khanjan, 12. One of the dancers, Utpala Desai, braved the bullets to save him. She grabbed him and shielded him with her body as bullets passed over her. A bullet grazed her arm and splinters hit her forehead, but she remained crouched over Khanjan in the seat. Janaki says that no commandos were seen. Shirin insists she did not see any either.

After the shooting, 11 of the troupe members lay injured. Two were dead. The others miraculously escaped. One of morning—he totally denied what he had said earlier in front of a number of correspondents. Mirza took another turn-about when he denied that the tarmac lights were turned off by Pakistani authorities for the commandos to move in. He also denied that Pakistani authorities knew approximately when the APU was going to switch off. However, Frederick Reid, representative for Pan Am's president, stated in Bombay: "Pan Am was aware of the likelihood of the APU breaking down and had advised the Pakistan authorities in charge of negotiations well in advance. We made every effort to inject this understanding to the negotiating authorities."

But what has caused intense debate in aviation circles is the unprecedented evacuation of the cockpit crew, leaving the passengers stranded and in the hands of an inexperienced, 23-them, Parita Patel, was sitting on the front row but as the hijackers were standing and firing the bullets flew over her head. As soon as the firing stopped, she managed to rush to the emergency exit and slide down the chute. Shirin panicked and as one of the emergency doors opened over the wing, she jumped on the wing. The wing was at a height, but she just closed her eyes and jumped fracturing both legs. Another troupe member, Daramendra Shah, also jumped and fractured his left leg.

IN the panic, the troupe got scattered. It was total chaos. Even after some had managed to run to the lounge, they were still scared as one of the hijackers who was running with them was overpowered by security officials as passengers pointed him out. Though Shirin could hardly walk she did not want to go to the hospital as she was too shaken. But Pakistani officials cajoled her and other members of the troupe into going to the hospital. "From then on it was such a soothing experience," recalls Janaki. "The doctors, nurses and visitors who came to see us never knew us but were so kind and embarrassingly hospitable." One of the visitors told Janaki: "We are Pakistanis, but we care and respect Indians. After all we were part of the same country." At no point during her stay in Pakistan did she experience any hostility.

Shirin feels the same. Says she: "Some of the doctors were so helpful. They kept giving us courage, helping us overcome pain and grief." One doctor went out to buy a pair of slippers for a troupe member while others bought clothes as most of the girls had blood-stained clothes. The Avishkar members were touched by the little gifts brought by Karachi residents. Conspicuously missing were officials from the Indian Embassy. "At least a word that they are around to ensure that we got safely home was what we expected from the Indian Embassy," said one of the girls adding that they all came only when Jagdish Tytler and K.C. Pant arrived.

"The injuries of Janaki have not hurt me as much as the official insensitivity that I witnessed when the hijack took place. It was a friend from New York who rang me up saying that she had seen my injured daughter on television and that she was looking fine," says an embittered Kokila Vyas. In fact, in the first list that arrived at Bombay airport, the name of Janaki was missing in the survivors list. It was the New York call that calmed her and her husband Hariprasad Vyas. Pan Am was evasive in their replies and worse still, was the fact that the Indian Government was not coming out with adequate information even though nearly 24 hours had passed after the hijacking. Though she was a former Gujarat minister, she could not prod government officials into action. "What then is the condition of those who are commoners and have no contacts?" she asks angrily.

After struggling for 72 hours to get some concrete information of the plight of the troupe members, K.S. Modi, one of Trupti's relatives, rang up the prime minister's office in desperation and minced no words complaining that no government source had yet contacted Avishkar and they were totally in the dark about who the survivors were. Worse still was the misleading information which mentally tortured the already harassed relatives. Asked Kokila Vyas: "What is the Indian Embassy in Pakistan doing? Is it not their duty to ensure speedy flow of information in such an emergency? It is the Pakistanis who looked after our wounded Indians."

Symbolic of the general confusion was the incident at Bombay airport where Narendra Desai, the ailing father of Rupal, was handed a coffin containing another victim's body. The coffin had Rupal's photograph on it but Desai wanted the coffin opened before he took charge of it. The officials refused to open it saying that there was no need to verify the body. After a heated argument the officials relented. Discovering their mistake, they launched a frantic search for Rupal's body and finally handed it over to her sobbing relatives.

year-old air hostess. Pan Am has claimed that the evacuation was standard operating instructions to their flight crew. In terms of immobilising the aircraft and buying time for negotiations, it can be argued that the absence of the flight crew would be in certain situations, an advantage. But in this particular case, it proved a questionable decision. "It is totally unacceptable practice for the commander of an aircraft to escape with his crew when there is a hijacking," says Air-India's Captain V.P. Raol, president of the Indian Pilots Guild. "My prime concern as captain is the safety of the 400 passengers. Only the presence of the commander can instil confidence among demoralised and panicky passengers who would expect him to take decisions in an emergency in a calm manner."

Airline pilots also question why, even if the pilot and co-pilot escaped to ensure that the plane stayed on the ground, the flight engineer was not left behind to ensure that a senior officer was present in case of emergencies. All the 13 Indian flight attendants, 11 women and two men, had been selected by Pan Am last December for a three-month training stint in Miami. They started flying only in March. The absence of the cockpit crew meant that there was nobody in the hijacked aircraft to provide technical guidance. The lack of technical guidance proved fatal in at least two crucial areas. By leaving the cockpit unattended, the flight crew caused a crucial breakdown in communication between the hijackers and airport authorities. There was nobody to operate the radio and communicate with the control tower.

PRESIDENT ZIA

"Mr Gandhi's comments are unfair"

RARELY has the prime minister of India lashed out at the handling of affairs in another country in the manner that Rajiv Gandhi did at his press conference in Harare; and the brunt of the attack was on the Pakistani authorities for their handling of the hijacking of a Pan American jetliner at Karachi airport. Striking an unusually tough note, Rajiv referred to the security operations as 'hamhanded', 'not competent enough', and 'bungling'. He charged the Pakistan Government with encouraging hijackers, and added that he did not believe the power failure aboard the aircraft had been because fuel suddenly ran out. Instead, he said, this was due to the 'concerted action' which was taken by the Pakistani security forces. Finally, and very emphatically, he pointed out that the hijackers spoke Urdu, and that this language was spoken on the subcontinent of India—leaving it to the journalists present in large numbers at the press conference to draw their own conclusions.

Pakistan did not help its case when an official briefing the press in Karachi first claimed that the security forces had switched off power to the aircraft in order to board it, but later said the power failure was not planned and that the security forces stormed the aircraft only 15 minutes after the hijackers started shooting.

Executive Editor T.N. NINAN got an exclusive interview with Pakistan's President, General Zia-ul-Haq, then in Harare for the summit, during which it became clear that the Pakistan President had been stung by Rajiv's comments. Excerpts:

On Rajiv Gandhi's comments at the press conference:

Mr Gandhi's comments are unfair, unfriendly, uncalled for and unbecoming of a prime minister of India. I was personally briefing Mr Gandhi every half hour yesterday, and I told him through your foreign secretary at midnight last night that the security forces had carried out their operations, and about the casualties.

On the delayed trial of past hijackers caught in Pakistan.

"Can the prime minister of India speed up a civil case in court?"

After his press conference this morning, I wanted to meet him and explain to him what happened. But he has been busy.

On whether the security forces bungled:

How? Not a single passenger died from security bullets. All those who were killed or injured were hit by the hijackers' bullets.

Put yourself in the hijackers' shoes. The punishment for an aircraft hijacking in Pakistan is the death penalty, the pilot and co-pilot had escaped, they couldn't go anywhere. So they had two options: one was to surrender. As for the other option, they had already declared their intentions by killing one passenger. So when the power failed, the security people had to move in.

On why he didn't inform Rajiv Gandhi in advance about the security operation:

How could I? He is here (in Harare), I am here, the decision is being taken somewhere else.

On the identity of the hijackers, and their speaking Urdu:

They are Palestinians. Three of them are alive, the fourth is wounded. As for Urdu, this is what I told Mr Gandhi last night, that the leader spoke Urdu with an accent. Now, information that I give him is used in this manner, and charges are made against Pakistan:

On the delayed trial of past hijackers caught in Pakistan.

You tell me, can the prime minister of India speed up a civil case in court?

On the delay in bringing the case to trial in the first place:

Pakistan was initially under martial law. I didn't want this to go to a military court, and wanted a civil court. This took time.

More important, the pilot or even the co-pilot would have been able to offer a credible explanation to the hijackers regarding the failure of the APU which plunged the cabin into darkness and provoked the hijackers into believing that the sudden power failure was a prelude to a commando attack.

MOREOVER, Pan Am crew members who received elaborate training in emergency procedures in Miami insist that they had never been told that the cockpit crew would evacuate in the event of a hijack. All they were instructed to do in the event of a hijack was to inform the captain immediately over the intercom by using the special code which is what Neerja Mishra did. "When we were training we were told that the captain would always be there. That is why we were shocked when we learnt that the captain and his crew had evacuated," says a Pan Am crew member. Even John Testrake, the captain of the Trans World Airlines airliner that was hijacked to Beirut last year and hailed as a national hero in the US, stated in a Channel Four TV interview in New York last week that what the captain and flight crew of Pan Am 73 did was unforgivable and against all norms of established aviation procedure.

The Indian team headed by K.C. Pant, minister of steel and Mines, and Jagdish Tytler, minister of state for civil aviation, which flew into Karachi on the afternoon of September 6 under orders from Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi have detailed a number of other discrepancies in the official statements made by the Pakistan authorities during their briefings. These include:

- The Pakistan authorities claim that the hijackers had wired explosives inside the aircraft at four places. Every single passenger questioned has stated that no explosives were evident in the aircraft nor were any of the hijackers seen placing explosives at any point.
- The exact number of hijackers still remains unclear. On one occasion, Pakistan authorities spoke of a driver plus four hijackers and on another they claimed that only four hijackers were involved.
- Passenger accounts are unanimous in their view that between the time of APU switching off and the time they reached the terminal building, some distance away, no commandos were in evidence. The total time elapsed was as much as 15 minutes. The passengers also insisted that the hijackers, apart from Mustafa, had been arrested by local airport police.

In fact, on-the-spot reports from Pakistan say that the much-talked-about commando rescue operation, if there was any, came only too late. The commandos only entered the aircraft when the killing spree was already over and the passengers had all left the aircraft. The commandos were not even able to find any of the hijackers inside the plane except Mustafa, who had been wounded and was found with a belt of plastic explosive wired to a detonator strapped to his waist. The other three hijackers were later caught on the tarmac and in the lounge when passengers identified them. In the face of 23 dead and 130 gravely injured, Pakistani claims of having done a "good job of overpowering the hijackers" appears to be a crude attempt at covering up a series of fatal bungles.

Consequently, events showed that Pakistan security forces had no clear plan or preparation for action should events take an unexpected turn. In the total absence of a plan and coordination between the negotiating officials and the commandos, it was inevitable that the heavily-armed hijackers would over-react when the lights went off.

AFP

The ultimate provocation for the hijackers to open fire was supplied by the man in charge, Air Marshal Khurshid Mirza who, by his actions, panicked the hijackers into believing an assault was imminent.

MUJIB

Brigadier Tariq Mahmood, who led the 20-member commando operation says: "It took two or three minutes for the commandos to enter the aircraft," a claim refuted by all passengers and eye witnesses.

What has not so far been publicised but is now confirmed by senior Pakistan security personnel is that the provocation for the hijackers to open fire was supplied by the man in charge of handling the crisis—Mirza himself. At around 9.30, Pakistan authorities took the fatal decision not to switch the tarmac lights on but instead, set up a ring of temporary lights around the hijacked aircraft. Without warning the hijackers of their intentions, a crew of 10 or 12 electricians were sent out in the darkness to set up the lights around the aircraft.

While the shadowy figures were moving around the plane with equipment and wiring in their hands, Mirza, Daroga and an Arabic interpreter recruited from Saudi Arabian Airlines raced off towards the aircraft in a sedan to find out, Mirza later said, why the hijackers had broken off communications. But before they could reach, the aircraft lights went off. The three men then raced back to the terminal, collected a megaphone and rushed back to inform the hijackers that the APU was an internal fault and not a deliberate act. By the time they reached to within 150 yards of the aircraft, the hijackers had already started shooting and the passengers were sliding down the chute. Senior Pakistani security sources say that the sight of shadowy figures moving around the aircraft (the crew setting up the lights) and the car racing up twice to the aircraft must have panicked the hijackers into believing that an assault was being launched since the

KARACHI SECURITY

Fatal Flaws

IMMEDIATELY after the hijack drama at Karachi airport came to an end, a Pan Am spokesman in New York squarely blamed Pakistani security men for allowing armed hijackers to enter the sterile premises of the airport. Ironically, a few months earlier, another Pan Am official Daniel Sonesen, systems director, security, had given the airport a clean bill of health.

Sonesen was a member of a three-man inspection team from the International Air Transport Association (IATA), that visited Karachi International Airport between February 21 and 23 this year and spoke of the airport security in glowing terms. INDIA TODAY managed to obtain a copy of the IATA report signed by Sonesen, Anthony Lowndes, IATA security adviser, and Munir Hussain, facilitation manager, Pakistan International Airlines. The main points of the report:

► "The team was pleased to see a properly trained aviation security force which is obviously disciplined, well motivated and well supervised. The security systems and equipment are efficient and adequate contingency plans have been prepared."

The reality turned out to be quite different. The indifferent security detail guarding the gate of the airport carelessly allowed a van load of armed hijackers to drive onto the tarmac.

► "The aircraft parking areas are very well controlled, protected and lighted. All aircraft are protected by Airport Security Force (ASF) personnel who physically and carefully search staff entering aircraft. There is also an armed presence on aircraft parking areas."

But when put to the test, Karachi security was found wanting in all these areas. The armed guards on the tarmac and those assigned for guarding the parked plane obviously did nothing to prevent the hijackers from rushing into the aircraft. And the lighting failed or was switched off panicking the hijackers into shooting indiscriminately.

► "Nobody is allowed airside (of the terminal) or to other restricted areas without the appropriate identification which is issued and controlled by the ASF. This identification is worn by all staff and is checked at all access points."

None of this happened. The hijackers were wearing only security uniforms. According to reports from Karachi they were not carrying identification papers. If papers had been checked they may not have been able to enter the airport.

► The IATA team had noted the presence of "sufficient security personnel patrolling and available at strategic points to deal with unlawful interference with civil aviation."

No such intervention occurred. The commandos arrived on the scene too late to intervene.

► The team made a crucial recommendation. It suggested that an alarm button be installed at the vehicle entry gates so that a warning could be sent to the control centre.

Even if it was installed, the alarm was never activated on the day of the hijack.

Having commended the most crucial aspects of the airport's security, the team went on to pinpoint some minor shortcomings. Passengers checked-in baggage was X-rayed, the report said, but passengers were not required to identify their baggage before its loading onto the plane. IATA advised the Karachi authorities to adopt this precaution.

The team also recommended shorter shifts for staff scanning the X-ray machine's TV monitors as long shifts affected concentration. Even if these defects were rectified, it mattered little because the Karachi airport authorities had failed in the more crucial areas, leading to the hijacking and killings. And Pan Am, which had months earlier praised the state of security at Karachi airport, was forced, in the wake of the hijacking, to cancel its Karachi flights.

hijackers fired inside as well as outside the aircraft.

The officials also have no answer as to why the hijackers' earlier demand for putting on the tarmac lights was not complied with. According to Mirza, the demand was conveyed to the control tower from where the provincial governor and chief minister of Sind were supervising the operation. As against this version, the chief minister contended that contact with the hijackers had already been cut off at about 8 p.m. There was no mention of the hijackers' demand for putting on the tarmac lights in the chief minister's version. It was quite apparent that the authorities were totally inexperienced with handling an emergency of this nature and took the wrong decisions.

Similarly, it is also not clear whether there was any serious effort on the part of the Government to provide a flight crew so that the plane could have been flown to Cyprus as was demanded by the hijackers. The hijackers had agreed to release the women, children and some elderly passengers when this demand was complied with. According to the government spokesman, the hijackers' request was fully communicated to local Pan Am officials. But authorities avoided answering the vital question as to what the Pakistan Government was doing in the light of the demand? The chief minister's answer to this question was revealing: "It is not our airline. Our job was to just convey the demand to them (Pan Am). We could not force Pan Am to comply with it," he stated. Reports from Pakistan, however, indicate that the difficult decision to not allow the aircraft to leave Karachi airport was taken jointly by Pakistan and American officials some time in the afternoon.

PAKISTAN officials dealing with the hijacking issue were obviously caught completely unaware when the hijackers started shooting. The official agencies conducting operational exercise since noon that day, were totally at sea when the crunch came: neither were the commandos, who were posted near the tarmac, told what exactly to do in case the hijackers started killing people. In fact, when the time came to act, the commandos did not even have a ladder to board the aircraft. Pakistan officials have stated that the reason the commandos were delayed was because they had to wait till all the passengers left the aircraft before they could board—from the same escape chute. It seems incredible that an anti-terrorist force would be without access equipment when, as Pakistan claims, they stormed the aircraft "and overpowered the hijackers".

In fact, the commandos took well over 15 minutes to move from where they were stationed some distance from the tarmac, to the aircraft, and that too after the passengers had already left the plane through the emergency chute. And, as Mirza admitted, it took them several minutes just to find a ladder. Naga Toli, an Indian residing in West Germany, who was the last to leave the aircraft, says he saw the commandos coming up the gangway when he was sliding down the emergency chute. Brigadier Tariq Mahmood, who led the 20-member commando operation, however, gave a totally different version. "It took two or three minutes for the commandos to enter the aircraft," he said.

Clearly, senior government officials, the governor and the chief minister of Sind and the two other ministers present, Zain Noorani, minister of state for foreign affairs, and Haji Shamimuddin, provincial minister, who were in charge at Karachi, bungled miserably in their handling of the crisis and in coordinating their efforts. Instead, there was utter confusion.

Initial reports stated that there were two dead hijackers. The following day, the chief minister said that one hijacker had been killed while the other who had appeared to be dead was in fact, alive, "and the credit for this goes to our doctors", he added. Addressing a separate press conference at exactly the same time at the airport, Mirza was silent about the number of hijackers, dead or captured. Later, the official Pakistan media came out with a statement saying that all four hijackers had been captured alive. The actual reason for the confusion was that radio mechanic Meher Kharas, was lying wounded in the cockpit. Since he was dressed in a uniform that resembled the ASF one worn by the hijackers, the commandos shot him by mistake.

What is also obvious in all this welter of conflicting claims and contradictions is that American officials were very much involved in the entire hijack drama and the negotiations. Reports from Pakistan categorically state that American officials from the US consulate in Karachi were present in the control tower throughout the hijack crisis. It is also highly likely that it was under US pressure that Pakistani officials broke off negotiations, informed the hijackers that no relief crew was available to fly them to Cyprus, and generally responded in the manner they did and with such tragic consequences.

A special team of US intelligence officials arrived in Pakistan after the hijack and are now assisting in the investigations. Sources in Pakistan say that they are pressurising the Pakistan Government to allow them to interrogate the hijackers so that they can establish exactly which group or country they belong to and perhaps take retaliatory action. The US Government has reportedly also asked that the hijackers be extradited to the US to stand trial there. But Pakistan has not agreed fearing that the US might retaliate against a fellow Islamic state and the blame could indirectly fall on them.

That the hijacking of the aircraft, and the massacre of innocent people, was a despicable and evil act deserving the strongest condemnation, there can be no doubt. But even if the confusion over the hijacking and its perpetuators does eventually clear, the families of the victims will be no closer to knowing why their relatives had to die on strange soil, gunned down in a hail of bullets triggered off by the tragic blunders of those responsible for saving their lives.

NAM SUMMIT

India's Healing Touch

The Harare Summiteers

AT HOME, Rajiv Gandhi's constant forays to distant lands are a subject of criticism. But in international fora, his overseas initiatives certainly seem to be paying dividends in terms of a strong Indian presence and clear diplomatic mileage. All this was in evidence during the non-aligned summit in Harare last fortnight, with summiteers acknowleding India's leadership on issues that matter to the world's largest body outside the United Nations. Executive Editor T.N. NINAN's report from Harare:

ON the drive into Harare from the airport, the Zimbabwean flag and the faces of the host country's president (Canaan Banana) and prime minister (Robert Mugabe) were predictable sights atop lamp-posts. What was not expected along the route was the sight of the Indian tricolour atop the lamp-posts too, along with Rajiv Gandhi's face. Both were also abundantly visible all over Harare, along the main Samora Machel Avenue and Julius Nyerere Way, and also at several points near the Harare International Conference Centre. No other country or visiting summiteer was similarly honoured.

The Indian presence was equally palpable inside the conference venue, amply reflected in the repeated pictures of Rajiv Gandhi on the front page of Harare's main newspaper, the Herald, and underscored by the fact that India's was the only 'country pavilion' at the local agricultural show, Harare's main annual event. Rajiv also had the honour of opening a hall named after him.

Mugabe had a 90-minute one-to-one session with Rajiv on the eve of the summit, Zimbabwe TV ran a prime time interview with him the same day, and (since such signals matter in the world of diplomacy), while other heads of state and government were put up in special summit villas, Rajiv had pride of place in the state guest-house.

Some of the special treatment was almost certainly because India was the outgoing chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM), but there was more to it than that. The Cuban flag and President Fidel Castro's face, for instance, weren't the only things publicly visible at the 1983 New Delhi summit, although Cuba was the outgoing chairman then. The simple fact—noted with quiet satisfaction by Indian diplomats at Harare—was that India now enjoyed a special status in the non-aligned fraternity.

Before the 1983 summit in New Delhi, NAM had been a badly fractured body, with the then chairman Castro pushing the line that the Soviet bloc was NAM's "natural ally". In contrast, 1986 sees NAM a more united body, the movement back in the mainstream. Mugabe paid handsome tribute to this achievement in his inaugural address by referring to India's "healing touch"; Zambia's Kenneth Kaunda said in his speech that India had brought NAM back to the correct path; Singapore Foreign Minister S. Dhanabalan told INDIA TODAY that "the Non-Aligned Movement is more non-aligned today because of India": Yugoslav President Sinan Hasani said India had preserved NAM's unity, and Maldives President Maumoon Abdul Gayoom said in an interview: "NAM is more united now than before, a great deal has been achieved because of India's leadership."

If that was one measure of achievement, there were several others. Said N. Krishnan, India's permanent representative at the UN in New York and the most active man behind the scenes at Harare: "Most of the formulations on critical issues at Harare are a repeat of what had been hammered out at the New Delhi summit in 1983 and at the NAM foreign ministers' meet that preceded this summit, under India's chairmanship." This included such contentious issues as leaving Kampuchea's seat vacant at the summit, and the paragraph in the final declaration on Afghanistan. India had once been criticised virulently for its stand on Afghanistan; yet, at Harare, India was asked to chair a sub-committee on Afghanistan. Even Pakistan had no complaints on this score. Pakistan President Zia-ul-Haq told INDIA TODAY: "We are quite happy with what was decided in New Delhi. We neither wanted nor would have liked a change." Said an Indian diplomat: "India has emerged as a consensus-builder, not just on Afghanistan but also on such issues as the venue for the next NAM foreign ministers' meeting."

India's diplomats recalled that things weren't always quite as comfortable. Havana in 1979 marked a low point, with S.N. Mishra, the foreign minister in the short-lived Charan Singh government, putting in a sorry performance (prime minister Charan Singh did not go) and not even opposing Pakistan's application for joining the non-aligned club (a point on which the foreign office mandarins still have strong feelings). But Mrs Gandhi retrieved the lost ground and Rajiv has carried it on from there.

BOTH, of course, had the advantage of building on the status bequeathed by Jawaharlal Nehru. But, as was obvious at Harare, virtually all the other founding fathers of the movement have lost in stature over the years. Yugoslavia has not found a leader of adequate stature to replace Josip Broz Tito and was rarely heard of at Harare. Its repeated bid to host a NAM summit again has made no headway. Indonesia's Suharto has chosen to stay away from NAM summits, and Egypt's Mubarak was another absentee at Harare. India, in contrast, is seen as having contributed enormously to the very survival of NAM over the last three years. Said President Zia: "Some of the credit and stature that come to Mugabe today is because of Rajiv Gandhi's leadership of the movement in the past." Non-summiteers echoed that comment. Mugabe's one-time political rival and soon-to-be political ally, Joshua Nkomo, said, when contacted: "The success of Harare is a tribute to India's leadership since 1983."

Rajiv, of course, has built on the country's inheritance, and the comments of several leaders at Harare made it clear that his contribution has been recognised. Bangladesh Prime Minister Mizanur Rahman Chowdhury told INDIA TODAY before the summit got under way: "Rajiv has shown more initiative than many other leaders, especially on the nuclear issue and in talking to Thatcher about sanctions against South Africa."

It seemed almost natural, then, that Rajiv should be perhaps the most sought-after person in Harare, after Mugabe himself. Anyone who mattered came calling, or was called upon: Kaunda, Castro, Yugoslavia's Sinan Hasani, Libya's Gaddafi, Iranian President Khamenei, Mozambique's Samora Machel and Botswana's President Masire among the frontline states, Arafat of the PLO, Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega and Algerian President Chadli Benjadid, among several others. Said a senior Indian diplomat: "I don't think the prime minister wants such a busy schedule. But the others won't leave him in peace." Added Foreign Secretary A.P. Venkateswaran: "He seems to be in his metier over here."

Rajiv's speech at the special session to commemorate NAM's silver jubilee was marked mostly for its moderation—at a time when a hostile western press was counting the number of critical references to the United States and the absence of such references to the Soviet Union. But this moderation itself became a point of criticism, with observers pointing out that Rajiv made no mention of the US attack on Libya. But a senior Indian diplomat explained that it was the Indian style to be moderate in tone, and that there was no reference to Libya because this had been dealt with during the last foreign ministers' meeting and there had been no fresh developments since then. Nevertheless, Rajiv is reported to have developed belated doubts about having struck too moderate a tone, but by then it was too late to make changes in the prepared text.

Things weren't always tickety-boo, then. And there were a couple of occasions when Indian diplomats blanched at potential gaffes that would have compromised the Indian stand. In one case, a stand that Rajiv took might have meant closing the door to the option of another 'peaceful nuclear explosion'. And as one Indian diplomat said: "Don't forget that Rajiv in France declared India was willing to sign the nuclear non-proliferation treaty." But another argued that the prime minister was still in a learning phase, that he couldn't be expected to be aware of all the nuances in India's diplomatic postures and that in any case no serious damage had been done.

It also seemed at one stage that Pakistan would make some headway in its bid to embarrass India on some key issues. But President Zia's reference to Kashmir in his speech was studiously ignored, and Pakistan eventually got nowhere with its renewed proposal to have South Asia declared a nuclear-free zone. The proposal was opposed by countries as far apart in the political spectrum as Cuba, Algeria and Argentina. And Zia himself admitted that: "We raised it, but didn't make much headway". Pakistan also opposed India's

SIDE-SHOWS

Amusing Fare

LARGE conferences can be endless exercises in diplomatic inanities. And so it was that one debate at Harare centred on revising a reference on Antarctica to substitute the word 'agreement' with 'understanding'. A second prolonged wrangle resulted over an equally innocuous amendment on 1986 as the UN Year of Peace. Endless debate followed and the meeting was adjourned before peace prevailed on the subject of peace.

But Nepal won the prize hands down for the most innocuous piece of diplomatic idiocy. It proposed an amendment to the final political declaration to the effect that the heads of state and government reaffirmed "their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations" and "stressed the necessity for strengthening further the important role played by the non-aligned countries within the UN."

In the final analysis, therefore, much of the diplomatic roundabout at Harare was a forgettable feast—except for some corned beef. At the Indian pavilion which won the first prize at the Harare agricultural show, one citizen pertinently noted in the visitors' book that while the pavilion was very good, he was distressed to see corned beef on display, because while India was secular it had to respect Hindu religious sentiments and not give the world a wrong impression.

Inevitably, then, the side-shows were more interesting than the main bill of fare. Perhaps the most curious event concerned the telephone lines between Zimbabwe and Liberia. Phone connections from Harare to the rest of the world were excellent. But when a coup seemed imminent in Liberia its delegation called home to find out the latest situation, the lines kept getting cut. Enquiry showed that the phone line had been deliberately snipped. Was there a fifth columnist in the Liberian summit team?

In the Indian camp, the man most talked about apart from Rajiv Gandhi was Minister of State for Fertiliser K. Natwar Singh. Among those in the running for sitting up on stage for the inaugural session, behind Rajiv was External Affairs Minister P. Shiv Shanker. But Natwar Singh pipped him to that honour.

PIB/D. SENGUPTA

Natwar Singh explains a point to Rajiv: asserting himself

Singh, however, was not quite as successful in other skirmishes over the pecking order. Indian delegates housed at the Harare Sheraton were located on two floors: the 14th and the sixth. Shiv Shankar was up on the 14th floor, and another room was for a minister of state. K.R. Narayanan got primacy since he is the minister of state for external affairs. Result: Natwar had to be content with being on the sixth floor, along with foreign office officials.

Unhappy with being edged out on account of being termed MOS(F)—minister of state (fertiliser)—Singh asked officials to drop the (F) in papers that referred to him, so that he would be just MOS, which might convey to those interested that he belonged to the external affairs establishment.

For all practical purposes, of course, he does. He was the only minister whom Rajiv took with him for the meeting with Cuban President Fidel Castro, and in the main conference hall Rajiv tended to consult Singh constantly, far more than Shiv Shanker or Narayanan. Foreign office mandarins say that this is because of Natwar's past experience, and guess that he might even be made MOS—without the (F).

Shiv Shanker may have had his high points at the summit, but once when he had helped draft and clear a note, it came back from Rajiv with the cryptic query: "Who drafted this?"

Rajiv was also impatient with the constantly delayed start to proceedings, and told his officials that the Indian delegates should be in their seats on time. But it was Rajiv's turn to be hopelessly late for a meeting with the Sri Lankan Prime Minister, R. Premadasa, who was kept waiting for over an hour while Rajiv listened to Castro's speech. No one thought it necessary to inform Premadasa.

However, other diplomatic niceties were correctly observed. When Muammar Gaddafi finished his theatrical speech—delivered in an underplayed tone punctuated with good effect by long pauses—and left the podium after wishing NAM farewell, Rajiv smiled and clapped twice perfunctorily. But after Mugabe's immediate and excellent response, Rajiv joined eagerly in prolonged and enthusiastic clapping. Back at his seat, Gaddafi unwound his nervous energy by twirling an unlit cigar.

But at least one Indian delegate spoke his mind on Gaddafi. Mohammed Yunus, forthright as ever, simply declared him "mad".

proposal to set up a standing ministerial committee on economic coordination, as did countries like Tunisia, Morocco and even Botswana. But, as N.P. Jain, secretary in the Ministry of External Affairs noted with satisfaction: "The proposal has finally gone through."

India did, however, find the going rough in continuing to oppose the inclusion of trade in services in the next round of negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), with even Argentina deserting the Indian camp. That virtually leaves India and Brazil as the only major countries still taking such a stand, and difficult battles will have to be fought on this in the future.

There could also be potential trouble in the move by the Maldives to arrange a minister-level South Asian discussion on the question of a nuclear-free South Asia. Indian diplomats reacted to this with some concern, since the Maldives seemed to be veering towards the Pakistan line on this question. But the Maldives President Gayoom argued that, "there has been no shift in the Maldives stand on this question. We have all along stood for a nuclear-free zone in South Asia, and what we have proposed is that we discuss and harmonise our views. All the South Asian countries have said they are willing to discuss the matter." But the view on this from South Block was not quite so sanguine.

In the final analysis, however, the momentary flaps that occasionally consumed the Indian contingent at Harare will be forgotten, for they didn't really amount to anything very significant. Both the prime minister and his men did well by the country, the Indian position on substantive issues remained secure, it had taken the initiative to help the frontline states get ready to tackle economic sanctions against South Africa, and the country's three-year term as chairman was viewed with general approval. If Havana in 1979 had marked a low point, and New Delhi in 1983 had helped to retrieve lost ground, Harare in 1986 consolidated India's position in what Mrs Gandhi had once called "history's biggest peace movement."

FRONTLINE STATES

Hopelessly Hamstrung

ANTI-Aircraft guns ringed the gleaming Harare International Conference Centre, and trucks with machine guns did their constant rounds along the perimeter. The guns pointed south, towards the South African border 500 km away, even as the delegates inside the sparsely-filled 4,000-capacity conference hall trained their oratorical fire on Pretoria. And though Robert Mugabe talked of disarmament and other issues before he finally turned to South Africa in his inaugural speech, there was little doubt that the eighth non-aligned summit was going to be judged by what it decided on steps to end the apartheid regime.

There was talk of defence aid and a self-defence force, but the main buzz phrase was 'economic sanctions'. Rajiv Gandhi talked of it in an interview shortly before he left for Harare, and again in an interview to Zimbabwe television on the eve of the summit inauguration. Harare's principal newspaper, the Government-controlled Herald, carried some report or the other on the subject almost throughout the summit, which had been preceded by a Commonwealth mini-summit on the sanctions issue, and then by a summit of the frontline states at Luanda in Angola that was convened to discuss sanctions.

But the mountain of words on the subject finally produced a mole-hill. The final call for selective sanctions left enough loopholes in it for almost everything to be traded with South Africa, the Africa Fund is only a beginning, and the delegations that are proposed to be sent to Washington, London, Bonn and Tokyo to convince the governments there can have little immediate impact. Although the movement had for the first time adopted a clear action programme, it was clear that Pretoria was under no immediate threat.

The odd thing about this is that it should have been expected. Just a week before the Harare summit, the frontline states' meeting in Luanda clearly showed that they were not ready to declare economic war or, more accurately, commit economic suicide. For the simple fact is that the frontline states and their neighbours—Lesotho, Swaziland, Botswana, Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Malawi and Tanzania—are in no shape to take any serious economic action against South Africa. They are hopelessly subject to Pretoria's economic clout, military superiority and strategic control of economic supply lines to almost all of southern Africa; Harare itself provided many instances of this dependence.

The Monomatapa Hotel, where journalists registered to cover the summit and Rajiv Gandhi hosted a dinner for heads of state, has South African parentage. The press kits had letter-heads, envelopes, writing pads and pens from the Delta Corporation—also South African-owned. The villas on Gun Hill built to house the heads of state were designed in South Africa. And the Herald imported special quality newsprint from South Africa for reporting on the sanctions proposed against it. Every bottle of beer that delegates drank was manufactured by a South African-owned brewery with monopoly in Zimbabwe.

That was not all. Air Zimbabwe operates regular flights to South Africa, and the South African airline was busy advertising its services on Zimbabwe TV during the summit week. Virtually all the imported goods that delegates bought from Harare's shops would have reached there via South Africa.

Indeed, far from the frontline states imposing sanctions on South Africa, it is Pretoria's Botha who has been using sanctions against them. By one estimate, these sanctions have already cost the frontline states $20 billion (Rs 25,000 crore). Sometimes the price is political: South Africa recently blockaded the movement of goods into Lesotho (a mountain country encircled by South Africa) to force a hungry populace to accept a change of government to one more amenable to Pretoria's wishes. Result: Lesotho now adopts a different stance on South African refugees belonging to the African National Congress (ANC).

In another instance, South Africa blocked fuel supplies to land-locked Zimbabwe, causing mile-long car queues for petrol, and provoking Prime Minister Mugabe to step up his country's fuel stocks from three weeks' requirement to three months.

SANCTIONS also make little sense when Lesotho, Botswana and Swaziland are part of a common customs union with South Africa, with South Africa collecting the customs duties and parcelling them out to member states. Both Lesotho and Swaziland use the South African rand as their own currency. Some of the states have their electricity grids linked to South Africa's, and hundreds of thousands of migrant workers from the states work in South Africa and earn foreign exchange that is repatriated home.

Economic dependence on South Africa has been ensured through military action as well. South African-backed commandos have blown up railway tracks and oil pipelines running through Mozambique and Angola, forcing the frontline states to increasingly transport their goods through the only available trade routes—in South Africa. The Benguela line through Angola has not functioned since Angola's independence in 1975. Result: Eighty per cent of Zimbabwe's foreign trade goes through South Africa. And 10,000 Zimbabwean troops guard the pipeline and railway track to Beira port on Mozambique's Indian Ocean coast against attacks from the Pretoria-backed Mozambique National Resistance (MNR).

Military destabilisation has accompanied economic sanctions. South African-backed rebels control parts of Angola, whose government survives only because of the presence of Cuban troops. In fact, two years ago a militarily hard-pressed Mozambique was forced to sign a controversial non-aggression pact with South Africa. And one of the frontline states—Malawi—even has diplomatic ties with Pretoria.

Botha has been using sanctions against the frontline states. These have already cost the frontline states $20 billion (Rs 25,000 crore).

The frontline states are fully conscious that enforcing of economic sanctions would have a terrible backlash on themselves. Rajiv Gandhi stood out among the people who perceived this clearly, and it is to his credit that he was one of the few summiteers to keep stressing the need for steps aimed at reducing the dependence on South Africa, so that the frontline states would be in a position to impose credible sanctions at a future date. A good deal of the oratory at Harare ignored this, and amounted to putting the cart before the horse.

Thus, Rajiv pushed for spelling out what precisely the new Africa Fund would do in terms of helping the frontline states, and if he was promptly made its chairman, it was with good reason. Rajiv also presented a detailed plan on how India's railway experts could help restore the damaged, disabled and inefficient railway lines so that transport dependence on South Africa could be reduced. India has also said that it is increasing its aid commitments to the region.

For, if South Africa is to make an economic exit in the frontline economies, someone has to step in or help develop local capabilities. As an Indian diplomat at Harare explained, there are only a handful of non-aligned states with the capacity for doing this, and among these India has taken the lead.

Thus, South African companies have contracted to run copper mines in Botswana and Zambia, but India may step in when some of the contracts run out. India has offered to build an oil refinery in Angola, and is gifting a Rs 20-crore hospital. In Zimbabwe, India will help small-scale industrial development and sericulture, and encourage cooperation in agricultural research. Aid under technical cooperation is being doubled. The total financial package, according to one official, could be in the region of Rs 100 crore.

The prospect of an increased Indian presence in the region promptly fuelled talk of a grand economic design to penetrate southern Africa, but an official in the Prime Minister's Secretariat scoffed at this: "We are not in Harare on a Marwari mission." Rajiv himself talked of the subject in terms of helping the southern African states face counter-sanctions by Pretoria, saying at his Harare press conference that "when the frontline states start applying sanctions, they will have problems, including from retaliatory measures. In that situation, we will try and help them."

Nevertheless, there are limits to what India can do ("We are not Kubera, said Foreign Secretary A.P. Venkateswaran). And unless other countries chip in with money and economic help, and perhaps arms too to neutralise South Africa's overwhelming military superiority, the frontline states will continue to remain more dependent on South Africa than it is on them.

JAMMU & KASHMIR

Home Rule

HISTORY was made in the state of Jammu and Kashmir last fortnight when, directly against the sentiments of the Opposition and the Kashmiri leadership, the state was brought under President's Rule for the first time since Independence under Article 356 of the Constitution. As police began rounding up local Kashmiri leaders including Abdul Ghani Lone, the People's Conference chief and others, Home Ministry officials and state bureaucrats huddled together to iron out the details for the Central take-over.

The action, based on a Home Ministry notification that the state Government "could not be carried out in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of India," ended temporarily the suspense over the political set-up in the troubled region. It also signalled a setback for Governor Jagmohan who had been arguing forcefully for the continuation of Governor's Rule. Prevailing over him was a political troika of Kashmiris—Union Tourism Minister Mufti Mohammed Sayed, Union Minister of State for Home Ghulam Nabi Azad, and M.L. Fotedar, the prime minister's political secretary—that will exert its influence on the state Government through the Home Ministry.

For several weeks, the Congress(I) and Farooq Abdullah's National Conference had been haggling over how to restore popular government. Each side had taken rigid positions about the mode of the transfer of power. Extending Central rule is considered to be an interregnum during which the two sides can, hopefully, work out an arrangement for a smooth return to democratic government. As expected, the Central action was greeted with a bandh and condemnation from the Opposition, including the fundamentalist groups. While Farooq himself refrained from comment, a team of his former ministers, led by former law minister G.M. Handoo issued a strongly-worded statement: "President's Rule will provide breeding ground to extremists and divisive forces which should be to no patriot's liking.... To keep the Assembly under suspended animation would enable detractors to continue the sordid game of political perversion."

But what has made the restoration of popular government difficult is the division and infighting within the Congress(I). Its leaders opposed continuation of Governor's Rule but were also unwilling to support elections because they feared that their arch-enemy Farooq would trounce them.

According to Congress(I) sources, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had favoured either dissolving the state Assembly and calling for fresh elections or handing over the Government to Farooq with support from outside. But his own partymen, led by Mufti and Fotedar, favoured a coalition government with Farooq as chief minister. And Rajiv had made a public commitment that the Assembly would last its full term till 1989. Caught between a rock and a cleft, he toyed with the possibility of a coalition as an interim measure. But Farooq himself was under pressure from his own party not to accept anything short of a fresh assembly election.

SUMAN DUBEY

Several senior advisers had told Rajiv that while he and Farooq negotiate, it would be politically wise to continue with Governor's Rule because the party would be able to improve its image in the valley. During the last six months Jagmohan had significantly improved the law and order situation and had streamlined the administration—developments which even Farooq was compelled to admire publicly. The Jagmohan administration never resorted to the imposition of curfews which had become a trademark of G.M. Shah's government though Jagmohan is known to be ruthlessly efficient. It was in the course of this efficiency drive—during which netas were devalued—that Jagmohan annoyed powerful local Congress(I) politicians. Ignored and politically impotent, they ganged up to lobby for President's Rule in order to have a greater say in state affairs through their allies in the high command and the Home Ministry.

Ultimately therefore, because of the continued infighting within the Congress(I), the end gainer has been Farooq Abdullah. He has been able to prove that time and the people are on his side. The massive welcome which he received on his return from the Haj last month was a clear testimony of his swelling personal popularity. Resigned to be patient, however, he said: "I have full faith in the prime minister and will give full support to whatever is in the better interests of the country." Now the ball is squarely in Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's court. Rajiv cannot afford to continue to display indecision. The Kashmiri psyche itself is hostile to the very idea of being ruled over by the Central Government. And the highly-sensitive state simply cannot be indefinitely governed without popular support, no matter how efficient the administration.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Caste Row

NO devil can drive me away and no deep sea can sink me because I am dedicated to the welfare of the people." So said the Andhra Pradesh Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao when he was asked last fortnight if the two-month old controversy over the reservation issue had placed him in a spot where he had to choose between the devil and the deep sea. But NTR's brave words can hardly mask the dilemma he faces on the socially sensitive and worsening reservations row.

While the agitation of the anti-reservationists and an adverse high court judgement have forced him to back out of his earlier decision to increase reservations, he now faces the wrath of the backward classes. Says state Janata Party President P. Babul Reddy: "For the first time NTR feels really shaken."

It was in early July that NTR, mainly to pre-empt a Congress(I) move to unite the backward classes under its fold, had hastily increased the reservations in jobs and college admissions for the backward classes from 25 to 44 per cent. On September 5, a three-judge full bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court struck down the increase as unconstitutional. NTR had increased reservations from 49 per cent to a staggering 71 per cent—44 for backward classes, 15 for Scheduled Castes, 6 for Scheduled Tribes and 6 for special groups like handicapped persons. The high court cited a Supreme Court judgement that total reservations cannot exceed 50 per cent as a precedent.

Emboldened by the high court judgement, Telugu Desam MP's and MLA's openly spoke out against the July decision at a specially convened party meeting, labelling it as one taken in "undue haste". A Telugu Desam MP described the ham-handed way in which NTR had decided on the sensitive issue as "a classical example of political hindsight". NTR seemed to agree, telling journalists later: "We will discuss with all concerned people. We cannot act in haste."

On September 9, the chief minister sent word to the Andhra Pradesh Nava Sangarshana Samithi (APNSS), the students' organisation which was threatening to intensify its agitation against the increase until he gave a commitment that he would not go on appeal against the judgement, calling for a truce. After a five-hour meeting, NTR struck a deal with the APNSS. While the APNSS agreed to call off the agitation, he committed himself to withdrawing the Government order on the increase—thus restoring the earlier 25 per cent reservations for the backward classes. There is now no question of going on appeal to the Supreme Court.

Predictably, the deal enraged the organisations of the backward classes—the rival students' body of the Andhra Pradesh Sama Sangram Parishad, the Andhra Pradesh Reservations Parirakshana Samithi of radical leftist youth and the Andhra Pradesh Backward Classes Sangham headed by Congress(I) MP T. Bala Goud, who had coincidentally called for a state-wide bandh on the same day. Although the bandh was not total, their protest took a militant turn when two buses were put on fire in Hyderabad and sporadic violence erupted in the districts. In Warangal, agitating pro-reservationists burnt the effigies of the three high court judges, B.P. Jeevan Reddy, K. Ramaswamy and Y.V. Anjaneyulu. Backward classes' leaders have been touring the state intensively, criticising the Government's turn around and preparing the ground for an agitation which will be more difficult to contain since, unlike the APNSS, their support is not just confined to the students alone. Says G. Ramamurthy, general secretary of Bala Goud's Sangham: "Our agitation will begin in the villages because we are in larger numbers there."

Stuck for a solution, NTR even approached all the other parties—including his former electoral allies and the Congress(I)—to suggest a way out. But since he had not consulted them when he took his initial decision, they turned down his appeal for help on the plea that he must first get a consensus from his own partymen. He is now reported to be toying with the idea of appointing a three-member commission to go into the reservations issue afresh but the organisations representing the backward classes may not agree to this move unless he can find a way of placating them.

Such flip-flops on major issues, which are characteristic of NTR, are beginning to cost the state dearly. If the reservations issue is not sorted out by the end of the month, this academic year might have to be written off for students. The state transport corporation has already suffered a loss of over Rs 4 crore in damaged and destroyed buses. More ominous for the Telugu Desam, the about-turn on a decision which NTR had described as "historic and momentous" is sure to cut into his personal popularity and give his party's image a major setback. Admitted a party MP: "This turn around will prove costly for us in the coming mandal elections." The elections are due in January but the backlash of the backwards issue could hit the N.T. Rama Rao Government even earlier.

SRF POISED FOR FURTHER GROWTH

Introducing new products and the latest technologies to India.

Shri Ram Fibres Ltd., the undisputed leader in the field of industrial nylons in the country, is now embarking on a major diversification and technology upgradation programme. This programme envisages the modernisation of current operations and diversification into new lines of business. It had at one stage doubled its production capacity through innovations alone, without resorting to any major investment. Now it's all set to touch international scales of operations with a production capacity of over 12,000 tonnes. The Company will now set forth with the latest technological advances into areas as diverse as outboard motors and refrigerant gases. It has already made its mark in the fields of industrial fabrics, automotive electricals and financing.

The Company's track record is an enviable one. Over the past 5 years alone, SRF has registered a phenomenal growth rate of 300% in sales. The turnover in 1985 stands at Rs. 74 crores, as against Rs. 25 crores in 1980. For its excellent performance, the Company was adjudged the Top Mini Corporate Giant by the illustrious Economic Times and Harvard Business School Association of India.

SRF's major focus was in the area of industrial nylons. The Company's nylon tyre cord plant was set up in 1973, at Manali, near Madras. This project was undertaken under technical collaboration with Chemtex of USA and Unitika of Japan.

The Company ventured into the fields of industrial yarn, nylon moulding powder and fishnet twine. These four major products of SRF bear the well-known brand names-Tufcord, Tufyarn, Tufnyl and Tuflon. Some of these are leaders in their individual markets.

To maintain its distinct edge in various fields, the Company is embarking on a massive technology upgradation and modernisation programme. This programme, estimated to cost Rs. 20 crores, will upgrade the existing technology and streamline the plant's operations. This, in turn, will lead to better quality products and increased productivity.

To this end, the latest 'Spindraw' technology is being introduced. In the first phase, production is expected to increase by 2000 tonnes. In the second phase, capacity will go up by another 2500 tonnes, touching a total of 12,000 tonnes per annum. The plant's operations will thus become far more cost-effective as the sheer economies of scale will succeed in reducing costs of production.

This programme will not only maintain the Company's leadership in the domestic market, but will also equip it to compete in the international arena.

SRF's R&D: Major breakthroughs on the anvil

Major emphasis is laid on the Company's in-house Research & Development Centre, which is equipped with the most modern facilities and a wealth of information.

The SRF scientists are engaged in some real frontline research efforts which is contemporary even to their western counterparts. The R&D Centre already has some major new products in the pipeline, which are expected to revolutionize some of the core industries of the nation.

Current operations are divided into three distinct areas—to develop new products, to discover new applications for existing products and to synthesize and develop critical raw materials which were previously being imported. In fact, some products have already been developed, which otherwise, the Company was importing at great expense.

SRF taps a high potential market: Industrial Fabrics

The management of SRF realised, as far back as the 70's, that India's industrial growth had opened up an area of great future potential—industrial fabrics. SRF entered the market with technical assistance from Val Mehler of West Germany, an acknowledged international leader in this field.

Today, SRF's Industrial Fabrics have risen to a position of prominence in this area. SRF is now equipped to produce a vast array of industrial fabrics, with a multiplicity of end-uses. These include dipped fabrics, such as dipped tyre cord and chafer fabrics used for the reinforcement of tyres.

It also makes belting ducks in heavy duty conveyor belts and other major products like filters, defence and luggage fabrics.

"Multiple applications of our products ensure a large and diverse market for us to operate in". Stating this, the Unit's General Manager further elaborated that the fabrics are converted into a range of end-products like tarpaulins for storage, covers for trucks, tents and parachutes for the defence forces along with material used for soft luggage.

"Most of these have been indigenously developed by our R&D Centre, saving on expensive imports", he added.

SRF Nippondenso: Tie-up with the world's No. 1 in auto electricals

Shri Ram Fibres Ltd. has entered into a joint venture with Nippondenso Ltd. of Japan, the world's largest manufacturer of automotive electricals. The plant was set up in record time at Surajpur in U.P., 35 miles from Delhi and has already commenced production.

Nippondenso, the Rs. 5500 crore Japanese collaborator, has impressive credentials. It has 14 offices in 10 countries, employing 33,000 people and is the third most profitable automobile corporation in Japan, after Honda and Toyota. The corporation supplies automotive components to major manufacturers like Daimler Benz, General Motors and Toyota and terms itself 'the world's best company with the world's best products.'

The Japanese system of better productivity through participative teamwork has also been imbibed in the unit's working culture. Nippondenso has also introduced into the local operations, its principle of 100% quality check on all items. It may be recalled that this earned them the coveted Deming Prize in Japan for adherence to total quality control. To quote the Chief Executive of the Surajpur plant, 'A new breed of automotive electricals are being manufactured for a new breed of automobiles'.

Company sources say that the products are distinctly superior to those currently available. They will be compatible with most of the Japanese vehicles that are proposed to be manufactured in India. Products like alternators with vacuum pump, reduction-type starting motors and multi-speed wiper motors will be manufactured in India for the first time. In fact, the Company is manufacturing components here, which have not even been introduced in Japan as yet. For instance, the alternators for the new Maruti models will be available only in India.

The ancillaries are being supplied to principal automobile manufacturers, like DCM Toyota and Maruti Suzuki.

Shri Ram Fibres enters the high-yield area of finance

Recently, attention has been drawn to a finance company which is faring well. The Company is Shri Ram Fibres Finance, promoted by Shri Ram Fibres Ltd. Although a fairly new entrant, it has till date disbursed over Rs. 3.50 crores, with another Rs. 2.50 crores still at its disposal. Within a few months of its operations, a gross profit of Rs. 20 lakhs has already been recorded.

SRFF issue oversubscribed five times

SRFF has not limited its sphere of operations to hire purchase and leasing alone. It has extended its expertise to other areas of finance.

These include acceptance house, guarantee facilities, bill discounting and venture capital, to name a few. The Company has also extended its skills into other channels of finance like recurring deposits and off-shore borrowings to mobilize funds in an innovative manner.

The Company has also finalised leasing tie-ups with dealers of Maruti Suzuki and Voltas Air-conditioners. Talks are on with other manufacturers of machinery and consumer durables like Bajaj and Kinetic Engineering.

In addition to other profitable areas, the Company expects business worth Rs. 15 crores from in-house resources alone. This would be done by financing DCM Computers and DCM Toyota LCV's, among other products of the Shriram Group.

Negotiations under way with global giants

SRF is negotiating with two internationally renowned corporate giants for its latest projects. The discussions are at an advanced stage of negotiations. A Company spokesman mentioned that Letters of Intent have already been obtained for the two proposed ventures.

The first of these two projects involves the manufacture of outboard motors to mechanize traditional fishing craft. The biggest beneficiaries of this Rs. 15 crore project will be the Indian fishing community.

With the installation of these outboard motors, the fisherman stands to increase his catch by as much as 300%, as the mechanized craft can penetrate deeper into the sea, even in the face of strong tides. The number of trips are also increased as the normal time taken by the fisherman in sailing back and forth from the shores is reduced drastically.

Current estimates state that there are about 2 lakh vessels in the country which would require these motors.

The second venture being negotiated between SRF and an international market leader is for the manufacture of refrigerant gases. A Rs. 20 crore plant is proposed to be set up in Rajasthan.

Refrigerant gases are used as a cooling medium in industries like Drugs & Pharmaceuticals, Chemicals and Electronics, to name a few. Appliances like refrigerators, domestic air-conditioners, water coolers and deep freezers also require them.

Presently there is no manufacturer of refrigerant gases in Northern India, which is a major market for refrigeration and air-conditioning equipment. SRF, therefore, will have a significant logistical advantage in this area.

'Participation Circles'—A successful innovation at SRF

At SRF, two qualities are constantly stressed, in every area of the Company's operations—creativity and innovation.

Take, for instance, SRF's creative use of its human resources. The Company has set up Employee Participation Circles (EPC) at every level. Each EPC is a small group of people, who meet voluntarily and on a regular basis, for about an hour every week or fortnight. The basic objectives of these meetings are to identify problems in their work area, analyse causes, devise solutions and wherever possible, implement the solutions themselves.

This supports Peter Drucker's Y Theory of Management —give an employee a sense of worth and responsibility and he/she will rise to every challenge.

And most important, it gives each employee a sense of deep participation in the Company's functioning and a commitment to its future.

Lala Shri Ram—The vision continues

Today, SRF's track record is the logical extension of the vision and business principles of Lala Shri Ram, the illustrious founder of the Shriram group.

The origins of this industrial group go back to 1889, when India's first textile mill—the Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co. Ltd. was set up.

Under Lala Shri Ram's stewardship, the Shriram group expanded into heavy chemicals, fertilisers, sugar, engineering, vanaspati and polyvinyl chloride, amongst others.

Like Lala Shri Ram, SRF believes that a corporation's duty is to grow and embark often—and successfully—into diversified industrial areas.

As Lala Shri Ram did years ago, SRF has succeeded because it always believed that its primary resources are not "... composed of land or building, nor even of the capital invested or patents owned but of the calibre of its people."

Today, the values held sacred by Lala Shri Ram find expression in the corporate values and beliefs of SRF, which are:

1. Growth through excellence.
2. SRF is its people.
3. Customer satisfaction.
4. Fostering creativity and innovations.
5. High standards of ethics.
6. Contributing to the development of the society.

Shareholders—

Look forward to a share in the further growth of SRF.

Dr. Bharat Ram, Chairman, Shri Ram Fibres

"The status Shri Ram Fibres today enjoys is the result of the drive and commitment shown by the employees, the efforts of a young, dynamic and motivated team. At this point of time, when the Company is firmly on its feet and on the threshold of exciting growth and diversification, it is appropriate to look back and thank all those who made this possible."

THE STAKES were probably the highest that Tamil Nadu's Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran has played for in his protracted political rule. For the first time since taking over as chief minister in 1977, the charismatic MGR's political future—and that of the ruling AIADMK—hung by the slenderest of threads; the results of two assembly by-elections held last fortnight. Coming on top of the party's internal squabbles and the electoral reverses in the February elections to the local bodies, defeats in the poll would have been conclusive proof that MGR's near-mystical hold on the state's politics was finally waning.

Understandably, the challenge compelled MGR to pull out all the political rabbits from his famous fur hat—with the ailing leader even going on a gruelling four-day electioneering tour, the first after his speech paralysis and kidney failure in October 1984. But with both constituencies of Tirunelveli and Aruppukkoottai returning AIADMK candidates, it is evident that MGR, despite his handicaps, continues to be a better stage manager than his arch political rival DMK chief M. Karunanidhi. Said T. Nagar Murthy, an MGR manram leader and organiser of the AIADMK in the T. Nagar Division of Madras city: "Our leader has convincingly proved that he is the only person who matters in the party and that people vote only for him. The entire AIADMK is a big zero without him."

MGR addressed no less than 13 election meetings during which he managed to stutter, stammer, and occasionally read from a written speech in a heavy slur. At one such meeting, he declared: "I am one of you. You can say whatever you want of me. But the DMK politicians are heaping undeserved blame on me. They are alleging that I have amassed Rs 24 crore of illegal wealth. They should prove it." In response, women, children and men hysterically waved two fingers for the party election symbol as they shouted, cried, and cheered.

Yet, the victory's statistics also contain a warning signal for the AIADMK. While its share of votes is declining in its known strongholds, the DMK continues to do better. In the high-profile contest for Tirunelveli, where Information Minister R.M.Veerappan was the AIADMK candidate, the party had won by over 24,000 votes in the 1980 elections and over 18,000 votes in 1984 even though MGR was then in a New York hospital. This time, despite massive injections of funds and manpower, Veerappan's margin came down to 13,324 votes. More important, the DMK polled over 60,000 votes in the two constituencies, proving that it is still the only alternative to the AIADMK in the state. Said Karunanidhi: "It is not a mandate against us but a show of emotional sympathy for an ailing leader. The tide is on the wane and will disppear by the next election."

More than the DMK, however, it is his own party's problems that plague MGR. By keeping Jayalalitha indoors during the campaign he has proved that it is his personal charisma, and no one else's, that gets the votes. But the election results will intensify the infighting between the factions led by Jayalalitha and Veerappan. Veerappan had already complained to MGR about the sabotage threat from Jayalalitha and her supporters during the election campaign; now, he and his hard core Dravidian supporters are likely to demand her ouster on the ground that the party should be purged of all newcomers who favour liberal policies. Veerappan fired his first salvo against his detractors in his thanksgiving statement itself, saying: "This election result has taught a lesson to the DMK and to my enemies."

Though MGR left strict instructions on party conduct before leaving for New York for his medical check-up (see box), both factions were holding secret meetings to upstage each other. According to AIADMK sources, the Veerappan-led faction has already chalked out a strategy under which they will gradually take over the party at the district level and pursue an anti-Centre course. MGR had promised during the campaign that he would draft some ministers for party work; when he returns from the US, he will, in all likelihood, face a demand for the removal of all pro-Jayalalitha ministers in the Cabinet. Significantly, it was during MGR's earlier absence that Jayalalitha was divested of her position as propaganda secretary. Clearly, Veerappan's stars are again on the ascendant, at the expense of Jayalalitha.

The election results will also have major repercussions on the already-battered AIADMK-Congress(I) alliance in the state. When it seemed that the DMK might pull off an unpleasant surprise, the Congress(I) hastened to assure the AIADMK of its total support. Said O. Subramaniam, Congress(I) leader in the state Assembly: "For us it is the DMK which is more dangerous. We can't afford to allow the DMK to re-establish itself. It is not in the national interest." But when it came to showing its support, the Congress(I) did it in such a manner that AIADMK leaders became suspicious that it was trying to stake its claim as an alternative to the AIADMK in the absence of MGR. The party first fielded its film star Shivaji Ganeshan in the campaign and

The Dutch founded the great Bank of Amsterdam in 1609—this was the begining of stable banking.

It was not until the Dutch founded the Bank of Amsterdam in 1609, that a relatively stable banking system evolved. That prompted more countries to adopt the new financial system and the English set up the Bank of England in 1694. A number of private banks also commenced operating in England around then.

In India, indigenous bankers were in operation till about 1913, and thereafter western type of banking started gaining ground. The Presidency Banks were the first full fledged banks, of which the Bank of Bengal was charted in 1806 by the East India Company. Private banking companies which started around 1900 with the Swadeshi Movement grew substantially and by 1913, there were 41 Indian private banks in the field.

Today, Banking Industry is the epicentre of a nation's economy, touching varying needs of all people.

Vysya Bank, the premier bank in the private sector, has been an active participant in the transistion of banking in India for over 56 years. The fact that Vysya Bank was founded in 1930, undaunted by severe collapse in the industry, just a few years before and its emergence in a steady manner till date, withstanding the traumatic failure periods for Indian banks during early 1940s, is ample testimony to the vision and commitment of its founding fathers and the intrinsic strength of the Bank.

With its philosophy to innovate, adopt and excel; with its trail blazing records and achievements, Vysya Bank's future is bright, full of better prospects for growth.

Vysya Bank— from a glorious past; towards a brighter future. Come, let us grow together.

later, AICC(I) General Secretary G.K. Moopanar, who spoke with MGR from the same platform. Commenting on this, an AIADMK leader said later: "The Congress(I) wants to sabotage us from within through their stooges. They are offering us lip-sympathy so that the people don't turn against them."

There are hawks in the Congress(I) ranks who advocate treading an independent path to hobbling on the crutches of the regional party. Says Rajya Sabha member Thangabalu: "Sooner or later we have to decide our role in Tamil Nadu politics. A national party cannot remain an appendage of a regional party for ever. There can always be election adjustments." Many Congress(I) leaders feel that the AIADMK's electoral success has reduced their bargaining power. Said a senior state Congress(I) leader: "We were in a better position before the elections but now we are caught between the deep sea and the devil. We must pull out before we are thrown out."

But with the elections three years away, the after-effects of the fiercely-contested by-elections will remain confined to the internal politics of all three parties as long as MGR is around.

MEDICAL HISTORY

Ill Tidings

HIS ailment is as shrouded in secrecy as are his political and administrative actions. Although Tamil Nadu Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran's departure last fortnight for the US for medical treatment appeared to be sudden, arrangements for his trip had been made some weeks in advance. It was, however, kept a closely guarded secret until he himself allowed it to be made public knowledge following his party's victory in the Assembly by-elections. Although the ostensible reason for his visit was a routine medical check-up, the fact that he was accompanied by a team of three doctors—a neurophysician, a nephrologist and a neurosurgeon—has raised fresh controversies over the exact state of MGR's health.

Further, the duration of his stay in New York, 16 days, is longer than likely to be required for a routine check-up. Obviously, this time none of the doctors monitoring MGR's health was willing to take any chances. His failure to recover fully from the damage caused to his brain by a stroke was causing concern, especially after his gruelling campaign during the by-elections. Doctors attending on him had earlier expressed the fear that although he had survived one stroke, over-exertion might cause another. And it happened in July at Trichy when, while addressing a public meeting, MGR suddenly fell down in a faint and regained consciousness only 40 minutes later.

A diabetic for eight years, MGR was admitted to the Apollo Hospital in Madras on October 5, 1984. Although Dr Pratap Reddy, the attending physician, initially announced that he was only suffering from asthma and minor breathlessness, the reality was much more serious. Detailed medical examination had established that in addition to acute breathlessness, his pulse rate was considerably heightened (120 beats per minute), his blood pressure was high, there was a drop in the haemoglobin count in the blood and there was an alarming build-up of fluid in his lungs (acute pulmonary oedema).

It soon became apparent to the doctors that these were symptoms of chronic renal failure as a result of extensive damage to the kidneys caused by diabetes. His medical history revealed that although he had been diagnosed as having diabetes eight years earlier, he had consistently disregarded the dietary restrictions strictly prescribed. Moreover, ECG readings over the previous three years showed that there was partial blockage of some blood vessels. What was worse, the records revealed that he had in fact suffered a minor stroke in July that year but had refused to undergo treatment as this would have made his condition public knowledge.

Instead of keeping the anxious public informed, MGR's personal staff and doctors kept his condition under wraps.

On October 13, he suffered a massive stroke which resulted in extensive aphasia (inability to speak) and paralysis of the right side of the body. The stroke, caused by a temporary loss of blood supply to the brain (ischaemia), damaged the nerve cells in a specific area on the left side which is associated with speech and language functions (called Broca's area in medical parlance). A brain scan confirmed brain damage and showed a patch of dead tissue (cerebral infarct) as well as extensive retention of cerebral fluid indicating continuing kidney failure.

Doctors, anxious to prevent damage to his heart, began treatment to dissolve the arterial blockages identified in earlier examinations. While daily haemodialysis and other decongestive measures succeeded in curbing the retention of fluid in the brain and the lungs, and regular insulin injections helped to control the diabetes, the failure of the kidneys was of prime concern. The doctors opined that a transplant was inevitable.

The transplant was done at New York's Downstate Medical Centre last year. And since his return from New York, following intensive speech therapy, MGR has been able to recover his speech partially. He now suffers from a condition called conduction aphasia which means that while the comprehension of spoken language is normal, he continues to have difficulty in making spontaneous speech.

The kidney transplant was expected to give MGR a new lease of life. However, doctors now feel that recent blood transfusions done at a privately-owned hospital in Madras indicate that there is some malfunctioning of the transplanted kidney—on the life and functioning of which his total recovery depends.

His physicians have announced in New York that the American doctors are satisfied with the improvement in his condition but they are unwilling to disclose the exact nature of his illness or its treatment on which the Government has already spent more than Rs 2 crore.

V.P. SINGH

Trust Trouble

HIS political colleagues were envious of his clean image. Economic offenders and big businessmen cowered before the onslaught of his raiders. But last fortnight when Ravivar, a Calcutta-based Hindi weekly, carried an "expose" on alleged improprieties involving a trust fund managed by his family members, Union Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh, for the first time in his life, found himself in the unenviable position of having to defend himself against corruption charges. The allegations made media headlines and the Lok Dal raised a ruckus in the Uttar Pradesh Vidhan Sabha. The finance minister responded by asking six prominent opposition leaders to investigate the allegations. His supporters attacked the article as an example of big business vendetta against him. Ravivar had featured Singh on its cover with a derisive caption depicting him as a dishonest politician who helped his family in making false claims to prevent their surplus land from being taken away under the Agricultural Land Ceilings Act.

Singh said: "I would have ignored the article. But what surprised me was the fact the magazine had earlier dropped it because they could not find anything against me. Both the editor and the correspondent told me this almost a year ago. I don't know what new facts they have collected now."

Said Uttar Pradesh Chief Minister Bir Bahadur Singh: "I have gone through the records and I can declare that the finance minister has in no way influenced any of the government decisions." Anand Sharma, the Indian Youth Congress president, added: "Any attempt to defame the finance minister will not be tolerated. Tax evaders, smugglers and dishonest people are out to browbeat him by spreading canards." In fact, all the 223 Congress(I) MLA's present in Lucknow on the day of discussion condemned the attack.

The controversy about Singh and the trust—the Daiya Charitable Society whose sole trustee is Singh's mother, Rani Brijraj Kumari—began over a year ago. Certain politicians from Allahabad, with representatives of a prominent industrial group from Kanpur and Calcutta, provided photostat copies of documents to journalists which purported to contain all the facts of the story. "We had the story for a few months but we wanted Singh's version so it was held up for a year," said Ravivar Editor Udayan Sharma. "Moreover, I don't see any reason for Singh being annoyed because nowhere in the story have we alleged that he was responsible for any violations and manipulations, and we have given his point of view as well. Had we not used it, others would have used it."

"Expose" in Ravivar; and (right) Singh

But the story, as written, showed Singh very poorly. The allegations were:

► The trust, by inflating the number of trees on land that belonged to it and was later acquired by the Government, was able to claim an additional Rs 25 lakh in fraudulent compensation.

► It was due to Singh's political clout that the case for the acquisition of surplus land and payment of compensation was not aggressively contested in court by the state Government.

► In order to prevent his own surplus land from being acquired by the state under the ceiling laws, Singh donated 3,041 bighas to the trust.

Surprisingly, however, though the magazine published the allegations, it did not back them up with documented evidence. But Singh—scion of Maunda, a small princely state near Allahabad—was able to make a convincing case that no member of his immediate family could have stood to gain from the trust which was floated in 1954 when Singh had joined the Bhoodan movement. Singh was adopted by the Maunda family and inherited over 2,000 bighas of fertile land, worth more than Rs 5 crore, which he donated to the Bhoodan movement. Singh says he had no right over the land owned by his original family so he decided to part with it. "Once I surrendered ownership of the land belonging to my real parents in favour of the Daiya trust, I forgot about it."

Government records show that the high court had upheld the legality and merits of the compensation claims made by the Daiya trust. The Ravivar story relates to the period of the Janata regime when allegations about the controversial tree count were first raised. In fact, after Singh became Uttar Pradesh chief minister, he ordered the state to contest the high court judgement. This was done but the Supreme Court upheld the lower court's ruling.

> "The magazine had earlier dropped the article because they could not find anything against me. I don't know what new facts they have collected now."
> finance minister

There is little doubt that through raids and prosecutions Singh has made many enemies, several of them in big business, who have been gunning for him. But that is the political price paid by any controversial minister. Stories like the one that appeared in Ravivar—whether deliberately aimed barbs or not—are the politician's lot. But even friends of the finance minister say that Singh, who is zealously protective of his Mr Clean image, may have over-reacted. A story, they say, should have been treated—and rebutted—as a story. But in this case Singh has mounted what has, in effect, become a veritable campaign. The exercise could become counter-productive because the public will begin to wonder why the finance minister doth protest too much.

ALL-INDIA GURUDWARAS ACT

Dangerous Proposal

THE Government of India agrees to consider the formulation of an all-India gurudwara bill. Legislation will be brought forward for this purpose in consultation with the Shiromani Akali Dal, others concerned and after fulfilling all relevant constitutional requirements."

(Clause 5.1 of the Punjab accord, July 24,1985)

IT appears, on the surface,to be among the most innocuous clauses of the Punjab accord. While passions have been aroused over the transfer of Chandigarh and the sharing of the Ravi-Beas waters, there has been almost no noise over Rajiv Gandhi's decision to permit the Akali Dal to devise legislation that would give them virtual control over the gurudwaras of India. But as details of the draft legislation, which is almost ready to be submitted to Delhi, have now become available, warning voices have already started being heard. Says Rajiv Kapur, author of Sikh Separatism: The Politics of Faith: "The proposed all-India gurudwaras act has elements which are designed to extend the Akali Dal's power base to Sikhs throughout the country rather than to ensure the proper management of all Sikh religious institutions."

A special meeting of the Shiromani Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) approved the draft legislation a fortnight ago. The draft is currently with the Legal Department of the Punjab Government where the final touches are being given to it.

In effect what an all-India gurudwaras act will do is to extend the hold of the SGPC, which currently controls only the gurudwaras in Punjab, Himachal Pradesh and Haryana, to all the gurudwaras in the country. In the proposed dispensation, the SGPC will be the apex body at the top of a three-tier system, controlling regional and state boards and the elected local committees which manage gurudwaras on a day-to-day basis. Once the new structure is created the SGPC's annual budget will go up from Rs 12 crore to an estimated Rs 30 crore and the new central religious body would be permitted to give decisions on all controversial matters relating to the 'panth' and its decision would not only be binding but legal. Asks Kapur: "If its decisions clash with the country's secular laws then which decision will be binding on Sikhs?"

Further, since the SGPC's resources have long been utilised for political purposes by the Akali Dal, the proposed act will extend the influence of the Akalis to far beyond the frontiers of Punjab. Considering the SGPC's record of the last four years, when it watched impassively while extremists effectively took over the gurudwaras in Punjab, the proposal for an all-India gurudwaras act could not have come at a worse time. Says Darbara Singh, former Congress(I) chief minister of Punjab: "This is one of the most dangerous clauses of the Punjab accord. I was not consulted by the prime minister before the accord was signed or I would have said so then."

Ostensibly a religious body SGPC's funds and influence have been used by Akalis for political ends.

"The proposal for an all-India gurudwaras act is one of the most dangerous clauses of the Punjab accord."

DARBARA SINGH
former Punjab chief minister.

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

The idea of an all-India gurudwaras act first began to be tossed around in the early '60s when two MP's introduced a private member's bill in Parliament. It died for want of support but the Akalis revived the issue after being swept to power in 1977. It was agreed between the Akali and Janata Party leaders that the all-India act would use as a model the Punjab Sikh Gurudwaras Act of 1925 which created the SGPC. A draft was prepared in 1979, but the Janata government fell before the proposal could be passed.

While the Punjab Act ended the control of 'mahants' over gurudwaras, it also created a religious infrastructure which already had in its soul political possibilities because the Akali Dal was by its very nature a natural ally for the SGPC. Initially, the SGPC was given control over some 300 historic gurudwaras in the Punjab but gradually its control began to extend to more and more shrines and gurudwaras which gave it access to enormous funds so that by 1985 its budget went up to an estimated Rs 12 crore. Money meant power, patronage and control over local gurudwara committees so that emergence of a figure like Gurcharan Singh

...the proposed act will extend SGPC's—and Akalis—control to all the country's gurudwaras.

The Patna Sahib Gurudwara

"The proposed act has elements which are designed to extend the Akali Dal's base to Sikhs throughout the country."

RAJIV KAPUR
author of Sikh Separatism: The Politics of Faith

Tohra, who was not only president of the SGPC for 13 long years but also an Akali member in the Rajya Sabha, was inevitable. Today, though out of the SGPC, he is possibly the most powerful Sikh leader.

With an all-India act, future Tohras could come to dominate Sikh politics not just in Punjab but quite literally from Kashmir to Kanyakumari. And if they have the inclinations of a Bhindranwale then the scale of havoc that they could wreak is terrifying.

Defenders of the proposed new legislation are, however, quick to point out that one of the suggested clauses will forbid future presidents of the SGPC from staying in power for more than two five-yearly terms. Jasbir Singh Ahluwalia, author, civil servant and convenor of the Akali Dal-appointed reviewing committee that has suggested amendments to the earlier draft, said they were trying to persuade the SGPC and the Akali Dal to put a clause which would forbid the SGPC president from holding political office. Asked why the committee had not clearly spelt out that SGPC funds, workers and infrastructure would not in future be used for political purposes, Ahluwalia said: "This is for the (Punjab) Government and the SGPC to decide and even if I had tried I could not have managed to get such a clause included."

Ahluwalia, who was the first to raise a hue and cry about the 1979 draft of the Act, felt that the drafting committee headed by the former chief justice of Punjab and Haryana High Court, Harbans Singh, had not integrated control of the gurudwaras but had, in fact, fragmented it by suggesting nine independent regional boards. He also felt that the Harbans Committee had made other crucial errors in suggesting that all gurudwaras be registered and that sehajdharis (Sikhs with shorn hair) not only be prevented from voting in gurudwara polls but also not be considered Sikhs.

The reviewing committee is headed by Information Minister, Natha Singh Dalam and, apart from Ahluwalia, includes Akali Dal General Secretary, Manjit Singh Khaira, and Gurnam Singh Tir, both of whom had worked on the earlier committee. Ironically, its recommendations are even more fundamentalist. Though it has recognised sehajdharis as Sikhs it has recommended that sehajdharis be prevented from voting in gurudwara elections. Under the Punjab Act sehajdhari Sikhs were not only allowed to vote but also to stand for election. Asked what the objection was to this, when there are a lot more Sikhs with shorn hair than in 1925, Khaira said: "Our experience in past elections has been that a lot of Hindus and even Muslims were put up by both sides as voters. If this were to happen in future then representatives of Hindus could dominate the gurudwaras. Naturally the Sikhs would not like this."

Ahluwalia admits that the provision relating to sehajdharis is a step backwards, particularly when Hindu-Sikh divisions are widening, but said: "Despite my reservations I didn't try to push my point of view because I knew that I would never get the SGPC to agree with me and I didn't want a deadlock on the issue." So while, on one hand, the Akalis talk incessantly of bridging the divisions between Hindus and Sikhs, on the other they are doing everything possible to make the communal identity of the Sikhs even more clearly defined than before.

Akali leaders say that the main objective of an all-India act would be to prevent government interference in Sikh religious matters but they are unable to come up with any concrete instances of such interference other than the government-controlled 'kar seva' of the Akal Takht after Operation Bluestar and Sikhs not being allowed to carry 'kirpans'. Says Khaira: "All we are trying to do is maintain Sikh control over the gurudwaras."

Undeniably, the new legislation will only strengthen an ostensibly religious structure which will be used for political purposes. Since neither the Central Government nor the Opposition have shown much interest in the implications of the legislation, the act could well be passed before its consequences are fully realised, which, in the present communally-surcharged atmosphere, would be disastrous. If the Government now finds it difficult to wriggle out of its commitment to the enactment of the gurudwaras act, the least it must do is to insist on clauses that would prevent an all-India SGPC from being used for political purposes.

PUNJAB

Son Spot

ALLEGATIONS of links with terrorists and smugglers have tainted the reputation of many a minister in the Government of Surjit Singh Barnala (see Investigation: Pg 76), but no such shadow had been cast on the chief minister himself. But the arrest last fortnight of Baljit Singh, who figures in the list of 38 top terrorists and is suspected of involvement in the Muktsar killings, and his subsequent disclosure that he knew, Gaganjeet Singh the ambitious, high-profile son of the Punjab chief minister, have placed Barnala in a spot. Barnala denied Baljit's accusations at a crowded and tense press conference but the rival Akali Dal, seizing the opportunity, was insistent that he should resign.

The arrest came entirely by chance. Baljit Singh, 19, Waryam Singh Khapianwali, 26, another accused in the Muktsar case, and Balwinder Singh Brar, a rich landlord of the Muktsar region, along with two other terrorists, had gone to a house in the quiet and heavily-guarded Sector 7 of Chandigarh to buy a video-cassette recorder (VCR). Finding the owner's wife, Jaswant Kaur, alone in the house, the terrorists changed their mind. They snatched the VCR, hit Jaswant Kaur on the head with the butt of a revolver and fled. Jaswant Kaur raised an alarm and Balwinder and Baljit were finally nabbed after a two-hour chase but the other three escaped. The police seized their Maruti car (registration number: PAD 1), a stolen scooter and two foreign-made revolvers.

Initially, Baljit pretended to be one Kabul Singh of Gurdaspur. It was only after the Gurdaspur police informed the Chandigarh police that there was no Kabul Singh in the village Baljit had mentioned, that they interrogated him more rigorously and made him confess his identity. It was at this stage that the name of the chief minister's son cropped up. The two went on to make startling revelations which established that Gaganjeet had come quite close to the terrorists—too close, in fact, for the chief minister's comfort.

These discoveries only served to confirm some nagging suspicions which had arisen when Gaganjeet had started showing a personal interest in Brar. According to Chandigarh police chief R.K. Ohri, the chief minister's son had repeatedly told the police to treat Brar nicely, as he did not think Brar was involved in any major crime. The police, however, successfully resisted the pressures because of the support they received from Punjab Governor Siddartha Shankar Ray, who is also the Union territory's chief administrator.

The police learnt that Gaganjeet and Brar had met through a common woman friend (whom the police are now hunting for and hope to nab soon). It was also learnt that the Maruti seized from the terrorists belonged to Sarabjit Singh Sekhon, another rich landlord from Abohar who was Gaganjeet's classmate and had assisted Gaganjeet in looking after Barnala's security during elections. The registration number—PAD 1—was recommended by none other than Barnala. The car was often used by Brar, Baljit and Waryam, who flaunted a photocopy of the recommendation to intimidate cops.

Gaganjeet and Barnala: trapped?

BHAWAN SINGH

Baljit also disclosed that he knew Gaganjeet and had met him along with Waryam in Chandigarh. They had grown friendly over the past few months and Brar had even insisted quite a few times that Gaganjeet accompany him in his car. Apparently, Gaganjeet's motive was to win them over for his and his family's safety. Gaganjeet reportedly had also made attempts to get in touch with the Taksal leadership.

However, the Director-General of Punjab Police Julio F. Ribeiro believes that Gaganjeet had merely walked into a trap laid out by the terrorists. In fact, as Baljit has now disclosed, the idea was to kidnap him. Brar's background and his contact with the chief minister's family provided a good cover for their plans. But before anything could happen, the terrorists were arrested. "The adventures of this young boy could have led to a big misfortune," says Ribeiro.

Gaganjeet himself was not available for comment but Barnala seconds the theory put forward by Ribeiro. While the chief minister chided his son for meeting Brar—who, he admitted, had been introduced to him as a sarpanch and had once stayed with him—he denied that Gaganjeet had any connection with Baljit or Waryam. "What connection can we have with the terrorists who are trying to gun us down any moment?" asked Barnala. "I shall not like to buy peace by being friendly with them. If that were so, many doors are open to talk to them." Then, obviously in retaliation to the charges levelled by the General Secretary of Badal's faction of Akali Dal, Sukhdev Singh Dhindsa, and his demand that the chief minister step down, Barnala added: "Everybody knows who is supporting the terrorists. It is Parkash Singh Badal and his Dal making heroes out of these criminals by attending their bhog ceremonies."

While the police carry on their interrogation to extract more details from the wounded Baljit, the whispers within Akali circles grow louder and more persistent. And the factional strife goes yet one step further.

The other side of beautiful Nature isn't so beautiful.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Beautiful Nature. More than anything else. It has inspired poetry, paintings in this world. Unfortunately, there's more to nature than evocative daffodils and sundappled, placid rivers. Floods, for instance. And there's hardly anything poetic about floods. Or, artistic.

And if you've seen the ravages of floods only on TV, you're fortunate. Thousands of people weren't last year. They lost everything they had built up spending the best years of their life, to floods. Angry, flash floods.

And floods never announce themselves. They never will.

GCEL's Flood and Weather Forecast System.

And that's why at GCEL, we have devised a Flood Forecast System. And have installed it for the Central Water Commission in the flood-prone Yamuna River Basin. As a successful U.N.-aided project. The System keeps an alert eye on flood parameter, over a length of 400 kms. From the origin of Yamuna River to the Delhi bridge.

We have built a comprehensive Weather Forecast System too. That collects, collates, analyzes, and transmits data to various centres in the country. To keep a jump ahead of nature. To warn and save the maximum. So when we come to terms with nature, it's a little on our terms.

The Better Technology of GCEL

At Gujarat Communications and Electronics Ltd., our objectives are clear. And simple. Since 1975. That India's future is hi-tech. And every Indian should be part of it. Wherever he or she is in India. So at GCEL, we develop technology that's better and relevant. To help every Indian live a little better.

KARNATAKA

Knotty Problem

WHILE neighbouring Andhra Pradesh has been racked by an agitation sparked off by an increase in reservations, Karnataka is threatened with discord for exactly the opposite reason: a possible decrease in reservations for the backward classes. A 15-member commission appointed by the Ramakrishna Hegde Government, whose report was made public last fortnight, has not only recommended that reservations for backward classes should be reduced from 49 per cent to 27 per cent but has also removed a large number of castes from the list of backward classes. The Government is yet to take a decision on the 1,022-page report, but its mere submission has led to groups of affected castes burning Hegde's effigies and calling for bandhs.

Prominent among the protestors are the politically dominant Vokkaligas. The commission recommended that Vokkaligas be de-recognised as a backward caste. Vokkaliga leaders from the ruling Janata Party have publicly demanded that the report be scrapped. Declared H.L. Thimme Gowda, former minister and close aide of the powerful Vokkaliga Irrigation Minister H.D. Deve Gowda: "The report cannot be accepted as it has inherent contradictions." Three other senior Vokkaliga leaders in the party, D.B. Chandre Gowda, Jeevaraj Alwa and H.T. Krishnappa told a hurriedly-called press conference that they had brought the report's "in-built dichotomies" to Hegde's notice.

State Vokkaligara Sangha President K.R. Rame Gowda promised to lead a state-wide agitation against the commission's report, saying: "The report is based on wrong statistics and is also full of glaring mistakes." Vokkaliga students in scores of towns and villages across the state boycotted classes and took out processions and even beat up a deputy commissioner in Mandya. What has especially irked the Vokkaligas is the commission's declaration that Brahmins are more backward than Vokkaligas. Law Minister A. Lakshmisagar, who belongs to the backward community of potters, has called the agitations as "needless and harmful"—a clear indication that there are sharp differences in the Janata Party on the issue.

Deve Gowda, whose long-held differences with Hegde were reportedly being sorted out, has not said anything openly but he has made no secret of his feelings on this issue. Three months ago, addressing a state-level convention of a backward caste in Bangalore, he said it would be "inexcusable" if all Vokkaligas did not unitedly oppose any move to drop them from the list, adding: "I will not stay in office for a minute if backward classes suffer under the Janata Government." The present formula is based on the report of the commission headed by L.G. Havanur and implemented by the Devaraj Urs government in 1977.

Headed by T. Venkataswamy, a retired secretary to the state legislature, the commission conducted a house-to-house "socio-educational-economic" survey of 3.6 crore people with the help of 44,572 enumerators. Elaborate questionnaires were sent to 14,000 people (only 686 responded) and to 281 heads of departments. The data was fed into a computer and the findings were a revelation.

- Out of 250 castes recommended as backward classes by Havanur, 137 are synonyms of some other castes in the list and therefore repetitive.
- Among those listed as castes were the Aryan race, the Konkani language and surnames like Hegde and Joshi.
- Twenty-six of the castes listed have a population of less than 300 each, six less than 10.

Not surprisingly, a long list of 81 recommendations followed, the other important ones being the reduction of backward classes eligible for jobs from 185 to 31 and the abolition of the "backward special group" of economically weaker sections irrespective of castes, created by Urs, who enjoy 15 per cent reservations (reason: affluent sections were cornering these benefits with "false" income certificates). Justifying his cuts, Venkataswamy argued that deprived sections should be supported with reservations "only till they learn to stand on their legs," and added: "Maybe a time will come when no reservations will be necessary."

All this gave enough material to the Congress(I) to issue a flood of statements. Said a sarcastic K.N. Nage Gowda, a Vokkaliga Congress(I) MLC: "If a computer can determine backward classes, Hegde might as well be replaced by a super computer to rule the state." Senior Janata leaders are apprehensive that the Congress(I) will exploit the confusion caused by the report among the backward classes in the local body elections in November. As it is, the submission of a memorandum by 90 MLA's expressing dissatisfaction over the ministry's size—the third in the last six months—has got Hegde worried. While Hegde maintains that his government has an "open mind" and would allow a public debate before accepting or rejecting the report, it is clear that it has landed him with more problems than he could have visualised when he set up the commission in 1983 to honour a commitment to the Supreme Court given by his predecessor, Gundu Rao.

The computer industry is today the fastest growing industry in the world.

And for good reason.

Everywhere, in offices and homes, hospitals and schools, factories and institutions — the computer has proved itself an invaluable efficiency tool.

Now, you too can be a successful business owner in this high-profit industry, by opening a franchise outlet of India's first and most successful computer retail chain.

Computer Point.

A public limited company with its Corporate Office at Bangalore and Showrooms in Bangalore, Bombay, Madras, and New Delhi Computer Point has already established quite a reputation with consumers and manufacturers of computers and computer-related products.

It was the first to introduce the 'computer supermarket' concept in India — in which various brands of computers and their accessories are all stocked under one roof.

Today, Computer Point represents most of India's top computer organisations like PSI, Siva, TCS, Wipro, as well as major international names like Dysan, Lotus and MicroPro. TERRORISTS

The Political Nexus

ONE of the most vexatious controversies in Punjab relates to the repeated allegation that senior state politicians have links with extremists and smugglers. Both Union Home Minister Buta Singh and Congress(I) Vice-President Arjun Singh have aired this charge repeatedly, and what they say is echoed by leaders of the Left parties in Punjab. The Akalis stoutly deny all the allegations. Special Correspondent SHEKHAR GUPTA toured Punjab along with Senior Correspondent GOBIND THUKRAL to investigate the charges. Their report:

SMUGGLING has been a perfectly acceptable part of life in the border districts of Punjab for many years. But now, with the advent of terrorism and the undisputable evidence of arms and instructions being smuggled in from across the border by professional, trans-border couriers, the nexus between terrorists, smugglers and politicians has acquired a dangerous new dimension.

"The terrorists in Punjab have made their own rules," says Julio Ribeiro, director-general of police. "Smugglers and terrorists have a symbiotic relationship and, unfortunately, many politicians get caught in this." Adds Sarbdeep Singh Virk, deputy inspector general of the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF) in Amritsar: "With their criminal manpower the smugglers provide muscle to the terrorists' muzzle power."

This muscle and muzzle power is now wielded under the protective umbrella of a legion of politicians, from both the Akali Dal and the Congress(I), who jump into the fray the moment a smuggler, or a terrorist close to the smugglers, is caught or killed. Some recent examples:

- Revenue Minister Major Singh Uboke's backing of Major Singh, sarpanch of Marri Megha village, booked under the Conservation of Foreign Exchange and Prevention of Smuggling Act (COFEPOSA) for smuggling narcotics and arms.
- Agriculture Minister Harbhajan Singh Sandhu's backing of Hardip Singh Shakriwala, jailed under COFEPOSA for supplying smuggled arms to extremists and defence secrets to Pakistan.
- An Akali MP's and a senior Congress(I) leader's alleged role in the mysterious release from jail of Waryam Singh, who has subsequently become the prime suspect in the Muktsar bus killings.

Even Chief Minister Surjit Singh Barnala asserted at a recent press conference that "of the 46 major smugglers in the border districts, only six are with us while the rest are with the Congress(I)." By way of rationalisation, Finance Minis-

Sandhu with Barnala: controversial

Agriculture Minister Sandhu is accused of backing Shakriwala, held for spying and supplying arms to extremists.

"We have to explain police action. Suppose the whole panchayat says an arrest is not just, what can we do?"

Shamindar with Bhindranwale: pressure tactics

Shamindar Singh, Akali MP, pressurised police to release Waryam Singh, later said to be involved in Muktsar killings.

Shamindar says that his were "inadvertent recommendations" and denies any personal link with Waryam.

ter Balwant Singh added: "Life is very different in the border districts where smuggling is an integral part of politics. Some MLA's from these areas cannot keep away from them." Similarly, Sandhu, who has often clashed with the police, argued that the link is overplayed: "Terrorists do not just operate along the border, they use the whole state." But he qualified: "Only those smugglers who deal in arms help extremists."

The police and intelligence agencies refuse to accept these rationalisations. Says Ribeiro: "We have no doubt that smugglers give arms and information to extremists, and help them in their passage across the border." To securitymen, the terrorists' umbilical support link across the border can be slashed only after smuggling is stopped.

It should cause no surprise that most politicians accused of having links with extremists or smugglers hail from the border districts of Amritsar and Gurdaspur. But the nexus has come under a fair bit of pressure lately, with Ribeiro leading the law and order machinery in a campaign that is unprecedented in its ruthlessness. The result is an escalating row between several Akali ministers and the administration. While Barnala labours to defend his controversial colleagues, the Centre has taken note of several reports from security agencies.

Last February, police officer Virk wrote two letters to B.S. Dhaliwal, the then director-general of police, charging ministers Uboke and Sandhu and several other politicians, including the Congress(I)'s Surinder Singh Kairon, with backing criminals. He said political pressure had made it impossible for the police to function and sought instructions on how to deal with the problem. Dhaliwal took no notice but as soon as Ribeiro came there was action. He conveyed the complaint to Barnala and, referring Virk's letter to all the senior police officers, asked them to report other such instances to him. Says Ribeiro: "You cannot fight the nation's battle without ignoring these petty people." That marked the beginning of his troubles with several Akali politicians. Virk explains their discomfiture by arguing that "Smuggling is the politicians' Achilles heel. You touch it and they squirm."

Following the circular were a series of communications from Ribeiro to both the state and Central governments, mentioning specific instances of politicians' dismay with smugglers and terrorists. The letters also mention the highly questionable manner in which Waryam Singh of Muktsar was able to get released from jail in May this year. While the police had decided to re-arrest Waryam Singh as soon as he was bailed out, he was released by the jail staff well after working hours.

The escape has been the subject of an inquiry and Ribeiro, in his letters to the Government, has named the politicians who are suspected to be involved. Ribeiro firmly states that certain politicians had spoken to Faridkot Police Superintendent Rajan Gupta, asking for Waryam Singh's release, and when "that did not work, approached the deputy commissioner." The letter points at Shamindar Singh, the local Akali Dal MP, and Harcharan Singh Brar, former Haryana governor and husband of Congress(I) leader Gurbrinder Kaur Brar. Says Gupta: "Political recommendations on behalf of suspects are common. The Akalis take the lead, with the Congress(I) close behind."

Saiyanwala: giving shelter

Local Bodies Minister Saiyanwala is accused of harbouring Sabraon, linked to Gattapasha.

"Gattapasha is a known extremist but I can say that Sabraon has nothing to do with them (extremists)."

SHAMINDER says that his involvement may have been to the extent of "inadvertent recommendations" and adds defensively: "Once the district police chief stated that he is a dreaded terrorist, I said please deal with him the way you feel like." He also denies personal links with Waryam: "There is nothing more sacred to us Sikhs than the Guru Granth Sahib. I can put my hand on it and say that I never even saw him." Similar denials come from the Brars.

Meanwhile, Local Bodies Minister Mohinder Singh Saiyanwala has come out against what he calls the "indiscriminate manner in which the police and the CRPF are killing young Sikh boys in fake encounters." But police officials say that his sympathies for the terrorists go beyond this. He is accused by the police of harbouring in his Chandigarh home a man called Balbir Singh Sabraon, said to be an associate of Baldev Singh Gattapasha, a well-known terrorist of Saiyanwala's Ferozepur area. Saiyanwala however asserts that "Baldev Singh Gattapasha is a well-known extremist, but Sabraon has nothing to do with him."

Besides, intelligence reports say that his son Harprit Singh was one of the main organisers of the bhog ceremony of two young suspected terrorists killed in an encounter with the CRPF in July. "At the bhog ceremony Harprit said that the Sikhs were going to exact revenge for the death of the two youngsters, and within a week the Muktsar killings took place," said a senior police officer.

Saiyanwala says that he did speak against the police. "Those two boys were killed just because they happened to be younger brothers of Harbhajan Singh Mand (a well-known terrorist who had been killed in Amritsar in March)," he says, suggesting that "these two were too young to be extremists." He says he has no complaints now that an inquiry has been ordered into the encounter and explains that his son had no choice but to visit the families of the encounter-victims: "I asked him to go well before the ceremony, say his prayers and return before Badal and others opposed to us reached there."

Similar instances, involving other politicians, are available from other districts as well. In Gurdaspur last fortnight, the police arrested suspected terrorist Ajit Singh of Bhugtala village and recovered a Sten gun and over a 100 bullets from him. The arrest brought Buta Singh, an influential Akali and father of Ajit Singh (the president of the Bara Baba Nanak Market Committee and a close associate of Nirmal Singh Kahlon, a minister of state), in confrontation with the district police. He was joined in his protest to J.P. Birdi, the police superintendent, by Kahlon but Birdi stuck to his guns, saying that the two were wanted for a shoot-out near Batala. Kahlon, whose own house at Fatehgarh Churian, the terrorist stronghold near the border, had been attacked by the terrorists

MAJOR SINGH UBOKE

"Smugglers worked for me"

MAJOR Singh Uboke, Punjab's revenue minister had virtually no claim to fame till the other day. He had deserted the army as a havildar in the Army Education Corps in the early 1950s to join the late Master Tara Singh's Punjabi Suba movement. But only now has Uboke suddenly sprung into prominence with his opposition to Julio Ribeiro, Punjab police chief, and his alleged support to the smugglers and terrorists of his constituency. What sets him apart is his candour in not denying some of the charges and his unconventional views on smuggling. Excerpts from an interview with Special Correspondent SHEKHAR GUPTA:

Q. Is the allegation that you are protecting smugglers and extremists in the state true?

A. You have got to understand the facts of life. I have nothing to do with extremists. The smugglers, on the other hand, present a different problem. How can I keep away from smugglers when a large number of my constituents are smugglers? I come from a border constituency where smuggling has been an integral part of life and politics for many decades. I cannot change all that now. I have to eat with the people of my village.

Q. Is it true that some of these smugglers are your political associates?

A. I am not denying that several of these smugglers worked for me in the election. But they worked on their own. They also voted for me. I could not have stopped them from doing that. I said I won't take you to the polling booth but if you want to support me please do, by all means. But when dozens of them approached me with offers of money I drew a line and said no very firmly.

Q. Don't you think that a responsible politician like you should have no contact at all with people indulging in a crime as serious as smuggling?

A. What is smuggling after all? It is the consequence of our excessive, misplaced idealism. In the quest for high morals and ideals we have resorted to controls on liquor, opium and various other things. Where such controls exist, smugglers find a market.

Q. Several responsible police officials say that well-known extremist Sukhdev Singh Sakhira used to roam about in your official car in the Tarn Taran area. Is that correct?

A. I know Virk (S.S. Virk, the former Amritsar police chief) has been going around saying that I was carrying Sakhira along with me. Why did he not arrest him, or me then? Tarn Taran was in his district. Sakhira roamed about freely in Amritsar, Tohra and Badal spoke to him on the phone regularly and yet no one in the police had the courage to catch him. Ring up Virk and ask him to deny that.

Uboke: charging the police

Revenue Minister Uboke is accused of backing Major Singh, held for smuggling arms.

"I may have got a memorandum from somebody and sent it to the police. I am more careful now."

Q. Couldn't it be because, as the police say, they could not have arrested someone who appeared to be so close to a minister?

A. Don't be ridiculous. This great respect for minister saab does not stop police officers from writing official letters against me. Nor does it stop them from putting intelligence agents after me. They even withdrew the police guard from my residence. I told Barnala I don't care. Just give us arms and we will look after our own security.

Q. Yet is it proper for you to go on pleading the cases of well-known smugglers of your area?

A. I support people fighting repression. The police can today put a two-year COFEPOSA warrant on anyone without asking questions. My villagers will not accept my telling them that just because I have become a minister I will not speak for them. They say saadey pind da vazir hai te ladna tey nahiyon chhad dawange assi? (just because the minister hails from our village you think we will stop fighting for ourselves?)

Q. Why have you been so critical of Julio Ribeiro?

A. Mine is a basic problem. Does Ribeiro take orders from the Government or not? He says he does not care about MLA's and jathedars. Is he superior to Barnala's Government? Then he makes silly claims like smashing the Khalistan capital with Operation Mand.

Q. Why were you critical of Operation Mand?

A. I think I made a mistake by calling it just Operation Fraud. I should actually have called it operation pakhand (charade). They took hundreds of troops, helicopters, guns and boats. But what happened? They did not even succeed in wetting an extremist's beard. A lot of the Mand area falls under my constituency, and if I do not know what a fraud the whole thing was, and do not speak out, who would?

Q. What about you and your son's involvement in a land-grab attempt with the help of Gurbachan Singh Manochahal, member of the 'Khalistan' panthic committee?

A. This is the police raj and the police can say anything. Why don't they investigate and catch the guilty?

Q. Is there any effective way of fighting terrorism in Punjab?

A. You cannot handle the terrorist problem through repression. No matter what you do, please give up the hope that these youngsters will surrender. You can have peace only by somehow involving them in negotiations.

in April this year, denies any connection saying: "How can I be suspected of having links with extremists when I was myself nearly killed by them?"

The Akalis seek refuge in the argument that the triangular nexus was a creation of the Congress, which cultivated smuggling families in the border districts. "You put the blame on us but ignore the Congress(I)," says Balwant Singh, pointing to the arrest of state Congress(I) General Secretary Harcharan Singh Hero's son Harpreet Singh from his farmhouse close to Ferozepur, on the suspicion of harbouring terrorists.

The state Government initially claimed that four hardcore terrorists had been hiding in the farmhouse and that the police recovered from Harpreet two two-wheelers allegedly stolen by terrorists. But he was later discharged without bail by a Tarn Taran magistrate. Now Gurbachan Jagat, deputy inspector general (intelligence) has been asked to investigate how he managed to get away so easily. The Congress(I) leaders say it is vendetta. Said Beant Singh, PCC(I) president: "This is an attempt by the Akalis to hide their own sins."

But the cases of some of the most prominent smugglers in Amritsar are an entirely different saga. The recent crackdown has seen 40 of them—invariably members of their village panchayats—jailed under COFEPOSA. However, so audacious are the suspected smugglers in their claims to political patronage that the evidence of this relationship reposes in several government files.

One case recorded in the Home Department files at Chandigarh is that of Ajit Singh Burj, who was arrested by the Amritsar police under the National Security Act on charges of spying. The grounds of detention mention that among the documents recovered from him is a map of the newly-constructed Gharinda anti-tank drain near the border. He is also charged with bringing weapons and instructions from Pakistani agents Ghafoor Ali and Daddi, to be given to the extremists "under directions to be used by them in their struggle for the formation of Khalistan...and also to weaken the security and defence of India in case of an attack by Pakistan...in conspiracy with foreign agents and extremist leaders."

Burj wrote to the chief minister protesting against his arrest. In his representation he claimed that he had been the chairman of the black samiti of Gandhi-wind village for over 35 years, and the sarpanch of his village for 20 years, and that he was thus a respectable person. As further evidence of his "respectability" he flaunted his links with the Akalis. Burj asserted: "The petitioner also extended substantial financial help to Shiromani Akali Dal for the dharam yudh morcha."

That the chief minister was not exactly embarrassed by the claims is evident from the Government's response to the representation. On May 16, the Home Department asked the police to re-assess the evidence. A flurry of reminders followed, but the police stuck to their guns.

Kahlon: pleading innocence

Nirmal Singh Kahlon protested to the police about the arrest of Ajit Singh, a suspected terrorist.

"How can I be suspected of having links with extremists when I was nearly killed by them."

A second case in the files concerns Ajit Singh Dariya, who was detained on March 25 this year under COFEPOSA on charges of being in direct contact with a well-known Pakistani smuggler called Bakshi Mussalman. Arrested once earlier, shortly after Operation Bluestar, he was released at the intervention of Arjun Singh, then governor of Punjab. Sant Longowal had written a letter to Arjun Singh, giving a clean chit to Dariya and seeking his release. Since this letter was the last that Longowal wrote before he was assassinated, for Arjun Singh it became his last wish and was duly granted. But Dariya was held by the police again.

His son Bakshish Singh filed a representation on April 3 and claimed that Dariya is an Akali Dal worker and that "the services of my father and honesty of his purpose are well known to revered Sant Harchand Singh Longowal who wrote a strong letter in favour of my father and had him released earlier". A frustrated Virk, finding he could do nothing to keep Dariya in jail, suggested in a letter to the Government that he could be released "if he tendered an unqualified apology and promised to keep off smuggling." The formalities were quickly completed.

A third case in the Government's files concerns Hardip Singh Shakriwala, a member of the Shakri brothers' gang who was arrested on October 10, 1984, over three months after the detention orders were issued. He was detained on the grounds that on April 5, 1984, he went past the Border Security Force (BSF) picket at Pahari and met a Pakistani smuggler called Nazir Ahmed. From Ahmed he collected three pistols and 4 kg of opium. He gave the pistols to Surinder Singh, a known extremist, in the Golden Temple.

Shakriwala was also accused of giving the Pakistanis details of the movement of Indian army tanks and vehicles, and of entering into a conspiracy with Gurbux Singh and Thakur Singh to sketch the location of units around the Amritsar cantonment. Because of his political connections he was let off, but fresh orders for his arrest were issued and he was back in jail on March 25, 1986.

In his representation, Shakriwala too made claims to respectability—having been the "chairman of Land Mortgage Bank at Tarn Taran for four years, sarpanch of Shakri village for several years and head of the Tarn Taran Truck Union for six years." Claiming that he had "been arrested for turning down the undue demands of police officers," he also said he was too busy looking after the "day-to-day" functioning of the Land Mortgage Bank to be smuggling.

His case was backed by Harbhajan Singh Sandhu. The police were asked to inquire again, and their findings showed that in three years Shakriwala had attended the bank's office for 22 days.

Minister Sandhu is not embarrassed by his defence of Shakriwala. "Hardip Singh is not an ordinary person. We have to explain the police's actions to people.

We go to villages, and suppose the whole panchayat stands up and says that a man's arrest is not just, what can we do?"

The files are full of dozens of similar cases on documents stamped 'secret'. Akali Dal Press Secretary Surjit Singh Sokhey has been pleading the case of another suspected smuggler called Pamma from Madokey village. It was on his intervention that the police did not arrest him earlier this year. Though Sokhey had promised to present Pamma whenever the police wanted him, he has now backed out. The Amritsar police has already written to the state Government to ask him to keep his promise but Sokhey, who has been commissioned by the state Government at Rs 2,500 per month to write Longowal's biography, is unrelenting. "I am not for smuggling, but I certainly am for innocent people whom I know," he asserts.

Another recent instance is the recovery of 19 kg of contraband gold hidden in a truck belonging to Gullu, son of Harinder Singh, a former Bhindranwale bodyguard, in Basarke village in Uboke's constituency. The police complain that Uboke has been interfering with the process of law. Uboke on the other hand insists that he is only exposing corrupt policemen. "They found gold all right," he says, but adds; "on the other hand, the police kept at least 30 gold biscuits with themselves out of the 200 caught, and because I brought it to Barnala's notice, the officers call me an extremist."

The latest charge against Uboke, from the Faridkot police chief, is that he has been pressing him to release Bakhtawar Singh, an army subedar arrested for espionage. Bakhtawar has now been handed over to the army. Uboke pleads innocence: "I don't remember anything. I may have got a memorandum from somebody and sent it to police with some instructions," he says. "Now I take no chances."

WHILE the acerbic revenue minister (see interview) defends himself against these charges, his son Sajjan Singh, a junior clerk in Guru Nanak Dev University, has been accused of trying to grab a 35-acre plot of land belonging to a housewife, Paramjit Kaur, in Dhepai village on the outskirts of Amritsar city with the help of Gurbachan Singh Manochahal, one of the five-member "Khalistan" panthic committee.

The matter came to a head on March 29 this year when gangsters attacked the farm and fired scores of bullets claiming that the land was theirs. The police later registered a case against six persons, including Sajjan Singh. Apart from him, the others were also charged under the Anti-terrorist Act. The minister's son is still at large.

Paramjit Kaur and her husband Kashmir Singh Randhawa, who have written dozens of memoranda to the prime minister and to Ribeiro accusing Uboke of protecting the attackers, are scared to even talk about the extremist angle to the episode. Says Kashmir Singh: "If we haven't been chewed up between Uboke's jaws it is thanks to upright people like Mr Ribeiro." His wife charges that the attackers had the backing of "people whose names we cannot even mention for fear of our lives."

Hero: son's involvement

State Congress(I) General Secretary Hero's son was held for harbouring terrorists.

Congress(I) leaders claim the arrest of Hero's son is part of an Akali vendetta to hide their own sins.

Uboke dismisses the episode in his characteristic style. "Yes it is true that the cultivators had gone to Manochahal. But they claimed the land was theirs and this woman, who is related to Satnam Singh Bajwa, that big Congress(I) land-grabber, was trying to take it away," he says, and denies that he or his son were involved.

Uboke has also been accused of trying to give undue protection to his personal assistant (PA), Hazara Singh's son Major Singh, charged with attempt to murder in the case of a shootout near Kiran Chowk in Amritsar in May this year. Uboke denies the charge. But he did try to bring about a rapprochement between the families of his PA and the firing victims at a meeting which the police had tape recorded.

Another senior Akali leader in the firing line is Sandhu, who is accused of protecting smugglers with extremist links. "He is the best example of the kinds of problems we face," says a bureaucrat, referring to the fact that in the police records the minister is a proclaimed offender and carries on in power nevertheless. According to the records he had been declared a proclaimed offender by Tara Singh, chief judicial magistrate at Amritsar in October 1985 in an assorted case of conspiracy and cheating.

The charge was that Sandhu Transport Company and the Kisan Workers Transport Company, partly owned by Sandhu, had been discovered running buses under fictitious number plates to avoid paying tax. Some of these buses were caught bearing registration numbers allotted to scooters, tractors and other non-commercial vehicles. Sandhu argues that the case carries no stigma as far as his political career is considered. "The case is against some private companies and personally there are no charges against me. I am not guilty," he says.

The problem in Punjab is that the chronic smuggler-politician nexus which was ignored in the past is now manifested in the most dangerous form possible—a vicious triangle with the extremists at its apex. Even Barnala, while stating that the problem has been blown out of proportion, admits that "the nexus which bred crime earlier now threatens national security", but asserts that he has asked his police not to bother about political interference. Says he: "We have to resist all pressure and break these links, whatever it means." But he is hamstrung by the precarious nature of his hold on power. He cannot afford to annoy people capable of pulling the plug: be they errant Akali ministers or influential Congress(I) politicians. And since there is no prospect of that situation changing, Ribeiro and his fellow-officers cannot expect any respite from the political fallout that the increased tempo of anti-terrorist operations will generate.

10,000 facts about Otis that are none of your business.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

An average elevator has over five thousand components. And the last thing you need to worry about is one of them going wrong.

Which is why we recommend an Otis. Because every Otis elevator you step into has all its components thoroughly tested. Not once, but twice.

Making it the only elevator in the country to go through ten thousand tests.

For example, the elevator car is made of steel that meets standards laid down by Otis internationally. (It's tested to 0.5 microns.) And if it survives this rigorous scrutiny, we subject it to chemical analysis.

Followed by X-ray studies to weed out weak spots and hidden cracks.

So that 15 years later, on your way up to the 7th floor, your elevator won't let you down.

The button you press activates a motor that's been designed and made by Otis. From quality components made by Otis. Which explains why noise and vibration levels in an Otis are almost non-existent.

The doors that slide shut behind you operate with split second precision. Because if they're geared to open for 20 seconds, they'll do just that. Not a second less or more. Our engineers have spent 20 years perfecting them.

And if your Otis happens to have the new servodrive technology, it achieves the impossible: It looks after itself.

The servodrive continuously monitors speed, acceleration and deceleration. Correcting any deviations. And totally eliminating jerks.

All of which explains why you've travelled thousands of times in an Otis without giving it a second thought.

And frankly, we'll have it no other way. Because worrying about an elevator is none of your business. It's entirely ours.

Temple Trouble

TWO of Britain's foremost Hindu communities have been making news recently. The first concerns the Bhaktivedanta Manor belonging to the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON). The manor was donated to ISKON in 1973 by former Beatle George Harrison to be used as its main training centre in the UK. Although Britain has numerous Hindu temples, Bhaktivedanta Manor is the only math where students are trained as Hindu priests, teachers and missionaries. A mock-Tudor manor house built in the 1880s, it has 17 acres of park-land, pastures, gardens and an attractive lake and also has an impeccably-maintained shrine which attracts thousands of Hindus from all over the UK on religious days. This year, however, a cloud hung over the Janmashtami festival. The Tory-run Hertsmere Borough Council has decided to issue an enforcement order to stop all visits to the manor—thereby denying Hindus access to the Krishna shrine. The council argues that ISKON flouted a 1982 agreement by which it was agreed that not more than 1,000 devotees would visit the shrine except on six festival days. Now the shrine attracts many times that number. An energetic court battle is in the offing.

Bhaktivedanta Manor: restrictions

The other controversy concerns the Swaminarayan Mission's plans to build in north-west London a fabulous temple in marble—the biggest of its kind outside India—on grounds acquired from the famous Harrow School. The project is held up since the mission is battling against environmentalists, local residents, World Wildlife Fund activists and other opponents. A ministerial decision is awaited. Both cases have created an uproar amongst the Hindus of Britain.

Prize List

THE autumnal ritual in Britain that sets the literary world alight has already begun in earnest this year: predicting the short-list for the country's most prestigious literary award—the Booker Prize. For publishers and authors it is vital to feature in the short-list. A nomination on the short-list can create a demand anywhere between 7,000 and 15,000 extra hardbacks. This year's entries are a record 120—17 more than last year, and already several leading literary critics have speculated in print about its merits. Indian authors, who have done well in the past, are amongst those discussed. One critic expressed surprise that Vikram Seth's The Golden Gate had not made the list so far since the publishers (Faber) had the canny hope that "it cannot fail to tickle the fancy of the poet-chairman of the judges panel, Anthony Thwaite". However, Amitav Ghosh's The Circle of Reason has found itself in the first list.

Sanjeev Saith

September 24 is when the five-member panel will announce the short-list, so Seth still has time. But he and Ghosh have formidable competitors this year; Anthony Burgess, Fay Weldon, Piers Paul Read, Beryl Bainbridge, P.D. James, Timothy Mo, Paul Bailey, Julian Barnes and Kingsley Amis.

Gurbani Line

EVER since its privatisation, British Telecom has launched numerous gimmicks to attract subscribers and enhance revenues. The gimmicks range from joke lines to sex lines. Now a Sikh gurudwara in Southall has, in partnership with British Telecom, set up a hotline to God—dial-a-prayer telephone for those seeking religious succour. The Ramgarhia Gurudwara in Southall recently unveiled what it believes is the first recorded message giving religious readings in Britain. By dialling a number, Sikhs in the UK can hear a recording by Professor Satnam Singh Sethi reciting any one of the 5,850 verses of the Granth Sahib. A gurudwara spokesman maintains that the "Gurbani line" was intended for those Sikhs feeling lonely and depressed who needed spiritual comfort. The gurudwara was specially interested in linking up with hospitals and British prisons where there are Sikh inmates.

Maxwell's Game

THE cause of the Commonwealth Games is being championed by media baron Robert Maxwell of the Mirror group of newspapers. Maxwell, who, as chairman of the games put in £2 million, has now embarked on a crusade to recoup part of the £3.8 million losses from boycotting nations. He seems to have made Rajiv Gandhi a special target. A recent issue of The Daily Mirror carried a bizarre quiz. It asked: in which capital did the army recently march through its streets to cow down its citizens? Which country's police forces opened fire on its citizens to stop them from rioting? The answer: New Delhi, India. But there is a problem here for Maxwell. His papers belong to Britain's crop of sex-and-crime tabloids which are hardly intended for serious readers of international news.

Maxwell: picking on Rajiv

UK INDIANS

Political Ambitions

DESPITE the fact that there are constituencies in Britain where Asian votes are strategically located to swing the balance in their favour, not a single Asian candidate has got into the House of Commons since 1924. But recent developments have now motivated the Asian community to mobilise itself politically with an eye on the coming general elections. A report on their prospects.

SINCE 1924, the British House of Commons has remained uncompromisingly all-white. Not a single member of Britain's substantial ethnic minority—either Asian or Afro-Caribbean—has got into Westminster since Shapurji Saklatvala was elected as a Communist candidate over 60 years ago.

This unedifying record in "multi-racial" Britain now stands poised for permanent change in the next general elections when perhaps as many as five "black" candidates could become members of the British Parliament. For a variety of reasons none of them could be from the Indian subcontinent—the five with the most propitious chances happen to be Afro-Caribbeans.

Although there are constituencies across Britain where the hefty Asian votes are strategically located to swing the balance in favour of an Asian candidate, out of the half-a-dozen prospective parliamentary candidates of Indian background—unlike their Afro-Caribbean comrades—none stand an unerring, sure-fire chance of being elected to the next House of Commons. Partly because some of them are not representing constituencies which are designated in local political parlance as "winnable" and partly because in safe constituencies like Southall—an impregnable rampart of Indian immigrants—ambitious candidates are locked in a mutually ruinous, fratricidal combat to represent the constituency, paving the way for an ageing, white, sitting MP to be renominated (see box).

> Race relations lobbyists argue that if true representation of the minorities is to be accurately reflected based on their population, there ought to be 25 to 30 MP's when there are none at the moment.

Despite being better endowed with greater resources and numerical superiority, the Indian community in general, unlike their Afro-Caribbean colleagues have embodied less cogent participatory zeal to harness their collective strength into a powerful lobby since they are more often engaged in disputatious and obstructionist conflict. The schisms are patterned not on uncluttered ideological debate but over sectarian, casteist and communal issues.

The import of the intrusive and incoherent politics of India into Britain have hardly helped their cause for solidarity. A stream of recent studies on the composition of the ethnic minority vote has convinced many an independent observer of Britain's changing political face that the "black vote" could be vital in a number of parliamentary constituencies. The last available figures—the 1981 census—reveal that the ethnic minority population was a little over 2.2 million out of which 55 per cent are of Asian origin—47 per cent from the Indian subcontinent. Of the 47 per cent, 30.5 per cent are from India (the largest community being Gujaratis, followed by Sikhs), 13.4 per cent from Pakistan and 2.9 per cent from Bangladesh.

Despite their numbers—5 per cent of the overall British population—the fact that not a single member of the ethnic minority has found representation in the British Parliament for the last 62 years in a country professing "multi-racialism" is seen as an ignoble stigma. Their representation in mainstream British politics is still very small, though their participation in elections at the local borough level, has steadily increased.

Race relations lobbyists argue that if true representation of the minorities is to be accurately reflected based on their population, there ought to be 25 to 30 MP's when there are none at the moment and perhaps five after the next general elections.

The growing significance of the minority vote has not been lost on Britain's political parties, especially the Labour Party and the Social Democratic Party (SDP)-Liberal alliance and they have made determined efforts to woo the "blacks" and to encourage their participation in the political process. The term "blacks" is all-pervasive here: it encompasses both

Afro-Caribbeans as well as Asians. The all-embracing term "blacks" includes Africans, West Indians, Indians, Pakistanis, Bangladeshis, Sri Lankans, and others.

The reasons leading to the dalliance between the political parties and the hitherto disenfranchised "blacks" is self-explanatory. It is estimated that there are about 100 parliamentary constituencies in the UK where the ethnic minority population is more than 10 per cent.

What are the motivating factors which spurs Asians to mobilise themselves politically? In dozens of interviews with INDIA TODAY, Indian-origin councillors and prospective parliamentary candidates across Britain cite several fundamental reasons. Foremost among them is racial disadvantage and racial discrimination. Racial attacks and racial harassment are facts of life for present day black Britons. For all the elevating debates and race relations' committees of recent years, a recent study published by the Runnymede Trust alleges racial attacks had in fact increased and strongly criticised the "minimal" and "cosmetic" responses of the police and local authorities. The race relations industry in this country is of the unshakable belief that racism is institutional as expressed in immigration and nationality laws, educational institutions, churches, press and media, trade unions and within Britain's political parties.

The presence of National Front and other anti-immigrant candidates in elections has only helped increase the awareness of blacks of key political issues contributing towards their zeal for political activity. Besides race relations and immigration, other vital issues confronting the new breed of Asian politicians are equal employment opportunities, better housing and educational facilities.

For the Indians, their battles are just beginning: there are at present five parliamentary hopefuls: Keith Vaz (Leicester East), Praful Patel (Brent North), Vidya Anand (Folkestone and Hythe) and Mukesh Savini (Sheffield Hallam) from the Labour Party and Zerbanoo Gifford (Harrow East) from the SDP-Liberal Alliance. INDIA TODAY took five case studies of parliamentary hopefuls from all three of Britain's major political parties (including Narinder Saroop who is likely to emerge as a Conservative candidate) which provides a striking illustration of the issues that confront them, their personal goals and the special problems they face as India-born or having Indian parentage backgrounds in Britain's political apparatus.

"The Gujarati community here is politically sophisticated. They prefer a non-controversial MP who will fight for their rights. I intend to fulfill that role."

Keith Vaz

■ Born in Aden of Goan parents, Vaz, 30, a solicitor who unsuccessfully contested the parliamentary seat of Richmond and Barnes in 1983 for Labour is now back in the fray for the next general elections from Leicester East which has an influential Gujarati community. The constituency used to be staunchly pro-Labour until the party lost by 993 votes in the last elections when Labour leader Neil Kinnock's Press Secretary Patricia Hewitt lost to the current sitting MP, the Tory right-winger Peter Bruinvels.

In a constituency that is 31 per cent Asian—70 per cent Gujarati out of 75,000 voters—Vaz is confident he could well become the first Asian MP in the next House of Commons since he stands the best chance amongst all other Asian candidates. The issues he confronts in Leicester East are pretty much those encountered elsewhere in the country: immigration, race relations, housing rates, education and unemployment. Says Vaz: "It is very much a mixed constituency. The Gujarati community here is affluent and politically sophisticated. The voters here prefer a moderate and a non-controversial MP who will effectively fight for their rights. I intend to fulfill that role." Vaz is well-liked and popular but is not without his critics even within his own party who feel his Indian credentials are "dubious". The criticism leaves Vaz unfazed. He says he is now learning three languages—Gujarati, Hindi and Punjabi—and hopes he can at least speak the first fluently.

Vaz is a dashing campaigner. Even his answering machine carries a party political broadcast. Callers are at first tantalised by Nat King Cole, then informed: "Thank you for calling. Keith Vaz is unavailable at the moment because he is fighting for the return of a Labour Government and victory for socialism in Leicester East." But socialist victory is not going to be easy. His opponent, Bruinvels, is a high profile right-wing moralist constantly grabbing national headlines.

Praful Patel

■ One of Britain's best-known Asian political activists, Patel is caught in a stormy political skirmish in Brent North in North-West London against an equally reputed Tory sitting MP and Junior Minister Rhodes Boyson. The area has a sizeable Gujarati concentration. Patel, who has been an ubiquitous figure for the past 15 years at most India-related events, is an investments adviser and consultant. Recently he was appointed by the Government of India to the Consultative Committee on NRI's investment matters.

Patel is bluntly critical of what he describes as the "inherent racism" afflicting Britain's political machinery and demands, as an example, what has stopped the Tories or even the Labour Party from nominating Asians for peerages to the House of Lords. Patel's current campaign in Brent North is not made easier by the factionalism and caste-ridden dissensions which has riven the Gujarati community who are now at loggerheads amongst themselves over a variety of disputes.

Yet Patel is brimming with confidence that he would be able to overcome the huge 14,000 vote majority which his

Patel is peppering his constituents with imaginative news-letters which contain warnings to his voters: "Mrs Thatcher is destroying the fabric of family life."

Southall Infighting

SOUTHALL, vividly christened as 'Little India' or 'Little Punjab' for its remarkable likeness to a bustling city centre of a Punjabi town, has for long been the bulwark of Indian immigrants in Britain. In the parliamentary constituency of Ealing-Southall, almost 50 per cent of the population hail from what is known as the "New Commonwealth and Pakistan"—translated, this meant Southall offered an inestimable chance to put an Asian into the House of Commons. Lamentably—and not surprisingly—a clutch of Asian candidates and factions are now involved in a debilitating row over the selection of the prospective candidate from the region.

The reasons are annoyingly familiar: too many India-born candidates for the slot and none willing to rally round a single Asian candidate. As a result, an elderly white candidate, Sydney Bidwell, who has represented Southall for over two decades once again stands poised for re-selection. Besides Bidwell the front runners are:

■ Sardul Singh Gill: He is the first Indian Labour councillor of Ealing borough with an impressive record of service in the region. Educated in Khalsa College, Amritsar, he came to the UK in 1962 and was drawn to Labour Party politics. He is often remembered for statements like: "Southall is in fact England's turban, not because of my personal involvement here, but because of the symbol." With his long experience in the area, Gill ought to have made a sound candidate but a number of local Indian councillors oppose him openly. The influential Indian Workers Association is also hostile towards Gill. Says Gill: "I concede Bidwell has done good work. But Southall is now ready for someone who is more attuned to its special aspirations and someone with whom the people here can identify physically, emotionally and spiritually."

■ Madhav Patil: Hailing from Sangli in Maharashtra, Patil has been a rumbustious trade unionist who became the secretary of the Westminster branch of the largest civil service union—the Civil and Public Services Association. Actively associated with organisations such as the London Majlis and the Anti-Apartheid League, he is an Ealing councillor for Mount Pleasant ward who successfully recruited hundreds of Asians into the local party. Patil emerged as a contender when members of the Ealing-Southall "black sections" lobby endorsed him, but if his own colleagues are to be believed he is not a serious threat to Bidwell or Gill.

■ Valerie Vaz: This vivacious and attractive councillor from Elthorne ward has emerged as the surprise element in the current race for the Southall nomination. A relative newcomer, Valerie is parliamentary candidate Keith Vaz's sister who briefly did her initial schooling in Panchgani before she came to the UK to study at Bedford college, London University and then went on to Cambridge. As a councillor she has made rapid strides to become the "Chair" of the police committee. The criticisms against Vaz are that she is more "English than Asian". Says Valerie: "It is unfortunate that we are too busy trying to prove to the white people who is the blackest man, who is the most ethnic, who is the most Indian." Her own challenge bolstered by left-wing elements is not considered threatening but she is tipped as a future high-flier.

opponent Boyson enjoys. He claims that his joint strategy with other Brent Labour hopefuls—Ken Livingstone (Brent East) and Paul Boateng (Brent South)—will help them make a unified sweep across the three constituencies. There have been some notable Asian successes in the area of late. During the recent May council elections, the number of Asian councillors increased from 3 to 9 and now Brent also boasts of Britain's first black woman council leader. Patel is now going full tilt with his canvassing peppering his constituents with imaginatively conceived news-letters in both English and Gujarati, some of which contain an assortment of warnings to his voters ("Mrs Thatcher is destroying the fabric of family life", "Dignity, not despair—right to a home"). Patel's grassroots work is admirable. Yet it seems ironic that had Patel contested from Brent East or South and unlike his colleagues Livingstone and Boateng, did not have to contend with a strong opponent, his case could have been smoother.

Zerbanoo Gifford

■ In this constituency of Harrow East where the renowned school is located and which is 25 per cent Asian, the SDP-Liberal Alliance's parliamentary candidate is a young Parsi married to an English solicitor. As a woman with an Indian background, Zerbanoo has had to come to grips with the likes of the British Movement—a particularly repelling racist reincarnation of the execrable National Front. Ever since her candidature has been announced, she has had to endure smashed windscreens and windows and an assortment of dire threats, all of which she has tenaciously resisted.

The articulate Zerbanoo, however, admits to having been "knocked off balance" by the intimidation but has decided to fight on. "I am determined to get into the House of Commons", she says. "I am not scared of death threats. I am very Indian that way. I believe you have a life span. When your time is up, you have to go. I am a moderate who is reasonable and it is an advantage for this country to have someone like me in Parliament rather than an extremist."

Education is a key issue in her constituency and there have been vigorous debates over the teaching of mother tongues. She argues: "It has now become a highly politicised issue. I have been telling the white constituents that India is the fourth largest exporting area for this country. You are selling modern technology and you are sending marketing managers who can't speak Hindi, Gujarati or Punjabi. What good is it to send someone equipped with French or German to India? When you argue a point this way instead of being irrationally vociferous, they (the locals) sit up and take note."

Zerbanoo is a lively campaigner who fancies the idea of becoming the fourth Parsi parliamentarian in the House of Commons. But her fortunes would depend on the national swing favouring the Alliance which usually finishes behind the Tories and Labour nationally.

Narinder Saroop

■ He is the best-known Asian Tory in the country. A wealthy businessman, Saroop is the founder-member of such dyed-in-the-wool Tory associations as the Anglo-Asian Conservative Society and the elitist Durbar Club. A conservative parliamentary candidate for Greenwich in 1979 which he lost despite gaining nearly 33 per cent of the votes, Saroop is a former Indian Army officer who has held various positions in London's financial nerve-centre—The City—and is also an adviser with Lloyds insurance brokers.

"There is a danger in being seen as too successful. The element of envy comes in. The more prosperous we become, the more marked we are."

Saroop, whose aristocratic upper class English mien and broad pin-stripe suits somehow befits his "dedicated Tory" image, has lately inadvertently landed himself in unwelcome controversy. The Anglo-Asian Conservative Society has come under fire from various quarters that it has been "infiltrated" by pro-Khalistan Sikhs—an allegation which Saroop emphatically denied. Within weeks, Saroop was displaced as chairman of the society by Mohinder Bedi, general secretary of the World Sikh Welfare Organisation.

The latest development is fraught with dangerous implications for Britain's Tory Party since many Indians here feel that it has steadfastly cultivated Sikh separatists under the mistaken belief that they form a solid vote bank.

Saroop, whose other brain-child is the more sedate but exclusive Durbar Club which boasts amongst its members the creme de la creme of Asian businessmen, is confident that this time around—he would get, deservingly, a "winnable" party seat. He argues that he is as capable as the next man but grants that his colour is perhaps an undermining factor.

Despite his "propah" background and considerable influence within the ruling party, Saroop too echoes the views of his other India-born politicians that on race relations he is a "worried man". However, he points out that traditional "conservative values" of family ties and private enterprise suit Asians and adds that Mrs Thatcher herself admired the entrepreneurial zest of Asian businessmen. He cites the example of the growing prosperity of Indian businessmen but proceeds to put in a cautionary note: "There is a danger in being seen as too successful. The element of envy comes in, so it is a double-edged sword. The more prosperous we become, the more marked we are."

Vidya Anand

■ Anand faces the toughest fight amongst the current crop of Asian parliamentary candidates. The scholarly Asian is a Labour Party candidate in the conservative bastion of Folkestone and Hythe overlooking the English Channel. Anand has no Gujarati or Punjabi vote bank to woo, and he says that suits him fine since he would much rather fight a parliamentary seat as a "socialist" rather than on the colour of his skin. Anand's campaigning is directed against the controversial Anglo-French channel tunnel designed to link Britain with the European continent.

"One of the first soldiers to die in the Falklands was an Indian. If we are good enough to die for the country we should be good enough to be in Parliament."

MADAN ARORA

Anand's arguments have considerable support amongst his constituents that the channel tunnel would not create any additional jobs in the area and the tax-payers money was being flittered away to bolster the "profiteering scheme" of the Tory Party. The second major issue is the nearby Dungeness nuclear power station which in the post-Chernobyl phobia nuclear energy has created a movement rapidly gaining momentum.

Anand, who came to Britain 25 years ago from Delhi, has been a stalwart Labour Party activist ever since. He candidly concedes that Indians, or Asians, have given considerable ground to Afro-Caribbeans due to lack of unity whilst the latter have found favour with the white liberal do-gooder politician. He argues that Asians put in more into present-day British society than they get out of it. He says: "One of the first soldiers to die at Carlos beach in the Falklands was an Indian. If we are good enough to die for the country or pay its taxes, we should also be considered good enough to represent the country's constituents in Parliament." But for all his perseverance, observers see Anand's nomination as classic "tokenism" to the blacks by the Labour Party.

FISHERMEN'S PLIGHT

To Hell and Back

WHAT follows is the quintessential horror story: the tale of 92 Indian fishermen who had gone to Kuwait two years ago and, while fishing in the Gulf, drifted into Iranian waters. They were picked up by the Iranian navy, imprisoned first in Iran and then released—of all places—in Pakistani territory. In this strange land they were "captured" by Pakistani forces and imprisoned under brutal circumstances for more than a year. Even worse, the Indian authorities, who were aware of their plight, did practically nothing to help these innocent Indians for most of their incarceration. A report from Senior Correspondent RAMESH MENON:

THEY are back home now. But for the 92 Indian fishermen, not even the roar of the sea can drown the gruesome memories of the 17 months spent in Iranian and Pakistani prisons. Tortured and hounded and denied even the basic human necessities during their long months of captivity, they are a broken lot. But more than the trauma of the prison months it is hurt and anger at the "inaction" of the Indian Government to secure their release that has come to scar the psyche of the fishermen.

"We were treated like common criminals. But the Indian Government did not come to our rescue," charges a disillusioned Gangaram Tandel, a 20-year-old fisherman of Nani Danti village in Valsad district of Gujarat. Adds Thakorebhai Baria, 40, of Daman: "Our numerous letters to the Indian embassy in Islamabad went unheard. We thought we will never see India again." An equally saddened Parbhu Tandel of Valsad's Kakwadi village laments: "The Indian Government did nothing to help us in spite of so many pleas. In fact, Pakistani jail officials told us that they were ready to release us, but the Indian Government did not ask for us."

The fishermen, mostly from the western coastal belt, had left for Kuwait two years back, enamoured by the glitter of petrodollars. But they were fishing in troubled waters, as they soon realised to their chagrin. While fishing in the Gulf early last year, they were captured by the Iranian navy on the charge of trespassing. There were 92 Indians aboard the 17 mechanised fishing trawlers that were seized by the Iranians. "None of us must have ever realised that we had entered Iranian waters. It all looks the same in the sea," says Ramanbhai Sorthi, 32, one of the 92 Indian fishermen who had the misfortune of being aboard those trawlers.

Blindfolded and handcuffed, they were taken to Iran, where for four weeks they were shifted from jail to jail and ultimately lodged in Teheran jail. At Teheran, recalls Sorthi, they "could hardly sleep in peace as the night was punctuated with bomb blasts, gun-fire and airplanes. We could even hear people praying whenever there was gun-fire."

Their pleas for informing the Indian embassy were coldly ignored and instead, like lambs meant for slaughter, they were herded into Pakistani territory and released. But with the authorities already tipped off, the fishermen were caught within minutes of being released. Following a summary trial at Dalbandi they were sentenced to three months imprisonment and lodged in ill-ventilated, overcrowded, dirty Pakistani jails. They were made to work for long hours, their back-breaking chores including the cleaning of latrines. Many of them were often beaten up. In Baluchistan's Mach jail, as many as 91 prisoners were squeezed into a single cell measuring a mere 30 feet by 20 feet.

Life became an unending nightmare. Says Gangaram: "There were insects in the dal and stones in the rice." Pocket-sized pictures of Hindu gods were covered with cloth during prayers to avoid them from being seized by paranoid Pakistani guards. All letters came in for special scrutiny and censorship and only a few could be smuggled out by the relatives of helpful Pakistani prisoners.

More disheartening was the sight of other Indians languishing in Pakistani jails. Jailed on flimsy grounds, some of them had spent 14 years in prison but had little prospect of being released. Among them was Kasab Abdul Kadar of Jodhpur district. He was arrested in 1977 when he entered Pakistan to sell petty goods, and has not been released since, though his sentence ran for three months only. Instead, branded a spy, he has been tortured and one of his earlobes partly lopped off. His thighs bear the scars of wounds carved by a knife. Jivan Khan Juma Khan, also of Jodhpur, was languishing in Pakistani jails since 1977, ever since the ill-fated day when he crossed the Indian border looking for his camels that had strayed over. Another Indian could not talk properly as his tongue was slashed.

The jailed fishermen were more upset to learn that Indian women kept segregated in Bahawalpur and other jails were being ill-treated. A Kashmiri girl, who has been at Bahawalpur for six years, gave birth to a son after being repeatedly raped, they said. Charges Sorthi: "The Indian embassy officials were aware of this but chose to do nothing."

The fishermen state that they wrote some 150 letters to Indian embassy officials, Pakistani bureaucrats and officials in New Delhi, as well as Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. None were acknowledged.

IN March 1986, they went on a hunger-strike demanding immediate release. They also demanded that the Indian embassy be informed of their plight. In case of the non-acceptance of these two demands, they wanted to be transferred to a better jail. The Pakistani authorities acceded to the last request and shifted them to the Multan jail in Punjab.

A month later, an Indian embassy official turned up to enquire into their welfare. He, however, seemed unconcerned about the fate of the other Indian prisoners in the same jail. Back home, desperate relatives of the jailed fishermen using the smuggled letters as evidence tried to put pressure on the Indian Government to secure their release. Gujarat MP Uttambhai Patel wrote to the prime minister and several officials in the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA). Chief Justice P.N. Bhagwati, acting on a letter written by a Valsad resident, Mahesh Desai, ordered the Centre to secure the fishermen's release. Benazir Bhutto, who was also sent an SOS by Desai, offered to help "within the limitations of the set-up".

Still nothing seemed to move. The prisoners were shifted to the notorious Bahawalpur jail, where jail officials exhorted them to support 'Khalistan'. A Pakistani social worker, Abdul Sattar Edhi, moved by their misery, offered to help. He even offered to pay for their passage back home. Ultimately pressurised into belated action by the mounting din, the MEA secured the fishermen's release.

Sorthi was in one of the first groups to be released on July 4 this year. But there was little cause to rejoice. The released fishermen were told to walk softly across the border to Ganganagar, without attracting the Indian authorities' attention, "as if they were not free citizens of India but common criminals". They were told by Pakistani officials that "if they are not careful they will get shot". A group of 14 fishermen was even detained at Anupgadh for interrogation. They were released only after 22 days once their bona fides had been established with the Gujarat police. The others fared no better. Far from welcoming the fishermen, the police at Ganganagar it is believed, seized some of their belongings. Gangaram had to travel ticketless to his home-town Valsad, while Parbu had to sell off 15 cassettes of religious discourses to reach home. Says Devchand Tandel of Nani Danti village in Valsad: "After going through all this suffering, a ticket home was the least that could have been expected from the Indian authorities."

Shaken and scarred by the experience, the fishermen now don't want to leave their shores. Says Bharat Tandel of Nani Danti village: "There is nothing that will ever make me leave the shores of India now." Adds Gauri Tandel, mother of Mohan Tandel: "I will never let my son out of India again, even if he is going to earn a hundred times more than what he is earning here. Can money buy self-respect?" The fishermen are now slowly piecing back their lives, trying to put the harsh memories of the 17 nightmarish months in prison at the back of their minds.

Sudden Arrests

WHEN 21-year-old David Bergman set out from his home in Birmingham to cycle 15,000 km to Bhopal to draw attention to the plight of the gas victims, he couldn't have known that he would attract the police as well.

R.C. SAHU

Bergman: locked up

Last fortnight Bergman, who has been working among Bhopal's gas affected children, ended up in a police lock up, accused of being a "spy" for Union Carbide.

He wasn't the only one behind bars. At a meeting of doctors convened by the Madhya Pradesh Government to consider the problems of gas affected patients, Gautam Banerjee, an activist of the Bhopal Group for Information and Action, was caught while allegedly trying to tape the discussion. The Group, which has half-a-dozen active members, has been bringing out bulletins to publicise the state of the patients. After first accusing him of spying, the authorities changed their tune a few days later to charge him with just trespassing.

In the Cold

LAST fortnight, Panchayat Minister Rampal Upadhyay became the third Rajasthan minister to go in Chief Minister Harideo Joshi's reign of just a year and-a-half. Upadhyay had come in the public eye last year when he was accused of taking abroad—at government expense—a woman who pretended to be his wife. Upadhyay survived that scandal but had to step down last month when Justice Mahendra Bhushan Sharma of the Rajasthan High Court passed strictures against him. The allegation was that the minister had removed Rampal Agarwal, chairman of the Gangapur Cooperative Spinning Mill, because he had refused to employ Upadhyay's son and brother. Neither of them were qualified for appointment in the mill, which is located in Upadhyay's home district, Bhilwara. They were employed after Agarwal's removal and Justice Sharma held Upadhyay guilty of mala fide intentions. Soon after his resignation, which came under heavy pressure from the Opposition, the former minister filed an appeal before a division bench of the high court. Going by his indifferent record, it's hardly likely to make any difference to anybody. Except, maybe, to former chief minister Shiv Charan Mathur, also from Bhilwara, who was at loggerheads with Upadhyay.

Line of Action

CHUBBY Srikantadatta Narasimharaja Wadeyar, scion of the former Mysore ruler and a Congress(I) MP, has reason to be amused amidst all his worries. The Karnataka Government and the Income-Tax Department are fighting it out over him—or to be more precise, his properties.

The tax authorities had gone into the act last year saying that Wadeyar owed crores as income, wealth and gift tax. They started provisional attachment proceedings with regard to his palaces, an elaborate process. Indeed, it may be even more elaborate than they had imagined. Recently, the state Government issued a notification saying that it was "acquiring" the Bangalore palace (spread over 480 acres) and the famous Mysore palace (80 acres) for an unspecified "public purpose". "Persons interested in the property might file their objections within 30 days," the notification advised.

Not about to be upstaged, the taxmen retorted with a fresh notification that they were attaching not only these two palaces but also a summer palace at Mysore and the palace stables because Rs 11 crore was due to them. The notification warned sternly: "Anybody dealing with these properties in any manner will be doing so at his own risk." The matter does not end there. The properties are also used as museums by the state Government and the tax authorities now want that some Rs 50 lakh collected as gate fees from tourists should be handed over to them.

RAJ CHENGAPPA

Wadeyar: tax trouble

Said a disgusted income-tax official: "The Karnataka Government really shouldn't have done this." Wadeyar, who says that he will "fight it out in the courts" may well get some breathing space while the Centre and state work out whose quarry he is. Meanwhile, one thing is for certain: the public is assured of amusement over the coming months as the drama unfolds.

Battle Within

THE BATTLE over the composition of the privileges committee has now come out on the streets. And on two sides of the fence are the two groups in the Congress(I), represented by the two factions of the students' wing of the Kerala Students' Union (KSU)—the Antony group and the Karunakaran group. The latest fracas in this running battle erupted last fortnight on the Kerala University campus during the elections to the varsity's senate and ended in the stabbing of former KSU secretary Pratap Verma Thampan, who is pro-Antony—allegedly by some people from the Karunakaran group. The police, say eye witnesses, did not intervene. As important political figures, including leader of the Opposition E.K. Nayanar, dropped in to see the injured Thampan, tension escalated. Faced with mounting opposition, KSU President Saratchandra Prasad, a Karunakaran crony, resigned as the police questioned his associates. Said a prominent youth leader: "The chief minister not only wants the legislature but also the party's students wing to toe his line."

ONGC The Oil

Self-sufficiency is declining...

AS INDIA enters a period fraught with uncertainties about the strength of its foreign exchange reserves, the question uppermost in everybody's mind is: will the country continue to maintain a high degree of self-sufficiency in oil? During the international oil crisis of the early 1970s when crude prices sky-rocketed, the Indian economy received a massive jolt. Hopelessly dependent on oil imports, the country was forced to spend each year an amount equal to its total foreign exchange reserves. But in the 1980s there seemed to be a magical

BARRING some dramatic new discoveries, India's oil bubble which, according to incessantly rosy predictions by the Government, was supposed to balloon into a cocoon of self-sufficiency by the 21st century, could burst within this decade. If present trends continue, the country will neither be self-sufficient in oil nor self-reliant in technology by 2000 A.D. In fact India, after the last few years of heady optimism in this area, once again faces the frightening future of dependency on foreign sources to meet the major share of its domestic requirements.

This admittedly alarmist conclusion is based squarely on interviews with senior experts in this field as well as an investigation of the internal documents of the ONGC—the public sector agency which shouldered almost exclusively the charge of finding new oil to meet India's growing needs, as well as providing indigenous wherewithal for oil exploration and production. During the last five years, under the chairmanship of Colonel S.P. Wahi, ONGC has claimed—through a plethora of publicity releases and glossy brochures—that it has achieved, or come close to achieving, these goals. And during this short time, the five-year-plan allocations for ONGC shot up from about Rs 6,000 crore in the sixth plan to the currently-estimated Rs 12,000 crore—the largest single chunk of resources in the petroleum sector alone. But notwithstanding this staggering increase, of which about Rs 2,000 crore was spent each year during the sixth plan on the hunt for oil and gas, ONGC discovered no significant new structures containing recoverable oil deposits. Most of its efforts were concentrated on Bombay High, which continues to be the milch cow now rapidly being depleted. True, ONGC made profits during this period, and it is also true that it was able to achieve an all-time record in production. But in what can only be described as a public relations blitzkrieg, turn around when India's own oil production brought down foreign dependency from 70 to 30 per cent. Was this only a mere reprieve or a long-term trend? In order to make a realistic assessment of what the scenario may be when the 21st century arrives, INDIA TODAY conducted wide-ranging interviews and examined mountains of internal records of the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC). It is a grim picture. A report from Features Editor INDERJIT BADHWAR assisted by SHEKHAR KUMAR JHA:

Bombay High: the milch cow

these facts were trumpeted with rapid-fire frequency in order to paint the last five years as a booming success story. What this public relations exercise masked from public view was the sobering reality that the rewards reaped during this brief time-span were a culmination of 20 years of often fruitless labour and that a small portion of Bombay High was—and continues to be—the only flash-in-the-pan saving grace in an otherwise dismal scenario in which production from onshore fields has been more or less stagnant. And in many instances, the ONGC public relations campaign heralded old oil finds as new discoveries, used statistics to make the record look rosier than it was, and claimed success even in the field of indigenisation—a development that is far from the truth.

What follows is an account of ONGC's claims (entitled "claim") along with details of INDIA TODAY's investigative findings (entitled "findings"):

Claim: The increased production during 1984-85 has brought the country nearer towards self-sufficiency.

Findings: In the very short run this may be true. During 1984-85 the country achieved an oil self-sufficiency level of 73 per cent (demand: 39 million tonnes; production: 26.26 million tonnes). Of this amount, Bombay Offshore area—the only offshore facility producing oil—contributed about 75 per cent of the total. The remaining amount came from India's two remaining oil sources—onshore fields in Gujarat and Assam. Production from these onshore fields has remained more or less static for the last 15 years and is likely to decline. In the year 2000, India's crude oil requirements are expected to touch 100 million tonnes. To satisfy these needs, oil production will have to increase threefold. But a negative trend has already set in. During 1985-86—because of an increase in demand and only a small increase in production—the self-sufficiency level actually declined by nearly 10 per cent. During 1986-87 the self-sufficiency level is expected to continue to dip by an additional 7 per cent. Beyond this reality lie only grandiose plans and exploration scenarios but no known quantities of commercially exploitable oil.

Claim: Self-sufficiency in oil has now become an achievable goal on account of sustained accelerated efforts of ONGC.

Findings: Recoverable reserves from ONGC's onshore fields, according to the Reserves Estimates Committee, totalled 101.45 million tonnes in 1981, of which 30.69 million tonnes had been extracted by the end of March 1986. This leaves about 70 million tonnes which, if extracted according to the present rate of 6 million tonnes a year, will barely last into the 21st century. This still leaves Bombay High to make up the bulk of the supply to meet India's needs, which are expected to increase annually by over 4 million tonnes for the next 15 years. But Bombay High is already producing to capacity and, according to senior engineers, "has plateaued out".

Moreover, according to a confidential ONGC study, output from Bombay High will dip from the current level of about 20 million tonnes to 5.60 million tonnes by the turn of the century. Even under the most optimistic profile—barring some unexpected major oil find—India's present fields can yield no more than 10 million tonnes of recoverable oil by 2000 A.D.—thereby pushing the country into a 90 per cent oil dependency. During the next four years, India's demands are expected to total about 245 million tonnes. Assuming optimum production—100 per cent of demand, which is quite impossible—more than half of the reserve will be depleted within this period with no new additions in sight.

Claim: The emphasis on productivity, efficiency, innovative measures and cost-effective operations have again helped ONGC to achieve an all-time record performance in 1985-86.

Findings: The statement "all-time record performance" suggests that ONGC's entire operation performed exceptionally well in order to set a new oil production record. It is true that ONGC exceeded the original target. But in terms of actual production, the gain over the previous year was only 1.25 million tonnes or a little more than 25,000 barrels of oil per day with about half the increase coming from Bombay High and the rest from the more-or-less stagnant known fields. None of this addition came from any of the new fields.

Map by B.K. SHARMA

India's oil comes from only 3 Basins

Claim: Record production of 27.514 million tonnes has been achieved as against the target of 27.11 million tonnes.

Findings: Here there is a subtle change of emphasis by the ONGC public relations machine. The new pronouncements speak no longer of "self-sufficiency" but of "record performance". This is because the increase in demand had clearly begun to outstrip the small rise in production. In terms of barrels per day, India's needs had soared to 872,486 but domestic production was 555,475.

Claim: This record production has been made possible by putting some new hydrocarbon bearing structures into production through early production systems, thereby improving well productivity and reducing the number of sick wells....The Sixth Five Year Plan saw increase of oil production from 9.21 million tonnes in 1980-81 to 26.25 million tonnes in 1984-85.

Findings: Throughout this scenario Bombay High—in particular Bombay High South—was being flogged to death against the advice of senior scientists within ONGC. The dramatic jump in production was due only to one factor—an unexpected bonanza from Bombay High South, which alone contributed nearly 14 million tonnes of oil during 1984-85 to the country's total production of 26.25 million tonnes. Until South began production, the rest of the Bombay offshore oil scene was—and remains—disappointing. Initial offshore production, starting in the mid-'70s, yielded no more than a total of 4.42 million tonnes of oil—a little less than half of India's total production. At that time India imported 70 per cent of its crude requirements. The turn around occurred only because Bombay High South—discovered in the '70s as an extension of the Bombay High field—gushed beyond even ONGC's calculations and produced 33.7 million tonnes during 1981-85 as against the original projection of 24.6 million tonnes. Conversely, the other offshore fields failed miserably in meeting targets. Bombay High North, which had created the original flutter of great expectations, began slipping and fell below originally targeted production. Bombay High East, and a related oilfield Panna, categorised as "new" offshore finds by ONGC, failed to produce a drop of oil during this period, while production from two other offshore structures, Ratna and Heera, have been mere drops in the bucket.

However, Bombay High South is also running into trouble. According to a report prepared by the Institute of Reservoir Studies, ONGC has slowly been killing the goose that has been laying the egg of black gold. Because of the accelerated production of oil from this structure—without the use of water injection techniques used to keep up the pressure of oil flow from the wells—as much as 17 million tonnes of recoverable oil from this deposit has seeped away into pores from which recovery is impossible. The institute had recommended that in order

COLONEL S.P. WAHI

"You have to take risks"

COLONEL S.P. Wahi, 57, who has been the helmsman of the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC) since 1981, completes his term in office at the end of this month. His latest public sector assignment followed two previous ones at BHEL and the Cement Corporation of India. His assumption of office coincided with India's luckiest oil-breakthrough—the record production of oil from Bombay High South at a time when all other fields were stagnant.

This development, which pushed India into a period of near self-sufficiency, also catapulted Colonel Wahi into the headlines. He is described by friends as an incorrigible optimist, impatient with government regulations, who created a new corporate image for ONGC. Short of stature, balding and moustachioed, he cuts a classic Colonel Blimp figure. He alternates smoking a pipe with cigars, cigarettes, and chewing on an occasional paan.

Wahi's admirers refer to him as the best public sector executive in India while critics denounce him as a slick image-builder. Senior government officials associated with the Petroleum Ministry believe that Wahi has concentrated too much on the organisation and its image rather than on adventurous exploration. "Even though there is constant talk about new strikes and new finds," one senior ONGC official said, "the truth is that we have been going round and round in circles in the same structures and reduced exploration in real terms. The colonel's strategy was to concentrate only in the proven areas, exploit Bombay High to the hilt in order to be able to boast of records in a short time." Added a senior secretary: "For all the claims made, the planning of exploratory wells has been poor and time schedules have never been met."

What Wahi's critics also suggest is that ONGC, which was created in 1959 as a statutory body, has become an entity unto itself with little or no oversight in order to assess strategies and make risk-benefit analyses. Some years ago, a recommendation was made at the cabinet level that a new committee be created for this purpose but no decision was taken. "Outside ONGC," a former Petroleum Ministry official said seriously, "there is no technical competence, no think-tank in other parts of government to monitor the commission in terms of a broad national perspective. There is no second opinion."

But Colonel Wahi stresses that he needs even more independence from the Government in order to function more effectively. "I don't need one penny from the Government any more," he says. "I can manage with my own resources as well as borrowing through the World Bank." ONGC's corporate culture, he says, is different from other such organisations, "because I trained my people to talk in terms of money and not numbers." There is little doubt that the corporate structure has mushroomed into what many say is a top-heavy management structure. ONGC's manpower has shot up from 26,374 to 41,591 during the last five years. The number of officers, about 14,000, far exceed the number of Class IV employees (7,392). The expenditure on employees has gone up during this period from about Rs 54 crore to Rs 148 crore. The average annual expenditure per employee is now about Rs 36,000.

Wahi likes to talk about his management strategy in terms of "strength and weakness analyses", "modern communication systems" and "systems orientation". Every senior manager, he promises, will soon have a computer terminal on his desk. In Dehra Dun, christened, "The Oil Capital of India", by ONGC because its corporate headquarters is located there, a new administrative block is being built which, says Wahi, "will be the highest building in Uttar Pradesh." Also under construction is a training centre and a computer centre, "the most modern in Asia". The corporate lifestyle also includes business lunches, well-appointed guest-houses, a six-seater Dornier aircraft to ferry VIP's. He was interviewed by Features Editor INDERJIT BADHWAR in his New Delhi office:

Q. What do you consider your best achievements?

A. We have become the pace-setters and are shoulder to shoulder with any company in the world. We have shown continuous stability and continuous improvement. We are one of the healthiest companies in the world. We were able to do this through making, for the first time, a comprehensive, long-term strength and weakness analysis of the whole operation.

BHAWAN SINGH

"I'm confident we will meet our needs"

Q. But what about the future? There has been a decline in self-sufficiency. Will we meet our oil needs in the year 2000?

A. The position is not as desperate as some people say. We have only realised 25 per cent of our prognosticated reserves. And self-sufficiency is also related to expenditures and demand management. We have to manage our demands more efficiently and conserve energy on a war footing in order to move away from oil dependency. If the economy is uncontrolled, we could face an energy crisis situation.

Q. But the question remains, what after Bombay High is depleted? Where is the new oil?

A. You must look at the overall picture. After all, 51 per cent of the world's totally-recoverable oil is in 49 large structures. The balance is in 1,000 fields. The future lies in small fields and not necessarily in huge structures. Seventy-five per cent of our work will needs to be done through an aggressive exploration strategy. The oil game is always a high-stakes scientific gamble and you have to take risks.

Q. But where in particular do you expect to find the oil to meet the country's projected demands?

A. Gandhar and Krishna-Godavari are significant finds. I am also excited about Himachal, Tripura, Jammu and Kashmir and Andhra Pradesh. I'm confident we will meet our needs by the year 2000.

Q. But in many of these fields, ONGC has drilled over and over again for more than 20 years without finding any significant recoverable reserves. Why the hope?

A. Where there is a will there is a way. The real answer, my friend, is perseverence.

Q. According to your annual report your cost of production is going high.

A. More than 87 per cent of these costs are uncontrollable costs incurred through statutory charges, royalty payments, cess and sales tax. And we can self-finance our operation from internally-generated funds.

Q. However, these audited figures show not only your total operational costs going up but also the profits falling as a percentage of your turnover.

A. If we continue to accelerate our hydrocarbon search, the costs will be higher but so probably will be the results. The result of this investment will come 10 years later. Besides, these accounting methods are geared for engineering-type industries with simple input-output ratios. They are irrelevant to us because they don't take into account the wealth (oil reserves) which are underground. Today I am investing in areas where there may be no return. But if I make a breakthrough, then all these accounting ratios will be useless.

to prevent this damage to the well, the accelerated oil production should be lowered from the rate of 2,60,000 barrels of oil per day to 1,80,000 barrels until the water injection system for maintaining reservoir pressure could be commissioned. But this recommendation was ignored because it would have entailed a short-fall in production of about 8 million tonnes during 1985-87, a period during which ONGC was claiming its records. In addition, the deputy general manager for the Bombay Offshore project recently circulated an internal memo in which he revealed that Bombay High South, "due to constraints", will begin to register short-falls in production.

Onshore oil production, confined mainly to Cambay in Gujarat, and to Assam, seemed even less promising for the future. Of Gujarat's 615 wells and Assam's 230 wells, a total of 272—about a third of those in production—were on "artificial lift" by the end of 1985. The "lift" is an emergency procedure in which chemicals and heat are added as stimulants to wells which are getting rapidly depleted and ceased to bubble by themselves. The threat of a sharp decline in onshore production is also borne out by the fact that about 37 per cent of all the producing wells in Gujarat and 28 per cent of those in Assam have now run dry.

Claim:* Recoverable reserves also increased from 328.42 million tonnes in 1980-81 to 450.96 million tonnes in 1984-85. These achievements...have been widely acclaimed as a very significant contribution to the economic progress of the country.

Findings: Behind the statistics of recoverable reserves—in which ONGC has staked a claim of another record performance—lurks another disappointing reality. Colonel Wahi's claim that these reserves shot up dramatically from 328.42 million tonnes in 1980-81 to 450.96 million tonnes in 1984-85 while statistically true, may be invalid as a positive indicator of growing self-sufficiency. If anything, the last few years have registered a sharp short-fall in reserves. A more revealing comparison would be to begin with the year 1983 when reserves were 482.81 million tonnes. This figure fell to 465.19 million tonnes in 1984 and to 450.96 million tonnes in 1985. This clearly shows that during the very years that ONGC was painting a rosy public relations picture the depletion in India's oil reserves was occurring faster than any additions. A recent report of the Committee on Public Undertakings (COPU) has castigated ONGC for performing considerably below planned targets in all major activities—surveys, exploratory drilling, development drilling, production of crude—during the sixth plan period.

Claim:* During the sixth plan period 41 hydrocarbon strikes/discoveries have been made.... The total accretion to the existing geological reserves in 1980-85 has been 894 million tonnes of oil and gas.

Findings: These "new" discoveries and strikes as well as plans to establish huge reserves indicate that there has been feverish exploration activity which will usher in a new era of self-sufficiency. The use of phrases such as "hydrocarbon strikes," "prognosticated reserves," "petroliferous structures," "discovery of oil and oil equivalent of gas," used randomly by ONGC in its publications and press releases are, according to accepted international standards, no accurate measures of whether these structures will yield oil for commercial purposes. These terms are of academic value. Prognosticative reserves only give some indication of the volume of work which will be required for further exploration. Geological reserves are more precise indicators of the total oil-bearing potential of a given field, and not all of even those is extractable. The only true yardstick is "commercially recoverable oil"—the amount which can actually be extracted from a given structure economically as well as with available technology. And from any known oil field or "geological reserve", only about 15 per cent—under optimum conditions—is accepted as the commercially recoverable quantity.

Claim: The "new" discoveries have been in Bombay High, Narsapur, Kaza and Tatipaka in Krishna-Godavari, Narimannam in Cauvery onland, and Karjisan and Pakhajan in Gujarat. Production from the following new structures commenced through the Early Production System (EPS) in 1985: Dahej, Balol, Wasna, Limbodra (all in Gujarat) and Narimannam (Tamil Nadu).

Findings: In its litany of new and recent discoveries and strikes—in which it is never made clear how much oil is actually commercially recoverable—ONGC has also listed oil fields and pools, some of which were discovered in the '70s. Balol, ONGC's internal documents reveal, was discovered in the early '70s even before Bombay High. Dahej and Wasna figure in an ONGC paper prepared in January 1981. While the ONGC statement promises to produce oil from these structures through EPS, nowhere does it mention the quantity to be recovered. And small wonder. The total recoverable amount from the three fields will barely form a trickle: Dahej, 0.4 million tonnes; Wasna, .56 million tonnes; Balol, .44 million tonnes. According to a report prepared by an ONGC group appointed in 1982, Wasna and Balol were listed as two small oil pools along with 24 other such pools forming less than 2 per cent of the total onland geological reserves.

Narsapur and other Krishna-Godavari structures, recently heralded as potential new finds, were explored and drilled by the international oil giant Chevron which spent more than $30 million between 1982-85 and pulled out after concluding that the field was not commercially viable. And ONGC—despite claiming to have established a geological reserve of 24 million tonnes in this field—has so far not been able to extract even a drop of commercial oil. And total confusion prevails not only about the viability but also the history of this field. Former petroleum minister P. Shiv Shankar stated on October 24, 1982, that oil and gas had been struck in Razole (Godavari basin onshore) and tests were underway to determine commercial viability. But the ONGC Recorder stated—and this announcement was carried in Parliament in July 1986—that oil had been struck for the first time in 1986 in the Krishna-Godavari structure in Kaikalur-3. This notwithstanding official pronouncements.

Claim: The strike at Gandhar, discovered in March 1984, is emerging as one of the most prominent discoveries after Bombay High.

Findings: The real picture of the Gandhar discovery is still hazy. In his Republic Day speech at Tel Bhavan in Dehra Dun, Colonel Wahi estimated that the Gandhar structure contained 100 million tonnes of geological reserves. If this claim is accurate, the recovery of oil (calculated at 13 to 20 per cent of the total reserve) will be in the vicinity of 13 to 20 million tonnes. This, compared to the national demand of more than 40 million tonnes by next year—when Gandhar is likely to be put in production—is no large amount and will not be able to cater to even a year of domestic requirements.

Further, according to ONGC sources, each of the four wells drilled initially contain varying sand structures indicating the field is not homogeneous; it is thus extremely difficult to make an accurate prediction of the reserve at this stage. Officials of ONGC's western region in charge of developing Gandhar maintain that even after having drilled nine wells in the area it is still premature to make any credible assessment of the deposit. ONGC is now planning to dig several other wells in the structure before arriving at a final production plan. Commenting on finds during the sixth plan an inter-governmental sub-group observed in its recent report: "The individual discoveries and finds made during the plan were, in general, small, suggesting that a similar pattern could prevail in the seventh plan as well. The conclusion was that oil production has not branched off from the two onshore areas of Gujarat and Assam as well as from Bombay Offshore and significant fields or structures have been added through innovative exploration.

Claim: ONGC expects to establish—for the future—additional reserves of 1,400 million tonnes of hydrocarbon reserves through new exploration.

Findings: This futuristic scenario appears to be a case of old oil in new bottles. According to a break-down this new bonanza will come as follows. Of the new 1,400 million tonnes to be established within the next five years, 810 million tonnes will be established in Category I basins (Assam, Bombay Offshore, and Gujarat), 645 million tonnes in Category II basins (Rajasthan, Cauvery, Krishna-Godavari, Andaman, West Bengal, Himalayan foothills, Ganga valley, Tripura, Nagaland), and the remaining in Category III basins (Kutch, Saurashtra, Kerala-Konkan and Mahanadi). Even senior ONGC insiders are baffled by these projections. By ONGC's own admission, the Category I basins have already begun to exhibit signs of "diminishing returns"—in other words, the flow from these fields can at best be kept constant with the help of artificial measures. In the Category II basins, 25 years of exploration have so far established only 72.2 million tonnes of geological reserves. It boggles the imagination as to how this figure will be expanded to nine times this amount within a span of five short years. Within this category itself, there are four basins—Bengal, Himalayan foothills, Ganga valley, and the Andamans, where even after 20 years of repeated exploration within the same structure, no reserves have been established. And in Category III also, the projections have been made not on the basis of established reserves but only on theoretical geological studies. Following issuance of the COPU report, the petroleum secretary himself admitted that these projections were "probabilistic" exercises and no certain guide to achievement in self-sufficiency within a given time-frame.

Claim: The achievements in the financial year 1984-85, the last year of the sixth plan period, exceeded the previous year's records and have been widely acclaimed as a very significant contribution to the economic progress of the country. Net profit has gone up from Rs 882 crore in 1984-85 to Rs 923 crore in 1985-86.

Findings: There is no doubt that ONGC has made large profits during the sixth plan. But most of these profits were made possible by one major factor—a dramatic increase in the Government's administered prices for ONGC crude. ONGC profits rose dramatically from Rs 46.57 crore in 1980-81 to Rs 375.54 crore in 1981-82—an eightfold rise in profit during a period when production rose by merely one-third, from 9.2 million tonnes to 13.1 million tonnes. What made this possible was the price of oil, which was raised from less than Rs 400 per tonne to Rs 1,180 per tonne. During 1982-83, when production from Bombay High began to soar, the profit rose to Rs 692.87 crore—a fivefold increase. During this year the administered price of crude was raised further to Rs 1,380 per tonne. Despite these figures however, auditors say, the future earning capacity of ONGC does not look too bright and could reflect on the efficiency of the organisation. Between 1983 and 1985 the percentage of ONGC's net income to equity registered a sharp decline. In other words—even as more and more resources were being added to ONGC (equity)—the company's earnings continued to decline.

Foreign role in Bombay High

Claim: Cutting down operational costs has helped ONGC save crores of rupees during the last few years.

Findings: Reports show rising costs. Meanwhile, between 1981 and '85, the ONGC cost of crude per tonne soared from about Rs 400 to Rs 877.32 per tonne (from Rs 57.51 to Rs 116.98 per barrel), and the cost of drilling doubled during this period from Rs 4,505 per metre to Rs 8,982 per metre. Overall, the operating costs of ONGC also about doubled between 1983-85 from Rs 634.93 crore to Rs 1,395 crore.

Claim: ONGC has been alive to the need of indigenisation not only to conserve scarce foreign exchange but also to achieve self-reliance.

Findings: The recent COPU report expressed "dismay" at the fact that despite ONGC's claims that its technology is comparable to that of foreign companies and that it has now reached the goal of self-reliance, the amount of foreign exchange being spent by it has been increasing. Foreign exchange expenditures on ONGC's activities increased from Rs 920 crore in 1982-83 to Rs 1,189 crore in 1984-85. According to the confidential minutes of an ONGC board meeting held on January 29, 1985, the commission approved the acquisition of 44 new rigs at a cost of Rs 956.41 crore. The foreign exchange component of these was estimated at Rs 514.36 crore.

Claim: Significant progress has been achieved in the sphere of indigenisation of our material inputs during the last few years. During 1983-85 about 54 per cent of the total purchase of capital equipment and stores made by ONGC was through indigenous sources. This indicates rapid growth of indigenous capability.

Findings: New developments indicate that ONGC may be moving away from the twin goals of self-sufficiency and self-reliance. For example, for the fourth time since the '70s, India has decided to invite "reputable companies" to explore in all the offshore basins, excluding Bombay, covering 27 blocks encompassing an area of 3.59 lakh sq km. The terms are the most liberal India has ever offered. Under the proposed contracts, foreign companies will explore offshore areas (including Krishna-Godavari) on a turnkey basis. ONGC, for all practical purposes, will do nothing more than monitor and share the production and charge royalties. This would spell a critically-diminishing ONGC role in exploring, drilling, and producing oil from India's offshore facilities. But so far, despite ONGC's official claim that it "is now on the international map and a large number of companies world over are watching with interest the strategies adopted by ONGC," such efforts in the past have not attracted many bidders. During the first round 12 years ago, three contracts were signed, while there was only one in the second round. The third round, in the mid-80s, was cancelled because no bidder showed any interest.

Wahi presides over a full board meeting in New Delhi

tained under the ONGC aegis—is for the main part a foreign operation in terms of rig supervision, technical expertise and equipment. In order to show that ONGC had taken a big step in the direction of indigenisation, the commission announced that it had started buying rigs and machinery—the main expenditure item in oil production—from Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited (BHEL), another Indian company. But, internal documents show, this was a shell game because the machines provided to ONGC by BHEL contain imported components as high as 77 per cent. According to Indian industrialists, the foreign components in parts they fabricate for ONGC operations is as high as 50 per cent. In 1985, the ONGC annual report noted that the commission had made "a real contribution to the Indian economy... through helping establish a sound base for the manufacture of drilling rigs, offshore supply vessels, cementing units and logging units.... This has created the right environment for the transfer of technology to Indian units." But the following year, the commission's own import substitution group announced that during the seventh plan, greater emphasis would be placed on the charterhire of many of these same items. In other words, these goods and services—mostly available from abroad—will, in the future, simply be leased. In fact, ONGC's charterhire plans caused the director of the Department of Economic Affairs to remark caustically at a recent performance review meeting of ONGC: "India has of late become a residual market for charterhire of drilling rigs."

Claim: Improving efficiency in drilling operations...have paid excellent dividends.

Findings: During the sixth plan, ONGC's drilling, both onland and offshore, fell short of its own targets. Onland ONGC drilled 20 per cent below target. The most serious short-fall was in the Assam field where ONGC, as against a target of 3,00,000 metres was able to drill only 1,91,230 metres. The minutes of a confidential performance review meeting held last year reveal that the petroleum secretary admonished ONGC officials over short-falls in drilling and refused to accept their excuse that the failure to meet targets was the result of non-availability of rigs.

Claim: Drilling has been streamlined to achieve the maximum efficiency. Mobile rigs have been introduced which have increased cycle speed by 40 per cent.

Findings: Despite ONGC's claims of improved "rig performance", the bare facts are that six out of eight rigs owned and managed by it and employed at the crucial Bombay High field performed miserably during 1985-86. The overall rig performance at Bombay High would have been disastrous had it not been for the much better performance of foreign rigs managed and operated by foreigners under charterhire. During that year Sagar Vikas burned down in a fire; Sagar Pragati was grounded in April 1985 and towed away to Dubai for repairs and is still out of commission; Sagar Jyoti was grounded in December 1985 because of damage to its legs; Sagar Ratna's legs were damaged in April 1985. It was recommissioned after the legs of another rig were cannibalised for repair purposes; Sagar Shakti, employed to drill a target of 12 wells could very disappointingly drill only eight; and Sagar Gaurav fell far short of required performance expectations. The only two drills which met their performance targets were Sagar Vijay and Sagar Samrat.

Claim: The number of sick wells has been reduced...and the period of seismic parties (for exploration) has been increased. ONGC has achieved international standards of excellence.

Findings: During a closed-door performance review meeting of the sixth plan, the petroleum minister said ONGC needed to make "substantial improvements" by speeding up seismic surveys, improving the technical audit of the quality of data collected, better interpretation of data and a more realistic determination of drilling programmes "based on vigorous analysis". He also noted that there were a large number of "sick wells" and the time being taken to repair these was "a matter of serious concern". And he also made it clear that in his opinion, the Oil and Natural Gas Commission had a long way to go in order to "attain international levels of excellence".

BIHAR

Ruler-in-Law

IN Bihar politics there is never a dull moment. Currently adding spice to the state's political scenario is Jagdish Pandey, Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey's samdhi (daughter's father-in-law). Pandey, a controversial but slick and dramatically effective behind-the-scenes operator, has emerged as a powerhouse in the state. His unofficial stature has created deep resentments within members of the ruling party who have questioned his influence in several petitions to the Congress(I) high command. A former irrigation official, who was thrice suspended on corruption charges, Pandey, now in retirement, continues to hog the limelight as the godfather whose diktats carry enormous weight. A report from Principal Correspondent FARZAND AHMED:

Photographs by K.M. KISHAN

Congress(I) politicians say that Pandey—the "super chief minister"—is a masterful behind-the-scenes operator with an uncanny ability to influence government decisions and dictate transfers and postings.

EVERY morning a privately-owned, shabby, multi-storied building at Road No. 6-C of Rajendranagar, in Patna, becomes a beehive of official activity. Visitors climb a flight of stairs leading to a small, modestly-furnished drawing-room on the first floor and are greeted by a tall, balding man in a white vest and lungi. He is Jagdish Pandey, 59, a relative of Bihar Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey, holding his daily durbar.

September 2, 8.00 a.m. A group of engineers—office-bearers of the Bihar Engineering Services Association—exchange pleasantries and get down to the business at hand. "You should not go on strike. You know Bihar is passing through a critical phase," says Pandey. "But the Government, the officers, these IAS bureaucrats are not listening to us", the group leader says. "Don't worry. I will see your demands are accepted, officers will be taken care of. Meet Dubeyji this evening. He is a nice man," Pandey assures them. "But how can we meet and enter his house?" the leader asks. "The security men at the gate will be told about your visit. Is it okay?" The men assent and troop out. Ten hours after this meeting, a government announcement declares that the engineers association has withdrawn its proposed strike following a meeting between the office-bearers of the association and Chief Minister Dubey.

A DIG-rank officer sitting in a corner of the crowded room, rises and salutes Pandey. "Yes," the man in lungi asks. The DIG, obviously a worried man, whispers in his ear for five minutes. "It is okay. Let me see what can be done," Pandey responds. The police officer, it is learnt, is after a new field posting. He leaves, smiling. Next, as the durbar continues, a rustic panditji, headmaster of a Sanskrit school in Rohtas district, touches Pandey's feet. "Sir, my school has not yet been recognised. We are facing a lot of problems. Please do something." Pandey pauses. "You go and meet the director and the minister. I think your work will be done," he says. Another young man in khadi comes into the room. He is president of the subordinate engineers association. "Sir, what happened to our demands?" he asks. "Please meet me after a few days. I could not find time to think over your problems," Pandey replies.

Suddenly two young men barge in. Pandey appears to recognise them. "You are from private engineering colleges?" he asks. "I told you to meet the chief minister. He is a very nice man. He is like your father. He will solve your problems."

"Sir, you are also like our father. Please be kind enough and do something to save our careers. Long back we completed our course but no exam has yet been held. Our lives are ruined", pleads one man.

"Government is not responsible for such private institutions. However, Dubeyji might do something. First go to the Department of Science and Technology and then meet Dubeyji", Pandey responds.

THE morning durbar is over. Not for nothing is the retired chief engineer of irrigation and close relative of Dubey's called "super chief minister" and his Rajendranagar house referred to as the "mini-secretariat". His reputation is both legendary and notorious. His commitments are almost always mysteriously complemented in record time. But Pandey, aware of his enormous influence which has caused—and continues to cause political tremors in the state—smugly denies his importance.

"Yes, everybody thinks I am a super chief minister, running the state administration, interfering in the functioning of the chief minister but this is all a canard just to tarnish my image and defame the chief minister," Pandey says. His son, Ramesh, is married to Dubey's daughter. And through this relationship, Pandey has carved out for himself a commanding role in dispensing patronage and official favours. Senior government officials as well as Congress(I) politicians say that Pandey is a masterful behind-the-scenes operator with an uncanny ability to influence government decisions and dictate transfers and postings—especially those of engineers—without leaving a trace of his own involvement. But his in-law, chief minister Dubey bristles at this accusation: "Let anybody prove that Pandey has been interfering with my administration. This is my challenge."

However, during last fortnight's opposition-sponsored no-confidence motion in the Assembly, it was Dubey who had to face this challenge. As the chief minister took a firm and voluble stand in defence of his government against the opposition stand, he remained curiously silent in the face of strident demands from MLA Ajit Sarkar of CPI(M) who repeatedly asked him to "please say something on your samdhi Jagdish Pandey also." Even more curious was the fact that no one from the treasury benches stood up to defend Dubey on this particular issue. "Instead of going to jail for his bunglings in the Irrigation Department, he was promoted and now, after his retirement he is the real chief minister," Sarkar said.

This was by no means an unfamiliar scene for Dubey. Pandey in the past has dominated headlines in Bihar on account of serious charges of corruption against him as well as allegations that he exerts a vice-like grip over the state administration. In fact, soon after he became chief minister, Dubey's political troubles started only because of Pandey. His first major action, after he assumed office, was to revoke several corruption charges on which his samdhi had earlier been suspended as chief engineer. With lightning speed, Pandey was posted as technical secretary to the chief engineer of the Sone Command Area, then promoted to chief engineer's rank just prior to his retirement. These moves created political bedlam. After all, the charges on which Pandey had been suspended were hardly a trifling matter. During 1982-83, according to official sources, Pandey as superintending engineer of minor irrigation at Ranchi had purchased Rs 7 crore worth of irrigation pipes without technical sanctions or work assessments. The cost, according to a vigilance inquiry, was double of what should have been incurred. Even more devastating were the revelations that the pipe purchases exceeded the total budgetary allocation for all the Ranchi minor irrigation circles (Rs 3.4 crore) and that only a small portion—about 20 per cent—of the 5.2 lakh metres of the pipes purchased were used. The remaining portion was simply junked.

After Pandey returned from the wilderness and started exerting his clout, the dissidents began a steady stream of complaints to the high command, verbally as well as in writing. Matters reached a head in February when, during a reshuffle, two ministers, Amarendra Mishra, minister of state for roads construction, and Indernath Bhagat, excise minister, were sacked. According to the official grapevine they were removed because they had defied Pandey's desires regarding transfers and postings of officials within their departments. Following this development Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi despatched a political emissary from Delhi to investigate these charges.

It was in the aftermath of the cabinet reshuffle that the epithet "super chief minister" came to be applied to Pandey. A memorandum signed by 108 legislators and submitted to the Central leaders noted: "The first thing that Dubey did on assumption of office of chief minister was to revoke the suspension of his samdhi. He (Pandey) is behaving, maybe working like the super chief minister, and taking bribe amounting to crores." Even today the legislators remain equally incensed and the latest memorandum from dissidents to the high command against Dubey uses similar language when referring to Pandey.

When pressed, Pandey says: "I advise people who come to me as a citizen." But it is hard to believe that in a state like Bihar where everything moves at slower than a snail's pace, the intervention of a mere "citizen" can produce the speedy results for which Pandey has built up a reputation. Pandey's role as a crisis manager and troubleshooter for his samdhi was clearly evident last month when he intervened with government doctors of the Bihar State Health Services Association (BSHSA) who had crippled health care through a state-wide strike. Pandey is quick to boast that "as a result of my initiative and efforts, the nine-day strike was called off. BSHSA leaders met me and I convinced them that their strike was wrong. I told them that the chief minister, who is honest, would meet your demands." Pandey admits that he then interceded with his samdhi and persuaded him to put off his Delhi trip to meet the doctors.

MY house is not a mini-secretariat but you may call it free advice centre," he laughs. The power of this "advice-centre" to which technicians as well as industrialists flock for counsel was confirmed by BSHSA General Secretary Dr Gopal Prasad Sinha, who said the man behind the successful negotiation to end the strike was, indeed, Pandey. "We are not concerned about his past, but he is definitely a man with knowledge, drive. He has the capacity to persuade people and influence the Government." But behind his effectiveness lurks not only the irrigation scandal of the past but also the oft-repeated charge—made most recently in the memorandum from the dissidents—that Pandey brokers postings and transfers in the state in exchange for money. But Pandey challenges "anybody to prove this charge".

Pandey, who belongs to a rich farming family of Dehri-On-Sone was a diploma holder (an overseer) when he joined service three decades ago. In his rise to the post of chief engineer he was able to traverse all technical and legal hurdles. Family connections—he is related to the late Kedar Pandey, the former Bihar chief minister and Union minister, besides being samdhi of the current chief minister—certainly helped. Apart from this, Pandey had also established close rapport with important politicians, particularly former chief minister Jagannath Mishra who promoted him as superintending engineer against the advice of the Bihar Public Service Commission.

But Pandey has a habit of cursing his fate. "Frankly speaking," he says, "because of Dubey now being chief minister, we have been ruined. My son (Dr Ramesh) had a good medical practice and medical shop at Bokaro. His earning is Rs 25,000 a month but he gave up everything to look after Dubey without any gain. And we all are facing all nonsensical allegations." This statement is partly true. Dubey is a lonely man, heart-broken after the death of two daughters in the last few years. His only surviving daughter, Asha, is married to Ramesh Pandey. Ramesh and his father have taken on the family responsibility of looking after Dubey and have established a strong emotional and psychological relationship with him. In the process, Pandey has gradually acquired enormous power. Says dissident leader Bilat Paswan Bihangam: "Pandey is thriving because of inefficiency and lack of political will of Dubey."

While Pandey's political power may be a relatively new phenomenon, his wealth is from old landholdings. His father, late Pandit Chandra Bhushan Pandey, was the richest farmer in the area and was among the few in Rohtas (then Shahabad) district to pay agriculture tax in the '50s. His two brothers—one a local mukhiya—continue to farm their land and take care of other rural property. "I had property in Orissa also. But all had been sold out after the death of my father. I have not added even an inch of land since then," Pandey proudly proclaims. In Patna he owns a house and a car. "I just don't understand why people think I can't own a car and a house," he says. "But some leaders think I am corrupt and this was why my house was raided four times. But nothing was found. Karpoori Thakur as chief minister got me suspended and my house raided as he thought I was keeping political funds of the late Kedar Pandey. They could not prove anything."

As superintending engineer, Pandey bought Rs 7 crore worth of pipes, the cost of which, according to a vigilance inquiry was double of what should have been incurred.

The question that all political pundits mull over in Bihar is when Pandey will directly enter politics. Sources within the Bihar Congress(I) maintain that in order to clear the air and stem dissident activity, Pandey's direct entry into politics, through an election, will be a welcome move. But Pandey openly says that he dislikes politicians and is "not interested in party politics or in getting a ticket". From the "super chief minister's" vantage point, this makes sense because, for him, any other political office in the state would only be a demotion as well as an end to his unique and enviable position of being able to exercise power without responsibility.

ARIF MOHAMMED KHAN

"It is my duty to speak out"

BARELY 35, Arif Mohammed Khan has rarely stopped making news. As president of the Aligarh Muslim University Students' Union, he stood out for his open admiration of the then Swatantra Party leader, Piloo Mody, and his refusal to invite mullahs to the university. In 1977 he became a minister in the Janata Party government in Uttar Pradesh—the youngest minister in any state government—and then created history by quitting the Government and the party within three months over the handling of the Lucknow riots between Shias and Sunnis. Last year, when he was given additional charge in the Home Ministry, he became the first Muslim in that ministry. His resignation in February over the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Bill made him a national figure.

After a few months of relative anonymity, the irrepressible Khan bounced back into the news last month when a Bombay weekly revealed that he had "snubbed" Rajiv Gandhi in a letter he had written to the party president giving his reasons for not attending the Seva Dal's training camp, which was held recently at Nainital. Khan has yet to release the contents of the letter, but it is believed that in its conclusion, Khan says categorically that he has lost confidence in his leader's ability to combat communal and sectarian forces. Khan has now broadened his criticism of the Government by coming out against all the three major political initiatives of the Rajiv Government: the Punjab accord, the Assam accord and the Mizoram accord.

But all this would be irrelevant in a larger canvas were it not for the fact that Khan is voicing the opinion of a cross-section of Congress(I) leaders and workers who feel the same way but lack his courage to speak out. With Rajiv's Government increasingly being shown up as inexperienced and indecisive—the security belt fiasco was only the latest example—unease is growing in a party already troubled by electoral failures in Punjab and Assam. And rebels like Pranab Mukherjee and S.S. Mohapatra are openly sending signals to Khan that he would be welcome among their ranks. It was against this background that Assistant Editor AJAY KUMAR interviewed Khan for over two hours in the tastefully-decorated and book-lined drawing-room of his residence in New Delhi. Excerpts:

Photographs by BHAWAN SINGH

"I am only trying to draw the Government's attention to a dangerous situation. I am opposed to the politics of appeasement, to the politics of short-term expediency."

Q. Is your criticism of the Punjab accord on the same lines as the stand that you adopted against the Muslim Women's Bill?

A. What I found objectionable about the Bill was the Government's handling of it which gave respectability and credibility to fundamentalist and communal forces in the community. Similarly, I am not against the Punjab accord per se, but what I find basically objectionable is the lenient attitude towards those who continue to mix politics with religion, who use communalism and violence to pursue their political ambitions. Have the forces with whom we made the accord stopped talking in terms of separatist politics? Who were the people who started the dharmyudh? Who were the people who burnt the Constitution? Have any of them retracted from the decisions taken at that time?

Q. Do you think that this government lacks the strength to combat sectarian and communal forces?

A. I'll answer this with an example. At the time of the 1984 elections, in every election speech we had referred to the Anandpur Sahib resolution as a charter for disintegration, as something that could not be a basis for negotiation. But when it came to the crunch, then we said that all our apprehensions had been clarified by the Akali Dal. What was I to think then? That the criticism of the resolution was only meant to whip up feelings against a particular community as an election gimmick? Didn't anybody realise then that such an election gimmick can create a cleavage between two communities? Now the man in the street is asking me: when you had described the resolution as a charter for disintegration had you applied your mind fully to the resolution? Were you serious or were you trying to fool me?

The question is: what was the promise we made to the people? I feel that to stand by the pledge we made to the people during the elections may be difficult but it should not be covered by the respectable alibi of bringing these people to the national mainstream because nobody has changed.

Q. Why didn't you voice these apprehensions when the accord was signed last July?

A. Because it was this government's first political initiative, though there were many in the party who had apprehensions even then. By the accord, what I understood at the time was that the other party had given up its separatist pretensions, its communal slogans. But I did not expect the Government to accommodate the separatist viewpoint.

Q. To briefly go back to the Muslim Women's Bill. Will you clarify once and for all whether your Parliament speech upholding the Supreme Court's judgement in the Shah Bano case was made on your own or because you were asked to?

A. (Pauses). The speech definitely was mine but no minister of the Government of India can give expression to his views unless his views are concurred by people who matter. The Bill was addressed to the Home Ministry and I was then minister of state for home affairs. I was intervening on behalf of the Government. In the circumstances, can any minister give expression to his personal views? Anyone who is conversant with parliamentary norms will not even ask this question.

Q. After you quit, have you tried to meet the prime minister to sort out your differences? It is said that you have even refused invitations to dinners sent by the prime minister.

A. Why should I meet the prime minister? My views are well-known and I am available to the party leadership. As for the dinners, it is true that I have not attended any of them, but these are formal social occasions; they are not forums for ironing out differences.

Q. You don't think your criticism of major policy initiatives amounts to indiscipline? Shouldn't you be saying all this in party forums?

A. Which party forum? Whatever I am saying is in consonance with the promises we had made to the people. I am giving expression to my views on issues on which—because we have deviated from these promises—the forces which we consider a threat to the integrity and security of the country are getting strengthened. If anybody feels that I am violating party discipline by saying this, they are free to do so.

Q. Are you planning to quit the party?

A. Not at all. As a person who has had the good fortune of serving the party when it was not in power I have some sort of emotional attachment to the party.

Q. But people who have voiced similar apprehensions, like Pranab Mukherjee and Gundu Rao, have been thrown out of the party. Are you creating a similar situation so that you are thrown out and get public sympathy?

A. What situation am I creating? I am not criticising the accords. I am critical of our failure to implement them.

Q. You have also criticised the Mizoram accord, which is very new.

A. The Mizoram accord? Isn't it surprising that a government which was elected to maintain the integrity and unity of India is making compromises with those who had openly taken to arms to wreck the unity of the country from within?

"Arjun Singh should join the Gorkhaland movement so that his sane advice will be available to them and in future they will refrain from writing to the United Nations directly."

Q. But the discussion with the Mizo leaders was started by Mrs Gandhi.

A. That discussion would not have resulted in handing over power to the same forces, in winding up the Congress(I) organisations in the state and handing over the administration to those who openly claim that they were receiving foreign aid, that they were supplying arms to the neighbouring states. Can you imagine the feelings of those whose near ones were killed by insurgents in Mizoram? There was one brilliant officer from the Uttar Pradesh cadre who had 36 bullets in his body. How does his family feel?

Q. But when you question such major initiatives of the Government, aren't you asking for trouble?

A. I am not asking for any trouble. I think we have reached a stage where, in the words of Bertrand Russell, it is a duty to disobey when it is a sin to obey, it is a duty to speak when you consider it a sin to keep quiet. I am only trying to draw the Government's attention to a dangerous situation. I am opposed to the politics of appeasement, to the politics of short-term expediency. A government is meant to govern and it is all the more welcome if it works faster but it should not be a government which works faster under pressure from communal groups. Somebody has got to say it: we have to stop acting under pressure.

Q. Are your feelings shared by a large number of people within the party?

A. Definitely.

Q. Why did you criticise Arjun Singh's statement on Gorkhaland?

A. I have only seen newspaper reports where the party's vice-president has been quoted as saying that he does not consider the Gorkhaland agitation to be secessionist. My problem is: as a Congressman should I believe the words of the vice-president of the Congress(I) or should I believe the stand taken by the West Bengal Pradesh Congress(I) Committee, which was a party to the resolution in which the agitation was described as secessionist? The leaders of the Gorkhaland agitation are writing directly to the United Nations, writing to heads of state of foreign governments, observing August 15 as a black day and yet the vice-president of the party says they are not secessionist? If the vice-president of the Congress(I) feels so strongly about this, my advice to him would be that he should join the Gorkhaland movement so that his sane advice will be available to them and in future they will refrain from writing to the United Nations directly.

It is clear that politics is being played with such a sensitive issue. But when you try to play politics just to embarrass a government which belongs to a different party, you are adding a dimension which may cost the nation very dearly. (Heatedly) I cannot find words strong enough to express my feelings on this subject.

BLACKLIST DEAL

THE GOVERNMENT and big business have struck a deal on the official blacklisting of business groups (INDIA TODAY, August 15), and Finance Minister V.P. Singh will soon call businessmen for talks. Under the terms of the deal, companies that agree to fork out the tax amounts they do not dispute, and petition the courts for an early hearing of tax cases that have been pending for over five years, will have their names struck off the blacklist. The Finance Ministry had decided to deny licences to 20 leading business houses, each of which owed it Rs 5 crore or more in taxes, and to hold up their applications to raise funds from the public, till they paid their dues. Subsequently, several leading industrialists submitted representations to the prime minister on the matter and met him personally. And Bhadrachalam Paperboards had cleared its immediate dues earlier, but New Delhi had not been informed by the Hyderabad collector. This firm too has been taken off the black list.

AMBITIOUS MOVES

FIBRE manufacturer J.K. Synthetics has ambitious greenfield ventures on its drawing-boards, including computer software and fascimile equipment, and acrylic fibre and nylon tyre chord projects. The company has already obtained licences for these projects and is investing a hefty Rs 425 crore over the next five years in them, and in expanding production capacities at its existing synthetic fibre and cement plants. J.K. Synthetics is busy talking to Japanese firms for the software project, to be located on the outskirts of the capital, and hopes to export up to Rs 30 crore worth of software to its Japanese collaborator by 1990. The foray into fascimile systems could be even more ambitious: in four years' time the company expects to manufacture up to 10,000 of them annually in Himachal Pradesh. The Rs 500 crore-turnover firm expects all these ventures to take its sales to around Rs 1,000 crore by 1991.

LOAD-SHEDDING

THE GOVERNMENT is readying to provide a golden handshake to some of the 33 lakh employees of state-owned firms. The package of incentives will be unveiled shortly, and public sector company managements have been instructed to find out exactly how much fat can be shed. The Government will also hold talks with the unions next month in a bid to sell them its voluntary retirement plan. Officialdom believes that overmanning is largely responsible for the losses of several firms, and the goal is to get employees over 50 and the unproductive in sick undertakings to call it a day.

ENERGETIC PLANS

BEST & Crompton has tossed its hat into the non-conventional energy arena: windmills, solar energy and mini-hydroelectric power-stations. The engineering company has applied for permission from the Government to set up a clutch of new enterprises in collaboration with Windmatics of Holland (windmills), Terralite of the US (solar energy), and Neyrpic of France (hydel power plants). The new companies, in which the collaborating foreign firms will contribute 40 per cent of their equity, are expected to eventually notch up sales figures that may range between Rs 30 crore and Rs 50 crore.

STARTLING SUM

WHILE almost everyone agrees that the country's communications network is woefully inadequate, the bill for setting things right could be a horrifying Rs 55,000 crore. That startling sum is what the Department of Telecommunications reckons it will need till the year 2000 (the figure however includes the seventh plan allocation for telecommunications of Rs 4,000 crore). In a blueprint that will be eventually forwarded to the prime minister, the department says that it expects to generate some Rs 22,000 crore internally, but over Rs 20,000 crore will have to come from public borrowings in the eighth and ninth five-year plans and the Government will have to shell out the balance. The department is also lobbying for permission to raise an extra Rs 2,000 crore in the seventh plan by floating bonds.

RICH RETURNS

BEAR operators have been battering the stock-market in recent months, but the news from the dividend front is decidedly bullish. The Economic Times reports that with profits up, private companies are paying out more dividends to investors and the average rate of dividends is on the upswing (see chart). Over half the 345 firms studied paid their shareholders 15 per cent or more last year. Companies like

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

Reliance Industries, Hind Dorr Oliver and Bajaj Auto went one better—handing out a 50 per cent rate of dividend. Also, fewer companies skipped dividends last year than the year before. For all that, more medium-sized outfits (in terms of equity capital) shelled out fatter dividends than the big boys of industry.

A Partial Reform

THE spate of criticism that has met the Fourth Pay Commission's report shows how little the critics understand of what is involved in building a modern nation state. Judging by the letters columns of newspapers alone, the pay commission has been far too generous. Most doubts centre on the Central Government's capacity to shell out Rs 1,282 crore annually in additional emoluments, and that of the state governments to match the increase in Central salaries and emoluments, as they must eventually do. Some pessimistic estimates place the total "cost" of the pay commission recommendations at up to Rs 4,000 crore a year, that is, Rs 14,000 crore over what is left of the seventh plan. This will increase the financial resources gap left in the plan by 35 per cent.

None of the critics has made any distinction between the lower rungs of the civil service, composed broadly of Class III and Class IV employees, who account for over 97 per cent of those on the Central Government's pay-roll, and the higher Class I and Class II services that account for less than 3 per cent. Nor has anyone even suggested that while the lower grades may be over-paid for the work they actually do (mainly because of gross over-staffing), the higher level employees may be badly under-paid for the responsibilities they are asked to shoulder.

It is the failure to even consider this possibility that reveals the critics' lack of awareness of the innate compulsions of nation-building. Perhaps the most important of these is to build a techno-managerial elite—a "new middle class" that can help the country meet the twin challenges of industrialisation and modernisation. This group puts a premium on the acquisition and generation of technology, on the development of managerial systems capable of handling complex, large-scale production processes and the creation of marketing networks that cover not a village but the entire country, and eventually the whole world. Modernisation is essentially the change in relations between individuals and groups that results from the rise of an industrial society. It involves the replacement of customary with contractual relations, the development of a new legal framework to cope with these relations and a redefinition of the relationship of the individual with the state.

Every country that has successfully made the transition from a pre-industrial to an industrial society has fostered the growth of this techno-managerial elite, rewarding its members with both high incomes and high status. In the US or UK, it is not the self-made millionaires who enjoy the greatest respect and wield the most power but the often anonymous chairmen and presidents of vast corporate empires, who own few if any shares but have worked their way up the corporate ladder. The Soviet Union, similarly, reserves its best rewards for its top civil servants, its scientists and technologists and its managers of state enterprises.

> "The most that the pay commission will succeed in doing is to offset the inflation that has taken place since 1976. The country's techno-managerial classes will only get a brief reprieve."

In India, by contrast, not only have three decades of industrialisation failed to foster the growth of a techno-managerial elite, but this class has been under constant attack ever since the country gained its independence. In industry, government policy has consistently favoured owner-managed firms over professionally managed ones. It is the salaries and perquisites of the latter that the Government has sought to control, knowing fully well that owner-managers live off their companies. And despite its socialist protestations, by decreeing that public sector managers should not as a rule earn more than their counterparts in the civil service, the Government has ensured that in the only part of industry that is manned solely by professional managers, real incomes have dropped inexorably from year to year.

No single group has been discriminated against as heavily as the senior members of the civil service. Shortly after independence, the salary of a secretary to the Government was reduced (except for members of the Indian Civil Service) from Rs 4,000 to Rs 3,500 per month. In 1976, almost 30 years later, the secretary was still receiving only Rs 3,500 a month, although his cost of living had on a conservative estimate gone up more than fivefold.

It is against this backdrop of a remorseless decline in real incomes that the pay commission's recommendations must be judged. Even if senior civil servants' salaries were excessive in 1947, at some point during the ensuing years they must have ceased to be so. From that point onwards, the rise in importance of their functions should have been reflected in a rise in their real incomes. Measured against this yardstick, the pay commission's awards are not too generous but too niggardly. The secretary's salary of Rs 8,000 per month that it has recommended is 128 per cent more than what it was in 1976, but the index of wholesale prices (a better indication of rises in the cost of living for the middle classes than the consumer price index) has risen by almost the same amount. When taxes, provident fund contributions and house rent contributions are deducted, the net increase has been far less sharp. This is one reason why the ratio of the highest to lowest net income will fall from 10 to 1 today to 9.2 to 1 if the pay commission's recommendations are accepted.

Thus the most that the commission will succeed in doing is to offset the inflation that has taken place since 1976. It will do nothing to reverse the fall in real incomes that occurred in the previous 30 years of independence. Since the salaries paid by the Government to its doctors, engineers, public sector managers and other technical staff provide the base for determining the market value of these professional skills, the country's techno-managerial classes will only get a brief reprieve. The downward slide of their real incomes may be halted, but not for long.

THE BIRLAS

Slicing up the Cake

FOR a couple of weeks, Basant Kumar Birla had been telephoning the members of the clan, seeking a suitable date when they could meet. And on the appointed day they all trooped into the Alipur Road home in Calcutta of B.K.'s older brother Lakshmi Niwas Birla, wending their way past the circular staircase in the hall, into a large room inside. There, they quickly settled down to business: working out ways of undoing the complex network of financial connections that bind together one of the country's two largest business groups. At stake: assets worth a staggering Rs 4,000-crore, spread over business as diverse as textiles and tea, jute and sugar, cement and shipping, and engineering goods.

The 10 Birlas present talked things out for about an hour. There was no visible rancour, the youngsters deferred to their elders, those who spoke did so in calm, even tones. But the tensions were never far below the surface.

That first meeting was inconclusive, and the clan met again the next day for another hour. And the basic decisions were eventually taken: the members of a group that had held together for close to seven decades would not exactly part company, but companies in the sprawling group would be apportioned to individual members on the basis of who was already managing which company, and each member's business would be detached from the others through an inordered series of sales and purchases of shares. One of those present stressed that this was not a breaking up of the group: "It is not a partition, but a separation."

The modus operandi for working out the separation is still not finalised. However, it seems likely that B.K. Birla's suggestion on this will carry the day: that the various Birla investment companies swap their shareholdings in the operational companies, at agreed prices. The operational companies too have cross-holdings, and these will be bought and sold at the ruling market prices.

RAGHU RAI

Companies in the sprawling group will be apportioned to individual members on the basis of who is already managing which company.

Three years ago, shortly after group patriarch and figurehead G.D. Birla had died, his second son K.K. Birla (see family tree) had ruled out any such separation, arguing that the capital gains tax burden inevitable in such an operation would make matters difficult. Birla had then told INDIA TODAY: "It is not easy, even if someone wants to, and I don't think it is going to happen." But now it has happened, and the total tax burden is expected to be between Rs 25 crore to Rs 50 crore.

The one branch of the family that could have seen turmoil in this whole process is G.D. Birla's. Of the four sons of group founder Raja Baldeodas Birla, Jugal Kishore had no children. Rameshwar Das had two sons, but one of them (Gajanan) was virtually excluded from the group following his decision to remarry while his first wife was still around. Gajanan's son Ashok was given his share of the family business some time ago. Rameshwar Das's second son, Madho Prasad, has no children. And Brij Mohan Birla again had only one son, Ganga Prasad, who in turn has only one son, Chandrakant. In none of these branches are there multiple claimants to the companies in the sub-group. This exists only in the case of G.D. Birla's own three sons, L.N., K.K. and B.K. Birla.

Predictably enough, the sub-branch of G.D. Birla's family that gains the most from the decision to straighten out group holdings is B.K. Birla's (including son Aditya). Both had been G.D. Birla's favourites, and they already had managerial control of four of the six biggest companies in the group (Gwalior Rayon, Hindustan Aluminium, Century Spinning and Kesoram Industries). At the latest family parleys, they could conceivably have been ousted from at least some of these, but this would inevitably have led to great rancour, unsettled the companies involved, and gone against G.D. Birla's own wishes. Keeping all this in mind, matters were left as they were. And now, for a relatively small sum (in relation to the earning power of these companies), B.K. Birla and Aditya Birla will get full shareholding control over these companies. One estimate is that the B.K. Birla branch is getting over half the clan's total business.

There is little doubt that there is some heartburn on this question in the other branches of the family. But, as an observer commented, this has not come in the way of a non-acrimonious parcelling out of the family wealth.

in G.D. Birla's own family had been corrected around the time of his death in 1983. The L.N. Birla branch of G.D. Birla's family had got little by way of assets till then (partly because of the nationalisation of the insurance and coal mining business, and partly because of the failure of a company like Hind Cycles). But shortly before and soon after G.D. Birla died, L.N. Birla's son Sudarshan Kumar Birla was given charge of Mysore Cement, Saurashtra Chemicals and Jiyajeerao Cotton Mills, while Sudarshan's son Sidharth was given the Central India Machinery Manufacturing Company (CIMMCO).

The branch of G.D. Birla's family that may have got a raw deal is the one led by K.K. Birla, who has inherited almost none of the companies that G.D. Birla founded and ran. Instead, virtually all the companies with K.K. Birla (Zuari Agro-Chemicals, Texmaco, India Steamship, the sugar units) were founded, acquired or managed from the start by K.K. Birla himself. The absence of an inheritance may be partly because K.K. Birla has three daughters and no sons, partly because K.K. Birla had turned down offers from G.D. Birla to move into one of his companies, and partly because father and son did not always see eye to eye.

K.K. Birla has meanwhile decided to give his companies to his daughters (unprecedented in the Birla clan, and with perhaps only a couple of precedents in the whole Marwari community). One daughter, Shobhana Bhartia, in fact moved on to the board of the Hindustan Times last year, and in fact has interviewed prospective candidates for the editorship of the paper. Chandrakant Birla, as it happens, was keen to get control of a newspaper, but he did not at any stage ask his uncle K.K. for the Hindustan Times Ltd. However, a businessman close to Chandrakant is now one of the main shareholders of The Daily, sold recently by R.K. Karanjia.

K.K. Birla's daughters may, as a matter of fact, get more on their plates than might have been expected. For a little over a year ago, the childless M.P. Birla's companies were placed under the protective umbrella of a newly-formed M.P. Birla Foundation. Interestingly enough, the chairperson of the new trust was K.K. Birla's daughter, Nandini Nopany, while the other two daughters (Shobhana Bhartia and Jyoti Poddar) were also made trustees. This does not automatically mean that K.K. Birla's daughters will get control of M.P. Birla's companies. Nandini Nopany as chairperson will probably exercise greater say in the affairs of the various companies than any of the other trustees. All three daughters of K.K. Birla are said to be close to M.P. Birla, but Nandini is said to be the closest to him.

While this is the first time that Birla daughters are entering the family business, it is not the first time that women from Birla households have done so. M.P. Birla has not been well for some time, and it is his wife who has been looking after affairs. She already sits on the board of his flagship unit, Birla Jute.

IRONICALLY enough, while M.P. Birla's companies will remain part of the Birla group (because these will be run by a Birla trust), this will not be the case with K.K. Birla's companies once his daughters take charge at some future date. Since the daughters are supposed to have been 'married off into other families', the companies that they run will no longer be considered Birla family companies, and they will all have to move out of the group's towering corporate headquarters in Calcutta.

But contrary to press reports, informed sources say that K.K. Birla will continue to look after the affairs of his companies for some time, and that he has not announced which companies will go to which daughter in the future. It is also explained that this move has not met with any resistance from other members of the clan, that this was not an item for discussion at the recent meeting of the family council, and that the suggestion that his companies should move out of Birla Building came from K.K. himself.

Meanwhile, some members of the Birla family also explained that the basic decisions on control of companies within the group were taken three years ago, that the latest meetings were only meant to work out the modalities of formalising the existing parcelling out of work by adjusting shareholding patterns, and that even these decisions will be implemented only over the next three years. Thus, it was pointed out that Shobhana Bhartia has already moved on to the board of Hindustan Times, that the M.P. Birla Foundation was set up a year ago, and that Sidharth Birla moved on to the CIMMCO board in 1985. Said a member of the Birla family: "The changes began three years ago, and they will continue for another three years.

Whatever the case, there is little doubt that one of the two largest business houses in the country is now in the midst of a major transition. With such great wealth at hand, the stakes are higher than they have ever been in a succession battle. And if there has been less rancour than might have been expected, and no great stress on an equal sharing of the wealth, it is most probably because there is enough and more for everyone, and a dwindling number of inheritors down the line. As one observer pointed out: "God has given the Birlas everything except sons." If one excludes Ashok as being outside the main family, all the branches of the Birla family are now running out of male heirs, excepting Aditya Birla, who has a 20-year-old son Kumarmangalam. And it is no surprise that it is Aditya's branch of the family that has got the lion's share of the Birla cake. —T.N. NINAN

LALIT MOHAN THAPAR

Arresting Actions

THE waves that the case has created in the judiciary and the business world are an indication of the stature of the man involved. The arrest of Lalit Mohan Thapar, 58, the high-profile bachelor and well-connected chairman of the Thapar group of industries by the Enforcement Directorate, on charges of foreign exchange violations, shook not only Indian industry but also the Finance Ministry. The event quickly snowballed into a major crisis for Finance Minister V.P. Singh as well as the judiciary. While Singh huddled with Revenue Secretary Vinod Pandey and Bhure Lal, the now dreaded head of the Enforcement Directorate, to get a fix on the case, judicial history was being made a few kilometres away, at the residence of Justice E.S.Venkataramiah.

In an unprecedented move, the Supreme Court judge decided to hear the bail plea on Thapar's behalf at 10 p.m. on September 5 and ordered Thapar and his co-director Shyam Sunder Lal to be released on a Rs 50,000 bond each. But the two were forced to spend that night in Delhi's Tihar Central Jail because the authorities said no prisoners could be released after 6 p.m. Earlier in the day, a lower court had rejected the bail application. Using this precedent to make a point, an advocate filed a motion seeking similar priority treatment for all bail applications pending in the court. Rattled by this unexpected move, a division bench of the Supreme Court was forced to direct Thapar to go back to the lower court for a final bail application. At the session court his bail was again refused and Thapar has appealed to the high court where the case is pending. Although Thapar's passport is impounded and relevant company documents are in their possession, the Government continues to oppose his bail.

Thapar's journey to Tihar was the outcome of a series of dramatic moves in which more than 200 officials of the directorate raided about 20 premises of his companies, located in New Delhi, Phagwara, Bombay and Calcutta. Acting on a year-old tip-off that the Thapars had failed to repatriate foreign exchange earned by their companies abroad, Revenue Department investigators began a detailed examination of all the export commitments of the company. The department now claims that more than Rs 6 crore earned by the companies abroad had not been repatriated to India for over three years. Sixteen of 40 Thapar-run companies are involved in the export business.

Thapar is a Doon School-educated industrialist reportedly having close ties with influential people in the ruling party. He is chairman of the Doon School Board of Governors and shared the dais with Rajiv Gandhi at functions during the school's internationally publicised Golden Jubilee last November. Enforcement sources say they struck at his companies only after collecting "irrefutable evidence". According to officials, none of the Thapar companies operating abroad has been able to remit the entire amount of foreign exchange earned by it. Examples:

► In 1978 Karam Chand Thapar & Bros (KCT) entered into a consultancy contract with a joint venture company Ailee Development Corporation (ADC) for putting up a hotel in the Seychelles. KCT was to receive Rs 67.50 lakh as a consultancy fee, part of which was to be used for equity in the ADC. The Government probe revealed that Thapar invested only Rs 6.30 lakh in ADC's equity and failed to repatriate the rest of the money his company had taken as the consultancy fee.

Thapar's arrest has lent weight to the widespread belief that the finance minister is on the warpath again.

Recreation Ltd. as part of the hotel project without Reserve Bank permission. Enforcement officials allege that part of the unrepatriated foreign exchange was used for floating this fully-owned subsidiary.

▸ BCT exported building equipment worth over Rs 1.43 crore to the Seychelles during 1982-1984 but money was never received in India; Ballarpur Industries Limited (BIL) also exported raw material worth Rs 46 lakh to Phoenix Pulp and Paper Company of Thailand in 1984 but not a penny has been received in India. BIL running a joint venture in Malaysia and had contracted to receive an amount of Rs 1 crore as commission till 1984 but it has so far sent only Rs 1.25 lakh.

Enforcement officers maintain that these initial charges are just the tip of the commercial iceberg and that ongoing investigations will yield even more investments in foreign companies.

But the Thapars and the industry insist that the Government has no case. All the trade associations condemned the Government for harassing "one of the country's top industrialists with a proven track record of fostering industrial growth along healthy lines". While Thapar was not available for comment, a company spokesman issued a statement claiming that "there is nothing irregular we have done and this talk of irregularities is just to tarnish our image. We are a house with a rich reputation of clean dealings in business." While the case clearly appears to involve technical violations of foreign exchange repatriation regulations, the authorities have yet to make a clear case showing that the Thapar group fraudulently squirreled away money abroad through practices like the under-invoicing of goods. Most of the Government's case so far is based on the very declarations and commitments made by the Thapar group itself to the Government.

While it is now for the courts to pass judgement on the integrity of the Thapar group, the incident has lent weight to the widespread belief that the finance minister is on the warpath again. And there is good reason to believe this. The ministry is under fresh pressure to raise additional resources for meeting the enhanced wage bill on account of the pay commission's recommendations. As the pressure increases, revenue intelligence agencies will redouble their quest for the geese that lay the golden eggs. But the exercise would be counter-productive if, in this over-zealous mood, they wind up killing them. But other sources maintain that the Thapar arrest is one more indication of groupism and internecine warring between high officials and politicians close to the prime minister. It is curious, they point out, that Thapar was arrested at a time when both the prime minister and his tough lieutenant, Arun Nehru—who is known to be a political foe of the finance minister—were both abroad.

THAPAR GROUP

Rapid Growth

A conglomerate of 40 companies, the Thapar Group is one of the nation's top 10 industrial houses in terms of sales and assets. Headed by Lalit Mohan Thapar, the group has diversified interests ranging from aviation to building equipment. With an investment of over Rs 13 crore abroad, the group ranks second after the Birlas in terms of foreign financial involvement.

Equally important is the fact that the house of Thapar serves as the Indian representative for several leading multinational corporations manufacturing defence and aviation equipment. Because of its diverse nature, the Thapar group has achieved a rapid growth rate during the last two decades. While its turnover grew from Rs 155 crore in 1970 to Rs 838 crore in 1984, the value of its assets rose from Rs 136 crore to Rs 699 crore during the same period of time. And its profits shot up considerably, from Rs 11 crore to over Rs 40 crore. The company paid a dividend of 16 per cent in 1984 as against 11 per cent two years before.

Contributing to this phenomenal growth are Thapar companies operating in areas such as paper manufacturing, vanaspati, engineering goods, textiles, electricals, electronics, sugar distilleries, mining, real estate, investment, industrial consultancy as well as international trade.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

The group has more than 40 holding and subsidiary companies. But the major flagships are Ballarpur Industries Ltd (BIL), Crompton Greaves Ltd, Greaves Cotton and Company and Jagatjit Cotton Textiles Mills (JCTM). Of these four the money spinner seems to be BIL. It has a turnover of over Rs 230 crore and accounts for 12 per cent of the country's paper production. Other profit earning ventures are said to be Crompton Greaves and Greaves Cotton with a combined turnover of over Rs 300 crore. Between the two, Greaves Cotton wields the financial clout due to its aviation business which has grown by over 300 per cent over the last six years. Also contributing to the growth of the empire is its textile unit, JCTM, with a turnover of over Rs 150 crore. After having established itself in the domestic market, the Thapar group went international in the late '70s. Between 1978 and 1985, the group floated over half a dozen joint ventures in Indonesia, Malaysia, the Seychelles, Tanzania and Thailand and began offering technical services in the field of hotel construction and engineering.

STAMP PAPERS

Short Supply

PATIENCE is fast evaporating into the September heat and a mini-stampede breaks out in the queue each time the vendor announces intermittently: "Rs 2 stamp paper out of stock", "Rs 3 stamp paper out of stock." Tempers are frayed as people who have waited for hours are forced to buy Rs 10 non-judicial stamp paper instead of Rs 2 denomination paper. "I've never seen a shortage like this," says a besieged Prem Kumari who has been selling stamp paper for the past eight years at Delhi's Patiala House courts.

Non-judicial stamp papers used for routine legal documents (which need not be filed in court unlike judicial stamp papers) have been in short supply for several months, and more so in the past few weeks. Says Delhi High Court lawyer Jagdev Singh: "I haven't seen a Rs 2 stamp paper at the vendors for the past three months."

The shortage is particularly acute in papers of lower denomination due to their higher demand. A minimum of 10,000 Rs 2 stamp papers are sold in Delhi every day, the number shooting up to 15,000 during certain periods, like before school admissions when the demand for birth certificates peaks.

Tracking down the cause for the shortage is literally a paper chase. The public sees retail vendors as the villains of the piece. The vendors accuse the treasury for not producing enough to cope with the demand. The treasury officials say they are helpless in the face of inadequate supply from the India Security Press Nasik. Lobbying at Nasik and in the Department of Economic Affairs in Delhi to increase supply has been futile due to a shortage of watermark paper stemming from a lock-out at the Titagarh Paper Mills. Currently the Delhi treasury receives only 30 to 40 per cent of their indent. The amount finally allotted to them depends on the watermark paper stock at Nasik.

Rather inevitably, other additional factors contribute to heighten the scarcity. The stock of papers for Delhi are loaded on the Punjab Mail at Nasik but most times there is no room for them there. Meanwhile, when the stock arrives at Delhi station, it goes uncollected as the railway receipt despatched from Nasik has not reached Delhi in time.

Also, there is the element of corruption. In the notary around the courts where it is possible to purchase anything for a price from the ubiquitous touts, corruption is inevitable. If affixation of adhesive stamps can be expedited by payment of Rs 50 to Rs 100 as 'express money', the sale of "out of stock" stamp papers at a premium is more than likely.

"I have told the collector to raid these vendors. There is some hanky-panky. Many lawyers have told me that these vendors give the paper in black to the typists," says Hari Chand, president of the Delhi Bar Association. "These typists have created chaos; they are in league with the vendors and buy in black," says advocate B.S. Tokas. Typists at the courts buy stamp papers in bulk from the vendors as people approach them rather than advocates for routine documents.

But even without this black-marketing, thousands of rupees are wasted as people are forced to buy papers of higher denominations as the lower ones are out of stock. With demand on the increase and no visible effort to find an alternate supply for watermark paper, this harassment of millions at the very doorstep of justice is only likely to get worse.

MALHOTRAS

House Divided

TROUBLE in the competitor's company is always welcome news. But when the competitors happen to be the Malhotras, first family of Indian razor blade manufacturers, it becomes cause for celebration. Last fortnight, news of a Malhotra split thrilled managers in Wiltech and Sharpedge, which have been struggling to hold their own in a market where over 80 per cent of the customers prefer Malhotra brands.

"The old Malhotra days are gone," said M.A. Bakre, chairman of Asian Cables, whose subsidiary Wiltech has been unable to break the Malhotra charm despite liberal infusions of foreign technology and the Wilkinson Sword name.

True to form, the Malhotra clan was expectedly cagey about the reported division of assets, manufacturing plants and, most important, the market leader brands in their inventory. Rajender K. Malhotra, the brother who is widely credited with having brought it about, is unwilling to comment.

Surinder described it as a mere administrative reorganisation. He explained that the management of each of their plants at Calcutta, Bombay and Hyderabad was always handled independently by him and his three brothers, adding that the only change which has now taken place is the allocation of different brands among the factories to prevent overlap. "Talk of a family split is just so much nonsense," he said.

His protestations notwithstanding, it was clear that there was more afoot than a mere managerial exercise. Information gleaned from employees and competitors suggested that Rajender, the youngest of the three brothers currently at the helm, has taken over Vidyut Metallics, the factory near Bombay, together with the Supermax brand of blades and shavers. Ved, the eldest, now controls the Indo-Swing plant at Hyderabad, though he and Surinder appear not to have parted ways. Between them, they have sale rights to two new but growing brands, Laser and Gallant. And the family's original plant at Calcutta, Harbans Lal Malhotra and Sons, remains common family property along with Toppas, the blade which rings in over Rs 18 crore worth of sales.

Already, salesmen representing the different factions have begun to compete to establish the fledgeling brands. "But why should people look askance at this?" queries Surinder Malhotra, "the tussle between our salesmen is very healthy inhouse competition." Their competitors see it differently, chortling delightedly at the spectacle of the Malhotras taking each other on instead of ploughing unmindfully through the opposition.

For all the glee, the Malhotra family split is unlikely to cost the group its cutting edge in the market-place. The leading blademaker's brands account for 73 per cent of the roughly Rs 62 crore annual market for blades and twin-track shaving systems, and the clan controls another 8 per cent of the market through Centron, a sailing manufacturer which it took over in a technological and marketing collaboration in 1984.

Efforts by competitors to unseat the family from its number one position have been notoriously unsuccessful. Hindustan Lever's marketing expertise could not raise the market share of Sharpedge's dynamic range over 8 per cent, and Wilkinson Sword's Indian collaborator, Ultratech, now has a market share of 8.5 per cent but is in the red.

Their competitors like to blame their bad luck on the Malhotras near-legendary dirty tricks department, but the fact is their brands cost 40 per cent less than competing brands in each range present in the market.

But the recent split in the ranks is clearly bad news for the family. Coming just when the Podar-Gillette combine, Indian Shaving Products, has launched its double-edged blades, the division of assets and brands has caught the clan at its most vulnerable stage. Last fortnight, reports suggested that efforts were still afoot to reunite the brothers, and octogenarian patriarch Harbans Lal Malhotra, who had retired, is likely to come forward to mediate.

SWRAJ PAUL

Share Scheme

IF THE Government believed that after three-and-a-half years of futile battling, a weary and embittered Swraj Paul would have little energy left to look for loopholes to exploit in his "compromise settlement" with Escorts and DCM, it underestimated the energy of this rotund non-resident. Always a shrewd operator, this time Paul has got the taxmen furiously on his trail while he makes his exit with a neat two-tier sale deal to avoid nearly Rs 2 crore in capital gains tax on his sale transaction.

Having managed to get a selling price of Rs 96 for each Escorts share and Rs 100 for each DCM share, against his average purchase prices of Rs 62 and Rs 60, respectively, to compensate for the interest lost, Paul was faced with a situation where he would have had to pay 40 per cent capital gains tax on the meaty Rs 7.1 crore margin—the difference between his final sale proceeds of Rs 19.7 crore and his investment of Rs 12.6 crore. Obviously in no mood to dish out another Rs 3 crore at the exit gate, Paul worked out a novel sale plan.

According to the scheme, the Caparo group would sell the shares at Rs 75 to companies of the Apeejay group belonging to Paul's brothers in India which would then sell the lot to Escorts and DCM at Rs 96 and Rs 100. In this way, the capital gains applicable to Paul would be only Rs 15—the difference between his purchase price and the sale price to the Apeejay group—and the capital gains tax on the balance would be applicable to five Apeejay companies—Surrendra Overseas and Steelcrete Private Ltd in the case of Escorts shares, and Apeejay Development Private Ltd, Northern Enterprises Ltd and New Bombay Park Private Ltd in the case of the DCM shares.

Here came the catch. These buffer Caparo companies are losing ones; and capital gains for Indian companies can be set off against losses. So while the Caparo group would have been taxed on the entire price difference in a direct sale, a large chunk of the profit margin could be avoided via the Apeejay route.

Paul is, of course, fighting against paying tax even on Caparo's Rs 15 margin. He says that since it was a "negotiated settlement" the normal rules would not apply and this tax should be offset against his losses on account of interest and the 35 per cent devaluation of the rupee since he purchased the shares. In Delhi last fortnight for a short holiday, Paul maintained indignantly: "I have not owned the shares for even a day. So where is the case for capital gains?" But the argument does not stick, for though the shares were transferred in his name only to facilitate their sale downstream, dividend on the shares has been paid to Caparo retrospectively by Escorts. DCM has adjusted the dividend value in the sale price since it has been distributing the dividend on these shares each year to the names listed in the company's share registers (people who sold the shares originally to the Caparo group).

With Escorts eager to finally close its gates to the raider, the sale transaction on its shares was rushed through, but the subsequent application for permission for an identical deal with DCM has been held up in the Finance Ministry as it assesses the precise ramifications of the unusual method chosen. The bureaucrats are divided between those in favour of the split sale (as this would involve a smaller remittance of foreign exchange: only Rs 75 per share against Rs 96) and those putting their foot down against the massive tax loss to the exchequer if the deal goes through in this fashion. But the general mood of the Government seemed to be summed up in the words of a North Block official, who screwed up his nose at the mention of yet another Caparo twist and said: "I don't know if he's tired or not, but we are. Give or take a couple of crores, let's just get over this mess."

THE economy is not doing very well: industrial production growth has slowed down, so has activity in the manufacturing sub-sector, and the number of new letters of intent and industrial licences has also dropped considerably. Power generation too is growing slower than before. The resulting gloom on the stock-market may be understandable.

All data are seasonally adjusted. The current trends are computed on the basis of the last six months data to which a regression is fitted.

After dipping in early August, wholesale prices have resumed their upward march. Inflation remains under control, at just over 3 per cent.

Industrial production has dipped for three of the last four months for which data are available. The trend rate is still fairly comfortable.

The manufacturing sector has seen slackening activity in three of the latest four months. The trend rate is barely respectable at 5.62 per cent

Money supply contracted marginally in the latest fortnight, but the trend rate of growth remains steady at slightly over 12 per cent.

After expanding fairly rapidly from March to July, there is a slight dip in commercial bank credit. Demand for funds continue.

Share prices nosedived in the latest fortnight, and the negative rate of growth in stock values seems to spell gloom for investors.

Power generation has been fluctuating. Result: the trend rate of growth has dropped from 11.2 per cent to 8.3 per cent.

After sliding down the price curve, gold has regained some of its lustre, climbing steadily through most of August.

THE MARKETS

Late Rally

THE good news finally began to trickle into the trading ring last fortnight, first in the form of a brief buying spree by the cash-rich Unit Trust of India (UTI) and then as increased dividend payments by companies like Premier Automobiles and Bajaj Auto. Maharashtra Scooters, linked to Bajaj Auto, also announced a handsome bonus issue. Moreover, Reliance Industries reduced the proposed premium on its impending equity issue.

The run of good corporate news and the prospect of further buying by UTI made the battle more even between the till now rampaging bears and the so far frightened bulls. Though several shares lost ground in the fortnight, there was a late rally and The Economic Times share price index recovered from a low point of 475.8 to 486.7. Among the scrips that gained in kerb trading late in the fortnight were Tata Steel, Premier, Reliance, Associated Cement, Orkay, Gujarat Fertilisers and Tata Tea. There is now reason to hope that the bulls may get a piece of the action once again.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

The counterplay to the optimistic developments was provided by the market authorities themselves, who took fresh action in the case of Reliance, Tata Steel, Associated Cement and Premier so as to force brokers to reduce their outstanding commitments—a decision that at the moment helps the bears.

Due to this and other developments (like the arrest of Ballarpur Industries Chairman L.M. Thapar), the market's mood remains uncertain. The pattern of trading in the coming weeks could easily swing either way, especially since the recovery has just begun and is yet to gain strength. Most of the recovery last fortnight was achieved on a single day—September 2—when UTI entered the market. But UTI's equally quick withdrawal (perhaps momentary) left the share price index hovering uncertainly.

Nevertheless, UTI has enormous amounts of money to play around with (it has collected no less than Rs 140 crore on its India Fund share issue, and could rake in still more through its mutual fund unit scheme, due to be launched in the near future). These sums must inevitably be deployed on the market, and could provide just the kind of boost that it now needs to recover from the bear hammering of recent weeks.

For the moment, however, the bears have not yet given up the battle. One indication of this was the lack of immediate buoyancy following the sharp hike in Bajaj Auto dividend (from Rs 20 to Rs 50 per share) and the reduction in the premium on the Reliance share issue. Both scrips gained ground only after some time gap. But in the final analysis, the market seems to have got safely past the stage when it could be subjected to effortless hammering by the bears.

VAIDYA ASSASSINATION

Big Breakthrough

THE BEST of investigating agencies can do with a lucky break and last fortnight it was the turn of the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) to be so favoured. Hot on the trail of the killers of General A.S. Vaidya, the CBI was close to zeroing in on the owners of the red Ind-Suzuki motorbike used by the killers when fortuitous circumstances presented them with the assassin of the former Indian Army chief who was gunned down on August 10. Even as CBI chief Mohan Katre flew down to Pune at the head of a posse of officials to carry out the interrogation, officers of the CBI and the Pune police could barely hide their elation. "With the nabbing of Sukhdev Singh, the backbone of the gang of Harjinder Singh Jinda has been broken," said a visibly pleased police official.

Sukhdev Singh, alias Pradeep Kumar alias Rakesh Sharma, and another member of the gang, Nirmal Singh, were arrested by an alert police inspector after the red Ind-Suzuki on which they were returning to Bombay collided with a truck in the industrial township of Chinchwad, some 20 km from Pune. As the two were flung off the bike, used in the killing of General Vaidya, the truck-driver and other onlookers rushed to their aid. But they were startled to see two hand guns stuck into their trouser belts protruding from within the disarrayed shirts of Sukhdev and Nirmal. Realising that they were in trouble, the two got up hurriedly and Sukhdev whipped out his Chinese-made Mauser 9 mm pistol with which he shot General Vaidya and shouted at the shocked bystanders: "Watch out, we are the killers of General Vaidya." Sukhdev Singh even tried to shoot directly into the crowd but luckily his Mauser misfired.

With the crowd totally paralysed by fear, the two ran down the Bombay-Pune highway, with Sukhdev limping from the injury sustained in the bike accident, and disappeared towards the railway line leading to Pimpri. An inebriated onlooker of the highway drama, Narayan Bajrang Pawar, took the incident seriously enough to go to Pimpri police station and give a sketchy account of what had happened to Inspector A.I. Pathan. "It is to Pathan's credit that instead of shooing away a drunk, as police officers often do, he rushed out in a jeep with his men," said a police official.

Pathan came across the two terrorists walking along the road to Pune city, from where they apparently intended to jump into a bus and head for Bombay. Though Sukhdev drew his Mauser again when the police party approached, Pathan, sub-inspector B.P. Nimbalkar and constable G.S. Sable—all of whom were later rewarded—managed to overpower the two without a shot being fired. A search of Sukhdev and Nirmal, who was carrying a black leather bag with him, revealed a revolver, two pistols and 31 live cartridges.

General Vaidya's assassin, Sukhdev Singh, was one of the three marksmen in the dreaded gang of Harjinder Singh Jinda. With his fortuitous arrest near Pune, CBI officials are now very hopeful of nabbing the other terrorists in the group.

Sukhdev and Nirmal returned to Pune, say CBI officials, to collect their weapons and motorcycle, which were lying inside a ground-floor flat (G-21) they had rented last January in Salunke Vihar, a large housing complex developed, ironically enough, by the Army Welfare Housing Organisation. According to CBI sources, they took this risk partly because their photographs were not among those of the four wanted men released by the police—the police list had Bhola, a Sukhdev lookalike—and partly because they had come to have a superstitious belief that the Mauser, used by them in innumerable killings, would protect them. It was this trust in the Mauser and the confidence in his marksmanship which made Sukhdev reply, on being asked by interrogators when he realised that General Vaidya was dead: "I knew he was dead with the first shot."

In fact, it has now been revealed that Sukhdev had pulled the Mauser out of his right boot, shot General Vaidya and put the pistol back in a leather bag. After the killing, Sukhdev and his accomplice who was driving the bike—it was not Nirmal but the police won't say who it was—headed straight for the Salunke Vihar flat and not towards the railway bridge as a motor mechanic had maintained earlier. Nor, it is learnt now, were there any other accomplices on a Lohia scooter accompanying them.

Officials of the CBI are particularly jubilant at the capture of Sukhdev Singh, described as a "cold-blooded criminal whose ruthless desire to kill had made him an indispensable member of the terrorist group." Sukhdev, who grew up in Ganganagar, speaks and reads English, and is said to have turned a terrorist even before Operation Bluestar. After Operation Bluestar, he escaped to Pakistan where he was given the Mauser pistol. After his return, among the crimes he has had a hand in, are the killings of Lalit Maken and his wife and Arjun Dass in Delhi. Nirmal, a cousin of Jinda, used to be a truck-driver in Delhi, where he still has relations, before he joined Jinda's gang. The 10 or 12-member gang, of which, police officials now suspect, Jinda is only the second-in-command while an unnamed person is said to be the leader, has two other very dangerous gunmen.

Gang members—also responsible for a spate of bank robberies across the country—are suspected to have taken refuge in terrorist hide-outs in Punjab after General Vaidya's murder. But with General Vaidya's killers now in their custody and being subjected to intensive interrogation at the heavily-guarded Pune cantonment police station, the CBI is hopeful of nabbing the rest of the dreaded Jinda gang.

A Commitment Fulfilled

"OPERATION: 100 DAYS"—a comeback after a major fire in a hundred days flat, seemed at first an impetuous commitment", says Mukesh Aggarwal, 31 year-old owner of Hotline. And as if not to lose any further ground quickly cuts in, "but when all is lost, you could either look back or look forward".

The Fateful Night. April 23rd 1986, a fire struck the prized Hotline TV unit at NOIDA and razed it to the ground. Ironically, Mukesh Aggarwal was in Korea at that time striking a deal for massive diversification and expansion. "All was lost except the spirit of enterprise", reminisces Aggarwal.

To come through fire, as it were, Hotline even created a sensational new TV set.

Deadlines. Determination. Dedication. Aggarwal is chronic for targets and deadlines. He's always saying "if you don't set dates, you don't know whether you've arrived".

Within days a team of dedicated professionals got down to rebuilding from scratch again. Production on a limited scale began in Hotline's adjacent building. And barely two weeks after the fire, Hotline TVs were back in the market.

Production levels were sustained at around two-thirds of pre-fire levels. With Quality Control and After-sales service continuously maintained at their highest standards.

Hotline 2001 Digital makes a spectacular return. One of Hotline's biggest achievements has been the reinstallation of all the specialised machinery for the manufacture and testing of the Colour T.V. '2001 Digital'. By mid-July 1986 the Company was able to put it back into the market and see an amazing rise in sales on this very fine performer, made in collaboration with Nordmende of West Germany.

In this period, to come through fire as it were, Hotline even created a sensational new colour TV set with a vertical format called 'EUROPA'.

"When all is lost, you could either look back or look forward."

Enter The New Factory. Fire destroyed and fire rebuilt. The fire of earnestness and enthusiasm planned afresh and on even a bigger scale. Hotline's new unit is a quantum leap in production facilities and technology. Firstly the building is infinitely larger than the old one with a production line that's totally state-of-the-art. The most up-to-date machines for both manufacture and testing have been imported from West Germany. Amongst these coveted assets are two new machines—The Computerised Colour Analyser and the Bump Test Machine.

With every modern input the Hotline Unit is now well poised to see a triple jump in its production capacity with greater levels of Quality Control at each and every stage of manufacture.

The future belongs to those who're there. Aggarwal has always had his eyes sharply focussed on the future. Hotline's successes have always come as a reward of his vision.

The new TV unit is a quantum leap in production facilities and technology.

Hotline is now set to launch 'Projection Televisions'. Two unique models—one which even works in daylight and another that does not require a screen.

As a part of its diversification plans, the Company plans to manufacture Telephone Instruments including a model without a handset. Dial a number and just sit back and speak. Another unique model incorporates a 'conferencing' facility that enables as many as four people to discuss and talk from their respective rooms.

People like you make great things happen at Hotline. In all these successes there has been the strongly felt force of encouragement, inspiration, support from Associates, Stockists, Dealers, Customers. "Each one has stood by us in our time of deepest trial."

Last but not least, if it were not for the ceaseless endeavour of each and every Hotline employee, the deadline of a 100 days would never have been met.

"Thank you for the hand!"

The will to achieve will always succeed HOTLINE

SPORTSWOMEN

Indian Apartheid

GRADUALLY but incessantly, women in India have been nibbling away at the sports headlines, historically a male-dominated arena. With Asiad fever on the rise, once again the spotlight is on women athletes as favourites for a major share of Indian medals at the Seoul Asian Games. Yet, despite their major contributions, sportswomen continue to be treated shabbily by the authorities. Increasingly, individual success stories are being written by determined women, not with the help of the authorities but despite the odds officialdom has placed before them.

Manifestations of this apartheid in Indian sport ranges from:

▸ Sexual harassment: Alpna Adhikari, a waterpolo player on her way to Delhi from Bombay for the national selections was molested on the train by a senior official of the Swimming Federation of India. The official denies it. Adhikari was dropped from the team. The waterpolo team, after qualifying for the world championships in the preliminary rounds, was denied permission to participate in the final round in Madrid though it was the only team in Asia to qualify.

▸ Discrimination: The Indian women's hockey team topped their Asiad gold with victory in the Asian Championships but were denied permission to defend their title this year.

▸ Ad hocism: Seven times national free-style swimming champion, Anita Sood was dropped from the Seoul Asiad squad despite the fact that her timings still remain far better than the rest.

These are not isolated instances but only more recent milestones on sports tracks where scores of similar stories lie buried in a heap of cynicism. Reacting to the innumerable complaints of sexual harassment that she has received as member of the governing council of the Society of National Institutes for Physical Education and Sports (SNIPES), H. Baxi said: "There are officials who would definitely try to take some sort of advantage when a team is to be selected. But the girls must fight back." She recalls the instance of a woman coach from the National Institute of Sports (NIS) Patiala complaining to her about another official making an advance. The coach resisted and this cost her a berth on the team for an international sports event at Tokyo. "I spoke to the director NIS and the president SNIPES that they must do something about it because there are far too many complaints on this, but no action was taken," Baxi recalled.

The players corroborate such discrimination. "Women who fight back are branded as fast," says Ayesha Misra, a lawyer who was dropped in the final selection camp for the Indian basketball team. She was later informed that she had been dropped because she "talked to boys" in the camp. "That's one point in Indian society where a woman is most vulnerable. So that is where they hit you," complains Ayesha. And Subina Arora, a former Delhi basketball player said equally despairingly: "It's during the selection stage that you're expected to please the coaches and selectors."

Rajbir Kaur, who is leading the women's hockey squad to Seoul, complained bitterly about the unjust denial of permission to participate in the Asian Championships. "It gets very frustrating since we give everything we have to our training and then they refuse permission for tournaments like this. We can't do a thing about it. That is why it is better to keep quiet," she said.

However, K.V. Sharma, the chief national coach of the Indian swimming team, explained away the attitude as being "traditional". Commenting on Anita's ouster from the Indian squad, he said dismissively: "No doubt Anita is the best but she can retire anyday. It is better to give exposure to the younger girls who will be of use to us longer." Retorting bitterly, Anita said: "I can understand the old making way for the new but only when the new are better," adding: "If I retire it will be out of sheer frustration." Acknowledging her brilliance, Eric Arnold, the Australian coach specially invited to groom the team for the Asian Games, said: "Without Anita, the Indian swimming team will be like Argentina without Maradona."

The story of harassment runs along similar lines even in athletics. Comments Vandana Rao: "There was a definite change in attitude after we became medal hopes." Bula Chowdhury, the teenage mermaid from West Bengal who had to struggle for private sponsors to finance her training after a futile wait for promised help from the state Government, said frankly: "If I had been a boy they would have been more interested." Asha Aggarwal, India's marathon star is still fighting to prove herself to the authorities. Forced to join the Asian Games athletics camp even though there were no adequate facilities for her, it was only when she protested at such a crucial juncture that the authorities finally asked her to attach her own coach to the camp. "What is really sad is that there is no encouragement from authorities," Asha said sadly.

Official denials of discrimination are scoffed at by the girls. Ayesha remembers the basketball camp at Patiala: "While the men were accommodated in the new hostel with attached bathrooms, the girls were put up in dirty rooms that looked like stables and bathrooms with flushes not working."

"In the ultimate analysis, it is a question of attitude, not just of the authorities but of the entire country," said Baxi. But if the results are anything to show, unless attitudes change soon, the explosive potential will continue to go unexploited.

TELUGU SAMACHARAM

Media Massage

HIS detractors have often described the Andhra Pradesh Information Commissioner and Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao's media relations manager, Veliveli Saidulu, as the Andhra Mcluhan. And Saidulu, 49, seems to be living up to that sobriquet with his decree that an embossed picture of the turbaned Rama Rao is to adorn all official releases, ranging from display advertisements to invitations for state functions. Says he: "Rama Rao is the fountain-head of deep inspiration. He is the people's leader. His photographs enhance the value of our advertisements."

Horrified officials and opposition politicians see Saidulu as attempting to distort Marshal Mcluhan's dictum—the medium is the message—to making the media a massage for NTR.

The trend-setting publicity format was first seen in the invitation to the annual state film awards function in April. This was soon after Saidulu took charge and the information directorate was renamed Telugu Samacharam. Since then Saidulu, who worked in the Indian postal service for 24 years, has been stamping invitations, publicity pamphlets and the Government's public relations monthly Telugu Velugu with NTR's photographs.

The alarm bells first sounded when Saidulu decreed that all advertising by government departments and state-owned companies would be channelised through the Telugu Samacharam. Embarrassed executives of companies like Hyderabad Allwyn, Andhra Pradesh Scooters and Andhra Pradesh Travel and Tourism Corporation made a beeline for Chief Secretary Shravan Kumar with the complaint that their jurisdiction was being invaded. Some 17 state units with an annual advertising bill of Rs 3.5 crore finally managed to get their advertisements routed through private firms but the Telugu Samacharam continues to hold on to advertisements totalling Rs 6.5 crore.

But the controversy continues, the main point of contention being whether the Samacharam can claim the 15 per cent commission given by newspapers to advertising agencies. Saidulu claims it can, arguing: "Advertisements are being drawn up in a more professional way with clearer copy and better lay-out than the Government could get by paying the commission to some ad firms."

Invitations with NTR's photograph; (below) Saidulu with NTR: overkill

But the Indian and Eastern Newspapers Society (IENS), the body of newspaper proprietors which also gives accreditation to advertising agencies, continues to be apprehensive that the Andhra Pradesh Government will use the Samacharam as a lever to muzzle the press. It fears that by centralising state advertising, the Government will be able to starve newspapers not favourably disposed to it. NTR wrote to IENS President Basudev Ray allaying these fears but the newspapers continue to hold out.

Under Saidulu, the Telugu Samacharam has sprouted three other divisions—news service, research and reference and training. The news service division will appoint stringers at all 1,104 mandal headquarters to gather intelligence on government programmes and report official functions. These will be made available to newspapers also.

Saidulu has stocked his office with an assortment of books—on the British theatre, dictionaries and NTR's speeches. Said Saidulu: "In many cases, newspaper offices do not even have dictionaries so a research and reference library facility is to be set up at all mandal headquarters." Nearly 300 Telugu Samachara Vignana kendrams with an auditorium and a reading-room in one wing and the Government correspondent in the other have been set up. Buying books, building libraries and creating kendras is visualised in the run-up to what Saidulu calls "developing real journalists". But, in practice, with photographs of NTR displayed at all Samacharam offices, the exercise is only a plug for him.

Senior administrators object to this blatant publicity programme for the chief minister. Said one: "It makes sense to carry the chief minister's photograph with an appeal for funds for flood victims or listing the achievements of his pet welfare programmes. But it is ridiculous to carry his picture doing namaste to promote a tourist bus service. It demeans the office."

Saidulu dismisses the flak he is attracting as a motivated campaign by those who are against the chief minister or him. A former postmaster general claims he is " a generalist and not a journalist," but his detractors say he is just a sycophant. Recalled one: "He opened a post office in Rayalaseema in NTR's constituency before becoming information commissioner." Whatever the connection, Saidulu shows that old habits die hard by giving his mentor a blatant overdose of publicity.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Private Plans

GOVERNMENT advertising is finally going glitzy. Being elbowed aside is the shabby, sloganeering era of the Directorate of Audio-Visual Publicity (DAVP), which narrowly escaped the guillotine recently. Entering is the world of private advertising. Madison Avenue, by proxy, has slunk into the musty corridors of power and patronage in New Delhi.

Increasingly, ministries are turning to the ad men, until not too long ago considered flagships of consumerism. Advertising budgets are being expanded or juggled by the ministries and ad agencies have formed new consortia to meet the Government's desire to be packaged in seductive new clothes, with the designer labels showing.

The Department of Tourism has enlisted about eight advertising agencies and hiked its publicity budget from Rs 2.5 crore last year to Rs 7 crore, nearly all of it for a blitzkrieg abroad. The Ministry of Health and Family Welfare became a magnet for ad agencies with a fat Rs 105-crore for its family planning blitz. The External Publicity Division of the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) has also decided to throw out the frayed, Third World look of its advertising efforts and introduce the laminated, manicured look. The railways are chugging even faster on the private advertising track. And gingerly stepping behind them are the National Wasteland Development Board, the high-profile Ganga Development Authority, and the Department of Women's Welfare in the Ministry of Human Resources Development. Suddenly, in ministries and government departments, a feverish race is on to revamp image projection techniques.

Why has image become so important? The mandarins of government have realised that if image makes the man—and often presidents and prime ministers—it can also make government. Or at times even substitute for it. The big brother image of much government advertising has not gone down too well; family planning being the most conspicuous disaster zone. The government media campaign against dowry or alcohol or income tax evaders has left the people equally cold. The Government now wants to drop the big from big brother. And in its frenzied quest to hurry along social change, and hang on to the hem of the 21st century it needs the ad men. The logic: if you can sell soap suds to ultra conservative households, you can sell social attitudes. The Government's sudden reach for professional communications experts and advertising agencies is due in large measure to its realisation that 30 years of massive financial inputs into family planning have yielded little. Says Krishna Kumar, deputy minister for family welfare: "Thus far the family planning programme had an aura of a government programme—as if the Government was merely target-oriented, an army of government people pursuing the people. We would like to change this to a demand from the people themselves for family planning."

However, this was too tall an order for the Government's advertising boys. As the minister himself lamely admitted: "We have a media set-up in the Centre and in the states, but government scales being what they are, the talent is just not good enough....The message put out is trite and mediocre."

With a three-year intensive campaign all set to be launched this month, the ministry is in a hurry to find the right medium for the message. The situation was, therefore, tailor-made for the whiz-kids of private advertising agencies. A consortium of five advertising agencies—Hindustan Thompson Associates, Tara Sinha Associates (TSA), Ogilvy Benson and Mather, Lintas and Rediffusion—was formed to tackle various aspects of family planning.

A significant entrant into this charmed world is the MEA's External Publicity Division. To brush up the country's overseas image, the ministry turned to private communications firms and advertising agencies. The front runners are Visual Communications, Milestone and Rediffusion. In addition to the Rs 1.8-crore spent in the missions abroad, the publicity division's annual budget of Rs 2.4 crore was juggled around to give the necessary muscle to such an image building exercise.

The MEA, in collaboration with the BBC, launched India Unveiled—a film—outletted at 300 stations abroad. Through Asian Films a slot in the Public Broadcasting System (PBS) in the US was captured. And finally, to keep up the momentum of interest built up by the Festival of India, the Government has hired an American public relations firm. The Follow the Festival campaign has a budget of over Rs 1 crore.

In the railways too, the image-making exercise is going at full throttle. Ad agencies have been asked to design a new logo, replacing the familiar steam engine puffing down a curving track. The accent is now on a modern, abstract logo to go with the hi-tech image those in power want to project. There are also plans for a new railway mascot, along the lines of the utterly-butterly Amul girl or Air-India's maharajah.

Periodically, the railways has been projecting sports personalities—P.T. Usha, M.A.K. Pataudi and Michael Ferreira—who brightly inform television viewers that railway property is your property, and should be kept clean. Shyam Benegal has also been commissioned to make Yatra—the great train journey—to replace the forgettable Safarnama. Officials say that Hrishikesh Mukherjee has been asked to make a comedy series to be telecast next April.

Another advertising bonanza is the Ganga Development Authority's plans for Clarion, Ulka and Edge which have organised themselves into a consortium for the purpose. The Ministry of Human Resources Development, especially the Women's Welfare Department, has asked private agencies to conduct research studies on issues like child marriage and dowry so that they can become subjects for advertising campaigns.

The only casualty in this frantic race of hard-boiled communications professionals has been the DAVP, till recently the Government's chief window-dresser. Rumours that the department will be wound up has for the time being abated, but its functions in the future are likely to be somewhat altered and the organisation streamlined—and some of the employees shifted elsewhere.

Officials in DAVP and the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting lament that they have been hamstrung by a shortage of money. The DAVP also finds itself constrained by the low advertisement rates fixed 10 years ago by the Rate Advisory Committee.

But all this hard sell notwithstanding, serious doubts remain about the nature of the product being marketed through the multi-crore build up. Says Tara Sinha of TSA: "I can go blue in the face talking about the need for family planning but if the man in the field does not do his job, nothing is achieved." Equally, tourists can be lured into the country but if the infrastructural back up is not adequate then they are hardly likely to return.

However, for the moment the window-dressing fever is in full swing; ministries are scanning brochures of professional outfits hoping that their packaging may deliver the goods which years of drab press hand-outs and dry newspaper pull-outs have not been able to achieve. Much to the amusement of ad men the Government has finally had to appeal to the world of advertising to help change its image.

GOAN VIGNETTES AND OTHER POEMS
by ASHOK MAHAJAN
Oxford University Press
Price: Rs 25; Pages: 64

THERE is no greater testimony to the health of the various versions of English flourishing in ex-colonial countries than the emergence of a continuous burst of new voices from continents all over the Third World. While nothing comparable to the output of writers in Africa, South America, the West Indies and the Middle East is produced in India yet, the signs in the last few years have been encouraging: Arun Kolhatkar's Jejuri and Vikram Seth's The Humble Administrator's Garden both picked up the Commonwealth Poetry Prize; Salman Rushdie, Amitav Ghosh and Farokh Dhondy have established their reputations in the realm of new fiction.

Whether or not Ashok Mahajan's first book of poetry, Goan Vignettes and Other Poems reaches other shores, it is a bouncing desi offspring with decidedly local features and colour. Mahajan is a telecommunications engineer in the Indian Army and a science writer as well. It's probably just as well he does not carry the burden of an English literature degree and the postures that come with it. Mahajan's heart, and more significantly his tongue, is in the right place—giving both his sentiments and his syllables a homely air. No picturesque romanticism for him but straightforward plain-speak:

Tourists note
Fresco-amber
in Ajanta art.
I know this pigment from pools of bovine piss at any vegetable mart.

Though his description sometimes tends to get wordy and dense, (Sunset at Colva, Anjuna Beach) Mahajan is a deft scene-painter. On the Cortalim Ferry

Up-river boats gleam like game
In forests of the dockyard...
While ships in harbour beyond glow as lions on guard.

But it is really when Mahajan bumps into people that he springs into action, doing quick thumb-nail sketches and creating identifiable archetypes. Seth Agarwal, of the "dirt-laminated" footsoles, is a renowned hoarder and adulterator of Johri Bazar, Jaipur, adept "at cheating a rural clientele at the scales". The Truck Driver keeps going "on the hooch in his system" and "the crisp notes" with which he greases official palms. The Rickshawallah, who is "one more spoke in the felly of his rickshaw wheel", has a wife and child in the village "bonded to a bhoomihar".

Mahajan is even better in the vignettes on Goa, capturing the tipsy flavour, the salty tang, the ballad rhythms and the unashamed provinciality of the place. His Goan characters are true to their grain and their calling: the aunt who "has a horticultural air"; Joe d'Silva who loves soccer and dreams of being a "Dempo player"; School-teacher Philomena Rebello's "sartorial passion far exceeds her pedagogic zeal".

Mahajan is more successful when he is light-fingered, strumming the strings with a gentle irony and a quick wit. His attempts at weaving history and legend into the fabric of his poetry (Vasco da Gama, Iberian Proselytizer) do not come off convincingly. What Mahajan needs to guard against is his tendency to pick up bad habits from fellow poets whom he perhaps mistakenly envies as his betters and adopts as his mentors. Certain words in Mahajan's vocabulary have come straight out of a dictionary, contributing more to obscurity than illumination. Some line-breaks are arbitrary while the punctuation in some poems goes wayward in an attempt to be experimental. Mahajan has a good thing going for him if he remains true to his instincts.

SILICOSIS CASES

Gathering Dust

A mini-Bhopal is being enacted every day in the slate-pencil industry of Mandsaur, in north-west Madhya Pradesh. More than 2,000 slate-pencil workers have died of silicosis, an incurable occupational lung disease, over the past 25 years. In the villages around Mandsaur, hundreds of others, afflicted by the disease, are doomed to the same dusty death as once a worker contracts silicosis there is no hope of survival. The village of Multanpura, a major centre of the industry, is referred to as 'the village of widows' because of the large number of women widowed by silicosis. But what is equally tragic is the legal implications behind a recent Supreme Court notice following a letter-petition made by a silicosis victim seeking relief to hapless slate-pencil workers.

The Supreme Court notice to the Madhya Pradesh Government on the plight of slate-pencil workers is a classic example of the fate of public interest litigation in the country. In spite of protests made by human rights activists and victims—a media campaign built up by 'crusading' journalists—which snowballed into a case and a judgement in the petitioner's favour, nothing has actually been achieved. Chief Justice P.N. Bhagwati's notice to the Madhya Pradesh Government last month in reality was no different from what his predecessor Y.V. Chandrachud had directed two years ago to put a stop to the horrifying mass deaths of workers.

An on-the-spot investigation made by INDIA TODAY revealed that barring only one, none of the directives of the Supreme Court, issued on February 6, 1984 in writ petition No 5143 of 1980 workmen of slate-pencil industry vs State of Madhya Pradesh and others), have been implemented so far. The judgement last month on the second letter-petition from Mangilal Porwal, 42, of Mandsaur, who was afflicted by the disease almost 15 years after he left the job as a slate-pencil cutter in Tholk industry, has now once again revived the issue. Porwal says he decided to move the Supreme Court because he felt that "the case I had filed for compensation in the labour court will be probably decided only after my death". About 100 compensation suits—some since 1978—are still pending in the labour court.

Porwal; and (right) state-pencil factory, Multanpura: slow death

Photographs by N.K. SINGH

In spite of protests made by human rights activists and victims, nothing has been achieved to put a stop to the horrifying mass deaths of workers.

The job-disease relationship was first established in 1968 following a medical survey. But attention was focussed on the problem only 10 years later when Indore Trade Unionist and free lance journalist Jawaharlal Rathore wrote a series of articles in Nai Dunia, the premier Hindi daily of the state. While Rathore diligently followed up the story with the zeal of a crusader, Indian Express front-paged the horrifying news in all its editions and later launched a campaign championing the cause of workers. Following the publicity, former prime minister Indira Gandhi wrote a personal "strongly-worded" letter to the state Government. The Institute of Occupational Diseases conducted a survey and the Indore Engineering College designed a device to reduce dust pollution which causes silicosis. The public concern culminated in a four-year-long legal battle in the Supreme Court which directed in 1984 that:

► "All slate-pencil manufacturing units should be asked to instal exhaust appliances specially designed by Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited (BHEL) for the industry. Licences of the defaulting units should be cancelled. It is not enough to prosecute employers for breach of safety regulations, which often result in imposition of small fines. Licences of factories guilty of violation of safety regulations should be revoked or cancelled.

► The chief inspector of factories will enquire into the efficacy of masks provided to workers as safety device and try to find a more effective substitute.

► Compensation cases filed by workers for injuries and deaths should be disposed of expeditiously.

► The chief inspector of factories will submit his report to the Government within three months about whether the factories have taken all the safety precautions obligatory under the Factories Act."

Interestingly except for the last—the chief inspector of factories submitted his report on May 2, 1984—none of the other four directives of the Supreme Court have been implemented. Apart from one factory which had already installed the BHEL-designed apparatus at the time of the order, none of the 140 units has bothered to spend money on this pollution control device. Most of them have installed locally-made devices which are barely effective.

On enquiry, the labour commissioner's office in Indore confirmed that they had not so far cancelled or revoked a single licence "under the Factories Act". A spokesman of the department said: "The chief inspector of factories has no authority to cancel a licence." The labour officials say they have done their duty and "written" to the health department to enquire into the efficacy of the masks. Moreover, even the law the state Government had specially enacted to protect the workers from silicosis following world-wide publicity to the problem has not been enforced. On December 28, 1984, the state Government brought the slate-pencil industry within the purview of "dangerous operation" in the Madhya Pradesh Factories Rules, 1962, and ordered, inter alia: "The process of cutting slate-pencil stones shall not be carried out unless the cutting instruments are fitted with efficient exhaust draught to remove dust. Women or adolescents shall not be allowed to cut stones or make grooves on the stones. Packing or sorting of pencils and other operations shall not be carried out in the same shed in which stones are cut. Regular medical check-ups of the workers at the cost of employers will be a must. Workers declared medically unfit would not be allowed to work and would be provided with medical help at the cost of employers. No worker will be allowed to cut stones without a mask."

Unfortunately not a single rule has been enforced even after one and a half years. Labour officials posted at Mandsaur, when asked, pleaded their helplessness. "At the most we can start prosecution, which may linger for a long time and even if the defaulting unit is convicted it faces a maximum penalty of Rs 75," said the inspector of factories. Even more ironical is the case of the welfare fund constituted by a special enactment to provide relief to ailing workers. By a 1983 act the factory owners were asked to pay a welfare cess of Rs 2.50 per thousand packets of slate-pencils. The moment the law came into force, the production of slate-pencil units was lowered from one lakh packets per month to 15,000. But owners are not paying welfare cess even on this reduced production and prosecutions have been launched against 16 of them. Only Rs 16,000 has been collected in the fund so far as against the target of Rs 30 lakh per year. Even this amount is lying unutilised with the district administration.

The Supreme Court notice issued last month has this time brought about a marginal change. In the wake of the directive, cheaper but ineffective dust control devices have been installed by the majority of factories. The devices prolong the workers' life by a few years—earlier they used to contract silicosis within four years—giving them a breathing space of eight years. But ultimately in the final analysis death continues to stalk them as remorselessly as before.

—N.K. SINGH in Mandsaur and Indore

SLATE-PENCIL INDUSTRY

Deadly Bondage

TO THE workers in Mandsaur's slate-pencil workshops death by silicosis has become synonymous with their work. Investigations revealed that some were forced to work because they were bonded to their masters, paying off the loans with their lives. "I know that working in the industry causes death. But I've to do it because I had taken an advance of Rs 3,000 from the master for my wedding. The custom is that one cannot leave the job unless he repays the loan. I must work for the master otherwise I shall be beaten up," said Shaqoor, 18, a slate-pencil 'cutter' of Multanpura village.

Most of the workers are aware—they have seen hundreds of others die—that silicosis is deadlier than tuberculosis and is caused by breathing in silica dust while cutting soft stone to make slate-pencils. The dense dust thrown up by the electrically-operated saws envelop the poorly ventilated and primitive worksheds. Every person inside inhales the dust, which settles deep inside the lungs causing irreversible fibrous changes. The dust gradually eats the lungs away and the worker generally dies a painful death as there is no treatment for the disease. "Once silicosis makes it's appearance," says a study done by the National Institute of Occupational Health (NIOH), "even the withdrawal of the worker from further exposure is unlikely to change the course of the disease."

Cutters working on the cutting edge—shooting a jet of dust barely 14 inches from the cutter's face—are more prone to the disease. No cutter is known to survive in the industry for more that 10 years. Even the others—including about 500 children—working under the same shed inhale the dangerous dust. Although the Government denies it, children of 12 years, sometimes even less, are forced to work in the sheds to sustain their dying parents. The NIOH study in 1982 revealed that 51 per cent of the workers had "positive evidence of silicosis". And even though the factories are virtual death chambers, there are about 12,000 workers employed in the industry (including mines), one-tenth of them cutters working in the 140 registered and an equal number of unregistered units.

N.K. SINGH

Lad showing X-ray of a victim

The pollution is not restricted to within the sheds. The dust naturally drifts out into the neighbourhood. "Many persons who never worked in a slate-pencil factory have been afflicted by silicosis," confirmed Dr R.K. Lad, the chief medical officer of Mandsaur Civil Hospital. All this horrifying evidence notwithstanding, precious little is being done to either change the situation or provide relief to the hapless workers.

Today, instead of worrying about the quantity of work we get done, let's worry about the quality of work we do.

Numbers can be an amazing disguise.

Take India for instance.

Last year, we rolled out nearly seventy five thousand cars.

Almost a hundred and seventy thousand motorcycles.

Over sixty two lakh wrist watches.

Over six lakh colour television sets.

India in fact was, and is, one of the ten largest industrial nations in the world.

Impressive numbers.

But numbers which can't hide a truth.

For honestly, when was the last time you bought a product of top class international quality that was made entirely in India?

The point, friend, is simple.

The pursuit of excellence is a virtue that is coming in a poor second.

Making a fast buck is leading by miles.

But there is a lot to be optimistic about.

If people like you, in your own sphere push for that little extra.

Especially when 'there isn't any time' or 'profits will suffer'.

When you feel proud of the job you do.

When workmanship and care actually show in the product you make.

At least that's the way at Buckau Wolf see it.

We could have utilised all this space and money to emphasize the sophisticated machines we make.

Those difficult projects we handled with ease.

How profitable we are.

Our access to the technology of our West German principals, Krupp.

But of what use would that be if we continued mass producing the substandard.

Instead of setting new standards.

In addition to illustrating the countries to which we have exported our engineering skills, this map also illustrates how much our investment in quality consciousness has paid off. Today, Buckau Wolf is reaping the benefits of an international reputation in engineering excellence.

Growth is the essence of progress for a person as much as for a corporate body. We started as tea traders back in 1911 and today we have matured into a multi-product company making a sizeable contribution to India's prosperity.

All round growth

Over the years, more specifically in the last decade, we have grown multi-dimensionally. From 1977 to 1986, gross income increased from Rs. 188.32 crores to Rs. 356 crores; profit before tax from Rs. 4.58 crores to Rs. 23.6 crores; dividend distribution from Rs. 1.6 crores to Rs. 6.13 crores.

During the last decade our contribution to the national and state exchequers has been a cumulative Rs. 327.7 crores. Over the same period, the per capita income of our employees increased from Rs. 13,294 to Rs. 26,386 per annum. The Company's product range grew from packet tea to coffee, instant coffee, paper, spices, industrial machinery and mobikes. And all those associated with our growth have also become its beneficiaries.

Doing India proud in the world

In accordance with the national priorities, we have shifted our emphasis from export of bulk commodities to the export of value added products. Our success shows in the increase in the value added export earnings from Rs. 7.87 crores in 1976 to Rs. 31.25 crores in 1986 (estimated). In the last decade alone we have contributed Rs. 415 crores by way of export earnings from all our products.

Fair deal for Brooke Bonders

Healthy industrial relations have been the hallmark of our growth years with not a single all-India industrial unrest over the last two decades. Responsible for this enviable state of affairs is the maturity and foresight of the Brooke Bond

Employees' Federation, the apolitical apex representative body of over 8000 Brooke Bonders, and the Company Management. The aim is to provide security to all Brooke Bonders well beyond retirement, an objective that is further fulfilled by a life long pension scheme. In the Platinum Jubilee year of the Company, the introduction of an Employee Deposit Scheme will provide added security for Brooke Bonders in their old age.

Trend-setting landmark

And, now there is 'Brookefields', our new Corporate Complex at Marathahalli, near Bangalore, one of the few corporate complexes in India located in a rural setting. Built on a generous 20 acre site, the Complex comprises administrative blocks, a training centre, a club house with recreational facilities as well as residential accommodation for key management personnel. Our move away from the city is as much motivated by a sincere desire not to overstrain the already strained urban infrastructure as our determination to create a milieu conducive to better working conditions for Brooke Bonders.

Brooke Bond India Limited

Growth all round is our cup of tea.

A few words from Brooke Bond India- a company that has grown impressively in 75 years

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

◆ The list of stop-overs on her star trek reads like a who's who of assorted stars and studs—from Sly Stallone to Kabir Bedi—not to forget the broken marriage en route. With her starship now on the other side of the constellation, Persis Khambatta, is set to find a permanent docking place.

On reaching Bombay last year for the shooting of Shingora, she announced that she was looking out for Mr Right. The search has at last borne fruit—if only in a detective agency in Canada instead of the arc-lit studios of Bombay. Prince Charming is a wealthy Gujarati called Naren Parekh who runs a private detective agency in Toronto. He has, according to Persis, other private credentials: "has eyes like Michael Caine's; is a very sexy man; I love him; it'll work this time". God, Hollywood and Bombay willing.

Khambatta: wedding bells

The Ortegas: sugar 'n' spice

◆ After the sugar, came the spice. And for Nicaragua President Daniel Ortega and his wife, it was India come alive in all its rustic flavours. It was during their goodwill trip last fortnight, when Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi suddenly decided to drive down his guests for a desi afternoon at Pragati Maidan's special exhibit, Hamari Gali. Out came the red carpet, the bugles, Muhammad Yunus himself. As the guests slurped juicy rasgullas, gulped down giant golgappas and sipped Kashmiri kahwa, star bear Munna and a couple of monkeys did them a jig. For the first lady of Nicaragua there were green bangles and a liberal spread of mehndi. "The golgappas were delicious," murmured an appreciative Ortega. "Very good!" Now that's what's called chit-chat diplomacy.

◆ "Why not a poem about a pile of shit that God dropped and named Calcutta? How it swarms, stinks, lives and gets bigger and bigger," Gunter Grass had mused in The Flounder. Last fortnight, the West German writer, poet, artist and activist seemed to be getting his metaphors together for that poem as he moved into Calcutta—books, wife and baggage—to "write, draw, see, listen and yes, smell..." "For me to come to Calcutta is to come back to Calcutta," said the 58-year-old writer. "Calcutta is a city that's radically changed me."

Grass: poem for Calcutta

◆ There she was, the Princess of Wales beaming for the cameras on her Australia tour, in a £ 60 ready-to-wear dress bought from a common London boutique. And Naresh Gujral couldn't believe his eyes. Because that dress—and the 3,900 others like it—happened to be designed by Gujral, who produces garments for the French fashion house Rene Derhy. So much for royalty that prides itself on not wearing anything non-British. "It's such a compliment to have Lady Di wearing my dress. More so since she bought it off the rack without knowing whose it was," exulted the designer, caressing an assembly-line likeness.

Gujral: royal seamster

◆ But East is East and West is West and never the twain shall meet. Don't tell Rudyard Kipling but as long as there's L. Subramaniam, they shall. The famous violinist's quest for fusion has now merged into a new stream—the score for ITV's film on the Ganga, Pradakshina. The California-based musician who was in the capital last fortnight, remains an Indian at heart. "I've done jazz selectively. My priority is Indian classical," he said and is now doing an anthology of classical music for the French Government.

Record Breaking Games

The 10th Asian Games at Seoul have seen an unprecedented 111 sportsmen and women bettering the existing marks in the first week alone. India started poorly, however, and seems unlikely to repeat its performance at the New Delhi Asiad.

COVER STORY 70

Mixed Signals

There have been unexpected twists to the relationship between the President and the prime minister. Even though their ties have been strained for some time, Zail Singh sent a commendatory letter recently to Rajiv Gandhi. But the tensions remain.

CURRENT EVENTS 22

Militancy on the Move

Rising Hindu militancy is now being met with the formation of private Muslim armies (the Adam Sena, Ali Sena, Al-Jehad and the Jehadi Lashkar). These armies though small pose a threat to communal harmony—as was evident in the clashes in Delhi last month.

SPECIAL REPORT 82

The Reward Bonanza

A 15-month-old scheme for rewarding customs, excise and revenue intelligence officials with a percentage of the tax evasion they detect has resulted in handsome awards to many. But it has also resulted in new tensions within the tax-collecting departments.

Transforming the Temple

Contrary to the fears of a backlash following the take-over of the Vaishno Devi temple, the move has been widely welcomed by pilgrims and Hindu groups, not the least because it has been accompanied by a major face-lift for the area around the temple.

Boom Industry

Suddenly petrochemicals are the new rage in industry, with virtually every large business house rushing into a field that has seen phenomenal growth rates in the last five years, with the prospect of even faster growth in the next five years, and profits to match.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR

NINE years ago, when PRABHU CHAWLA, 40, started writing for INDIA TODAY as a part-time break from teaching economics, his main journalistic assets were initiative and drive. Over the years since then, he has matured into one of the finest investigative reporters, become a familiar face on the political beat with an array of contacts in high places that is the envy of his contemporaries, and repeatedly made news with his exclusive reports—on postal censorship in Delhi, jail deaths in Tamil Nadu, a timber scandal involving the then Himachal chief minister, and a great deal else.

Last month, Chawla was among the two recipients of the Feroze Gandhi Memorial Award for 1985-86, receiving from Maharashtra Governor Shanker Dayal Sharma a cash award of Rs 11,000 and a certificate. The citation spoke of his "meticulous reporting of national affairs and investigative stories". Even in an age when awards for journalists are proliferating, there can be no disputing the professional recognition that has come to Chawla for a reportorial record that is difficult to beat.

HAM-HANDED

Your exhaustively researched cover story on the Pan Am hijacking ("Pakistan's Bloody Blunder", September 30) goes a long way in explaining what actually transpired at Karachi airport. After reading the plethora of bloody details in your article, one could not but agree with Rajiv Gandhi that the operations of the Pakistani security forces were nothing short of 'ham-handed".

New Delhi — SUSHIL MEHTANI

■ The Pan Am hijack once again focuses on the hazards of air travel in this era of lunacy and revenge. It may thus be advisable to provide all the passengers with bullet-proof vests so that at least some lives may be saved, in spite of lax security at various international airports.

Bombay — N.K. SOMANI

CORRECTION

In the report 'The Political Nexus' (INDIA TODAY, September 30, 1986), it was stated that Punjab Director General of Police J.F. Ribeiro had written letters to the Government naming Harcharan Singh Brar as among the politicians who were suspected to have been involved in trying to get the release of Waryam Singh, one of the suspects in the Muktsar killing and that the Faridkot SSP Rajan Gupta had been approached by certain politicians for his release. Subsequent enquiries have established that no such letters were written by Ribeiro and that Gupta had not been approached by Brar and that Brar was not involved in Waryam Singh's release. We regret any distress or embarrassment caused to Mr Brar or his family.

—Editor

UNFAIR CONCLUSION

Your article ("Twin Trouble", July 31) comparing the performance of our company with that of Nelco was unfair and the conclusions drawn erroneous. Tata Burroughs is one of the more successful companies in our industry. It has made profits from the very first year

Fuel line to the front line.

Mid-air refueling may be the most demanding mission a pilot—or a plane—can take on. When one plane has to refuel different types of aircraft at different speeds, the demands multiply.

Which may explain why there are so many C-130 Hercules tankers in service around the world.

The KC-130's four turboprops give it the power to carry a 56,000-pound fuel load on a typical mission, and all the speed it needs for in-flight jet refueling. At the same time, the proven handling characteristics of the Hercules aircraft make it steady and stable at the lower speeds and altitudes required in refueling helicopters.

There's very little downtime with a KC-130. When there are no refueling missions scheduled, it can convert to a freighter in hours, and airlift 40,000 pounds of cargo to the undeveloped air strips other planes can't get into or out of.

At least seven of the world's air forces are flying the C-130 Hercules tanker today, and more have included it in their planning. They've learned that it delivers a lot more than fuel. It delivers confidence.

of its operations, declaring dividends every year.

In a fast growing business such as ours we need to change course periodically. As part of this process of adjustment we closed down our manufacturing plant in SEEPZ which was making printers. Contrary to the statement made by your correspondent the manufacturing business was throughout profitable.

Because we are an open company we made an immediate announcement of having offered a voluntary separation plan to 26 employees who were engaged in this activity.

This announcement of ours was unfortunately used by your correspondent to come to the conclusion that the company was in difficulty and was going the same way as another company in our group which has a different record.

MURKY DEALINGS

Your article on lobbyists ("The Hidden Persuaders, September 15), is a discerning expose of the murky goings-on in the bhawans of New Delhi. The Government that claimed to work and the one that claims to work faster are both trapped by the bureaucracy that quietly subverts any new system.

New Delhi — NIRMALA VAIDYANATHAN

■ Being a lobbyist myself, but from a non-military background, I can say this: the armed forces gives a rigorous training to their personnel in 'manoeuvres' which they utilise to great advantage in the 'strategy' of post-retirement lobbying and they deserve a 'sabash'.

New Delhi — S.K. DACHAN

■ With reference to the remark that my company is "a big name in the arms business" in your article on "The Hidden Persuaders", I would like to state that since inception we have not sold anything to the Ministry of Defence and further that Lieutenant-General M.N. Batra in my company is dealing only with the energy sector.

New Delhi — M.M. BHAGAT

The error is regretted. —Editor

TROUBLED COMMUNITY

Your article has succeeded in factually depicting the tragic dilemma that Sikhs outside Punjab ("A Desperate Dilemma", September 15) face. If Hindus feel that the Sikhs have not 'boldly and vociferously' denounced terrorism, they are also not taking into account that Sikhs have also been deprived of their families and fortunes by rampaging mobs. Did the majority of Hindus 'boldly and vociferously' denounce that?

Pilani — SANDEEP MOOKERJEE

■ Your special report on the state of the Sikh community living outside Punjab is timely and thought-provoking. It is unfortunate that the hard-working and enterprising Sikh community feels alienated on its own soil. Sikhs at large must rise to the occasion and denounce the power-hungry politicians and vested interests exploiting the situation.

Hyderabad — G. VENKATESAN

■ Any right-thinking person would agree that the process of alienation was started by the Sikhs themselves and not by Hindus. And unfortunately, they are going further and further away by acts of terrorism and violence. They should ensure that their gurudwaras do not become a refuge for criminals and re-establish their credibility.

Secunderabad — P.S. CHANDRASHEKAR

FACETIOUS FACE-LIFT

Your report on the Indian Youth Congress ("The Rajiv Rage", September 15) has tried to trace the change taking place in the organisation. But the attractive faces and English-speaking "sophisticated" persons are as much alien to the masses as were Sanjay's "rustic rowdies".

Delhi — SURAJ YADAV

■ The Youth Congress jamboree was nothing more than a ludicrous and shameful exercise to get rid of Sanjay Gandhi's contributions to the party. The reorganisation would have been both more successful and meaningful had the young Congressmen instead laid down an ideal of working.

Patna — ASHUTOSH GUPTA

SOUR GRAPES

The launching of his own party by Gundu Rao ("Rabble Rousing", September 15) will not surprise those familiar with his style of politics. After his expulsion from the Congress(I) party, he is trying to capitalise on the disenchantment of the so-called Indira loyalists with the new leadership.

Bombay — G.C. PUJARI

■ It seems Gundu Rao and Pranab Mukherjee (expelled Congress-I members) are behaving like the jackal who condemned the grapes as sour when it failed to get them anything despite tremendous effort. If the Congress(I) led by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi was so intolerably bad, why did they not leave the party much before voluntarily, without creating such a lot of noise?

Cuttack — ASHOK KUMAR SARANGI

BOLD ACTION

We agree with P.C. Sethi ("I am not crazy", September 15). Every telephone owner in India would want to kick the operator, but we are cowards and swallow humiliation without taking a stand. Sethi has actually done it without bothering about the consequences—he is a brave man and I congratulate him for it. I wish R.N. Mirdha would also occasionally show his face in telephone exchanges instead of coming on television every week.

Gwalior — KUNWAR JAI SINGH

■ Had I been the ex-home minister, I would have carried a Sten gun with me to complain to the telephone authorities. High-handedness is the only method they understand.

Calcutta — BHARAT SANGHVI

■ Whenever I visit Delhi and book a call home I never get to see my trunk call mature. Instead of undermining Mr Sethi's image nation-wide, he should have been congratulated for his efforts to single-handedly change things in the telephone exchange.

Korba — ROSHAN KUMAR

OVER-ZEALOUS DEFENCE

Your article on the economy ("The Reliance Example", September 15) overstepped to defend Reliance of its shabby deals. Mr Jha's attempt to exonerate Dhirubhai Ambani from the wholesale infringement of the country's business ethos, economy and systems is inconceivable.

If one Ambani is allowed to grow unchecked, then the country will have many more like him. And if the Reliance way of business is an answer to unemployment, why doesn't the Government legalise prostitution and smuggling as well? The licensing system should indeed be reviewed but Reliance also should not go unpunished.

POLL 4 RESULTS—INDUSTRY

A Premium on Business Ethics

IN the fourth opinion poll, INDIA TODAY invited its readers to nominate the person who, in their opinion, has been the top achiever in Indian industry, and to rank seven others in order of preference. Over 15,700 readers responded to the poll. For an independent assessment of the results, INDIA TODAY commissioned Dr V.L. Mote, a founder-professor of the Indian Institute of Management, Ahmedabad, who also holds a doctorate in statistical methods from the State University of North Carolina in the US. His analysis:

RAPID industrial development has been a national goal since Independence, and the country has certainly achieved a great deal in terms of strengthening and diversifying its industrial base. As one result, Indian industry is no longer synonymous with textiles. The public, private and cooperative sectors have all contributed to this achievement, and also to some of the failings along the way.

This poll provided an excellent opportunity to understand the literate, urban Indian assessment of the men behind some of the achievements, of the values that are seen as worth cherishing while striving for growth and profits, and of the 'qualitative' aspects of business achievement.

In this context, the final rankings that emerge from the responses of over 15,700 readers—and the reasons given for the rankings—are both important and revealing. For instance, financial success has not been an overriding factor, nor has growth. The participants in the poll seem to have cast their net wider, and taken seven broad yardsticks into account while making their assessments: quality of the products manufactured, customer orientation, concern for employees and the developing of people, concern for values and ethics in business, contribution to society as a whole, growth in profits, assets and returns to investors, and innovation.

The participants have placed J.R.D. Tata at the top, closely followed by Dhirubhai Ambani, while Swraj Paul has come last among the eight. (A record 90 participants had their responses tie in with the final rankings.) Tata seems to have scored very heavily on a number of counts: pioneering achievements in such areas as aviation, the continuation of the group's traditions of business ethics, the emphasis on developing people (recalling

A record total of 90 readers sent in entries that corresponded with the final national score. To select the three winners, a panel of four judges assessed the reasons they had given for ranking J.R.D. Tata first. The judges selected the winners on the basis of their understanding of the quality of Tata's contribution to Indian industry and business.

First prize:
Viswanathan Ramachandran

Second prize: Venkat Ramesh
3/3 Twinkle Star, Chembur,
Bombay

Assessment: "JRD Tata has pioneered the establishment of several core sector industries. Today the Tata group headed by him is synonymous with enterprise, dynamism, nationalism and above all high ethical standards."

Third prize: Pankaj Adhikari
31/1 Radha Ballav Road, Naihati,
24 Parganas (North), West Bengal

Matsushita's motto: we do not make batteries, we make people), the fact that Tata products spell quality and reliability, and also that he has respected workers' suggestions, and kept the interests of society at large in mind while pursuing business objectives. Very clearly, money—and quick money—isn't all.

Yet, the industrialist who comes in second is Dhirubhai Ambani, a rapid-fire achiever if ever there was one. But once again, the poll participants have made canny observations of his achievements, pointing to the boost he has given to the equity cult and to his financial genius.

Agreement among the participants on the final rankings was greater in this poll than in the last one, with the 'coefficient of concordance' (going up on a scale from zero to one) being 0.47, compared to 0.37 for the last poll. A greater percentage of people also agreed on the No.1 choice in this poll than in the earlier ones. As many as 65.3 per cent of the participants ranked Tata first (Table 1), while only 53.3 per cent ranked Sunil Gavaskar first in sport and just 53.5 per cent ranked Rajiv Gandhi first in politics. Also, there was a high degree of unanimity among the participants concerning the ranks they gave to Tata. In contrast, there was greater variance in the case of Ambani, indicating that several participants don't agree on his ranking. This reflects the controversies surrounding him. Finally, the rankings were not very different in the three sub-groups of businessmen, students and salaried class.

A statistical scrutiny of the results reveals that some of the personalities have been ranked in the same way by a good number of the poll participants and hence form clusters. Figure 2 shows that V. Krishnamurthy belongs to the same cluster as V. Kurien, which means that the images and achievements of these personalities are related in the minds of participants, except in Bombay. Tata, however, is not clustered with any one else.

SAMPLES of respondents' comments on the seven candidates other than J.R.D. Tata give an indication of the reasons why they rate some businessmen ahead of others in terms of their contribution to Indian industrial development.

DHIRUBHAI AMBANI

Despite Indian Express, the fact remains that Ambani's Reliance has witnessed an out-of-the-world growth. Here is an industrialist who is innovative, go-getting and is committed to growth.
Jaipur — Jagdeep Singh

● Enriching the investor in an impedimental environment is genius. Instead of counting their family millions, all industrial houses should see what potential lies in the common man's support.
New Delhi — Ashok Goyal

● The spectacular growth of Reliance speaks for itself, and Ambani's achievement in this respect is unparalleled in Indian industry.
New Delhi — Abhijit Raja

K.K. BIRLA

Talk to anyone about Indian industry and the first name to be uttered will be Birla.
Bikaner — Alka Pareek

● His contribution to the Indian industrial world is immeasureable.
Mysore — Ramprasad

● He has contributed a lot in every sphere of business and in the upkeep of social culture.

Bangalore — B.U. Rao

● He has organised a fiercely independent-minded stratum of Indian society towards a positive goal, for purposes other than agitation.
Hyderabad — A.K. Prasad

H.P. NANDA

The Escorts empire which seemed lost was recovered, and the shake-up of other industrial empires has been halted.
Bombay — Vipin Parekh

Shaktinagar — R.S. Singh

● He heads the most systematically expanding group in the country.

V. KRISHNAMURTHY

He has achieved as much as Birla and Tata, except that his efforts have been for the public and workers.

● He is the right man to get things moving in the public sector. Results can always be achieved in the private sector, but in the public sector one requires skill and determination.
New Delhi — Pawan Puri

● By showing results in public sector undertakings, V. Krishnamurthy has done the most commendable job.
Bangalore — R.C. Purohit

SWRAJ PAUL

New Delhi — A.K. Agrawal

GORKHALAND

Dodging the Issue

THE Gorkhaland agitation has wedged West Bengal Chief Minister Jyoti Basu squarely between a rock and hard place. He is having to balance his party's traditional commitment to some form of regional autonomy for the Darjeeling area dominated by Nepalese-speaking people, with resisting any accommodation with the current leadership of the movement whose demands have far exceeded the original goal. But instead of helping to extricate him from his unenviable discomfiture in the national interest, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and his aides have chosen to play political football with the issue which, if left to bubble, could spread the poison of ethnic separatism throughout the land. Surely, the prime minister could not possibly want to relive the recent history of Punjab where party-oriented political expediency has created the havoc of today. The Congress(I)'s short-sighted game-plan in West Bengal has suddenly given respectability to the Gorkha National Liberation Front (GNLF)'s Subhash Ghising, a former corporal of the Indian army who was barely six months ago regarded as an irresponsible crank. The Centre, in effect, has helped him to stake the claim of being the spokesman of the 15 lakh Gorkhas in and around the Darjeeling area. And he finds himself in the position of being able to play off the Centre against West Bengal in a situation where the two need maximum cooperation. Today, Ghising has been invited for talks by Union Home Minister Buta Singh—and he has a letter to prove it, which he gleefully flashes. This is a cruel slap in the face of Basu, who refuses to talk to him because he considers Ghising's GNLF "anti-national". Rajiv does not agree because, he says, the Union home and law ministries have examined the GNLF's literature and seen nothing there which is anti-national.

AJIT NINAN

This is patently absurd. Even though Ghising has lately been cooing like a moderate, his past record reverberates with hawk-like anti-national screeching. In the past six years of its existence, the GNLF has written letters to foreign heads of state and the United Nations seeking their help to end the Indian "genocide" of Gorkhas, and has appealed to the 40,000 Gorkhas in the Indian army to revolt. But Ghising has subsequently expressed regret over these acts. Corporal Ghising had even sounded a clarion call to observe Independence Day as a "black day" but later withdrew it on the eve of the occasion.

Basu is not the hard liner on the issue as he is being portrayed. He is committed to some form of regional autonomy, perhaps on the lines of a regional council. But he will not deal with anybody demanding a homeland for the Gorkhas or threatening violence. Some may view this attitude as a political ploy—a Jyoti Basu posture for the upcoming assembly elections, aimed at capturing the imagination of the people of Bengal who no doubt feel threatened by yet another movement to divide their state. But his choices are limited. The autonomy question can only be resolved by the Centre, but right now New Delhi seems more interested in watching Basu squirm politically than in suggesting workable and imaginative solutions. And there is little doubt that Basu must, at some point, talk to the Gorkha movement's leadership. But as of now, the only recognisable leader, Ghising, comforted by the new credentials of moderatism heaped on him by the Centre, seems in no mood to withdraw his more radical demands.

If the issue was not so serious Rajiv's stand would have been laughable. Displaying astonishing ignorance, he kept referring to all Nepalis as foreigners until he was corrected by Buta Singh. Next he said that the problem concerned only those Nepalis who were still not citizens of India and now want Indian citizenship. To reduce the complex Gorkha demands to this simplistic matrix is a gross lack of judgement. What Rajiv wants is that the state Government solve the problem within the framework of the Constitution, and adds disingenuously that the Centre will intervene only if the state expresses its inability to tackle the problem. But the Centre is indulging in double-speak on this issue. According to the Centre, giving regional autonomy to the Gorkhas, which will require a constitutional amendment, will open the floodgates for similar demands from other sections of the country. So, what exactly does the Centre hope to discuss with Ghising? If it is not prepared to concede the limited demand for a regional council, is it prepared to even discuss the much larger demand for a separate state? Is it not aware that even the promise of such talks creates hopes which if not met—and they cannot be met—will only fan the trend towards extremism? The impression is unavoidable that what the Centre is doing is indulging in one-upmanship.

Basu has an onerous responsibility. He must accelerate, implement and publicise economic development plans in that neglected region and begin a political dialogue with grass-roots leaders while being firm about the national interest. In the quest for this Basu, too, must not be diverted by narrow, politically partisan considerations. So far, Basu has failed to display any special acumen in tackling this issue. The ball is in his court, too. For now, he can rightly blame the Centre for duplicity, but in the end, he will have to take up the challenge of the Gorkhaland issue both as a politician and a statesman.

Diplomatic Bang

● The hawks in South Block have long been lobbying the Prime Minister's Secretariat to make some kind of bold gesture to show Pakistan that

Cartoon by AJIT NINAN

India is not going to stand by in dovish acceptance of its neighbour's continuous provocations since Rajiv Gandhi became prime minister. During the last two years, notwithstanding protestations to the contrary, Pakistan has speeded up efforts to build a nuclear device, amassed new troop formations along India's borders, given military training to Sikh terrorists in secret army locations, carelessly bungled the recent airline hijacking, and even revived talk about "self-determination" for Kashmir. There is little doubt that while Rajiv is no adventurous warmonger, he is steadily losing patience with Pakistan's President Zia-ul-Haq. As a demonstration of his pique and the fact that "India cannot be cavalierly pushed around", as one senior official put it, India is now planning, literally, the biggest fireworks display in history near the Pakistani border. Starting late this year, the entire Western Command of the Indian Army, tanks, supertanks, guns, superguns and all, will hold a massive exercise, using live ammunition "somewhere in the western sector", according to a Ministry of Defence official. And the Pakistani forces across the border will not even need binoculars to see it.

Tender Portrait

● India's Delhi-based artistic establishment, that is the governmentwallahs who sit on the various committees dishing out patronage and commissioning works of art, are just as prone to the ways of babudom as are the work-a-day gnomes of North and South Block. Recently, a government art committee which oversees the artwork in Rashtrapati Bhawan sent letters to selected artists saying that it wanted to commission a portrait of President Zail Singh. The artists, all prominent in their field, should have been honoured by all accounts. But they wound up not being amused. In classical bureaucratic fashion, the letters from the art committee were in fact tenders—the sort that ministerial babus are used to sending out while inviting competitors to bid on various government projects. In this case, the letters from the committee asked the artists for sample portraits of the President drawn from existing pictures of his. The entrants would be judged and a final artist picked, apparently from a short-list. Quipped one insider: "If the President wants a dancer to perform at Rashtrapati Bhawan will there first be sample performances?"

The New Maths

● Either the prime minister is being wrongly briefed or he just cannot resist the temptation of playing to the gallery when it comes to the Marxist Government in West Bengal. During his trip there last fortnight, Rajiv Gandhi poured scorn on the state's performance in the generation of electricity, saying that the plant load factor (PLF) of the units in that state was as low as 30 per cent. Which would be disastrous; only it is simply not true. West Bengal's PLF for August was, in fact, 44.2 per cent, which is, admittedly, lower than the national figure by almost 10 per cent. But there is no need for West Bengal to hang its head in shame: at least five Congress(I)-ruled states have a PLF which is much, much lower. They are: Uttar Pradesh (30.7), Bihar (29.7), Haryana (27.9), Orissa (27.9) and Rajasthan an unbelievably and shamefully low 12.2 per cent.

Raiders' Backlash

● Rarely has so much pressure been mounted on the Government as was done when the officials of the Enforcement Directorate arrested industrialist-bachelor Lalit Mohan Thapar, 55, chairman of the Thapar group of companies on charges of foreign exchange violations. Ministers, officials, leading politicians from opposition parties and several others put in their tuppeny-bit of wire-pulling to try and get the influential Thapar released.

But the most interesting reaction came from Washington, from where the newly-installed Indian Ambassador P.K. Kaul decided to send a lengthy telex message pointing out that the arrest had provoked negative comments in the US press. Kaul said that he had received several representations protesting vociferously against the sudden arrest. The campaign has had its effect. Hapless Finance Ministry officials have been asked to prepare a detailed note justifying their decision to arrest Thapar and the matter is to come under the close scrutiny of the prime minister himself, who made no bones about his displeasure in a conversation with businessmen during his visit to Calcutta last fortnight.

RINGING TROUBLE

■ There is hard evidence to show that the citizenry takes its cue from its leaders. Former home minister P.C. Sethi will be pleased to know that his style is carefully noted and copied as far away as Chakradharpur, Singhbhum district.

When Ramavatar, a prominent trader, booked a lightning call to Calcutta, it failed to materialise. The lines were disrupted, he was told. Now, what could have been a more logical and reasonable explanation?

But Ramavatar, a restless soul, was not satisfied. He went a-calling to the exchange, rammed his way in and collared another Ram (initials R.D.), the telephone operator. But operators, who recognise that theirs is a hazardous profession, and that the public does not always behave in a democratic fashion, are quick to gang up in an emergency. In this case, too, they rushed immediately to their Ram's rescue.

The Bihar circle of the All India Telephone Traffic Employees Association now insists that the police take action against Ramavatar. It seems only a matter of time before this poor, much-maligned community is given a full-fledged course in self-defence as an integral part of its basic training.

PAYING IN KIND

■ While people are always discouraged from taking the law into their own hands, that is precisely what the villagers of Locharla village in Anantapur district did.

They were tired of being at the mercy of that all-powerful pillar of the community, the fair price shop dealer. It was palmolein oil that finally did him in. When they failed to get their quota for September on time, the villagers angrily wanted to know what the matter was. There was no satisfactory answer.

The villagers didn't trust what are generally called "higher authorities" either to bring the trader to book. After all, he could always pass on an extra dollop of palmolein under the table in the right quarters.

They adopted instead the only course open to them. The barber refused to trim his hair, the washermen declined to wash his clothes and everyone simply stopped talking or having anything to do with him. What was more, they imposed a fine of Rs 500.

While the conclusion of this tense drama is as yet unclear, one thing is for certain: one of the characters wears long hair and dirty clothes.

TALKATHON

■ Silence may be golden, but certainly not for 54-year-old Jayaraman, a beedi worker of Padrikuppam who recently talked his way into the record books. For almost an entire week, while people slept and woke up, went to office and came back, watched a serial on TV or just sat back quietly with their favourite book, Jayaraman simply kept talking.

One hundred and sixty five hours, said the clock, when Jayaraman finally called it a week. This should earn him a place in the Guinness Book of Records where the place of honour so far was taken by a Sri Lankan who, about five years ago, yakked on 159 hours non-stop.

While bombarding the ears of his hapless audience Jayaraman was constantly mindful—like all good showmen—that he should hold their attention. When the listeners tired of science, he turned to economics and then to politics. And when all else failed, Jayaraman adroitly switched to narrating stories from films. Time off was only five minutes every hour, as permitted by the talk rules.

While Jayaraman is probably at home nursing his throat, there is a moral to the story: a determined man can talk himself into anything.

MARRIAGE BY PROXY

■ The value of proxy is well appreciated by all students who have stood in for their absent friends in class. But Parameswaran, of village Nadathara, had a lesson to teach when he recently carried proxy to its logical and for him, highly satisfactory conclusion.

Like any 23-year-old about to get married, Parameswaran was counting the days. But a few days before the big event, the groom was taken seriously ill. He didn't lose heart, certain that he could leave his sick bed briefly to perform this pleasant but vital duty.

But doctors will be doctors. Spoil sports who can advise going off cigarettes, liquor and food can also advise against weddings. That is exactly what Parmeswaran's doctor told him: he was too sick to leave hospital.

It was a brief but exhausting debate that raged within Parmeswaran: should he be a good patient or a good groom? Just in time, he figured he could be both.

Off went his sister to perform the ritual on his behalf, thus proving incontrovertibly that a person can be at two places at the same time.

If you shut your eyes to power wastage, you may soon have to open them in darkness.

Power that was considered a miracle when it was invented is taken for granted today.

Yet, it is one of our most precious assets.

A home cannot run without it.

Neither can a plant or an industry.

Think about it.

Maybe you can do something about a fan or an air-conditioner that runs full blast in an empty room.

Or a street light left to burn all day.

Or an idle machine left aimlessly running.

The time to conserve and save power is now.

Come, join hands and work for it.

PRESIDENT

Mixed Signals

THE prime minister receives hundreds of letters daily from his admirers and critics. But one which landed last fortnight on his desk surprised even Rajiv Gandhi. The letter, signed by President Giani Zail Singh, showered praise on the prime minister's performance at the recently concluded Non-Aligned summit at Harare. "This has raised India's prestige abroad," wrote the President. The communication is being interpreted in knowledgeable circles as a move by Singh to normalise the relationship between him and Rajiv—a relationship which has soured continuously over the last 18 months. The official explanation given by a Rashtrapati Bhawan spokesman was: "As head of state the President has praised the performance of his Government. He has just put on record the appreciation which the prime minister rightfully deserved."

But whether the presidential adulation, aimed at paving the way for improved relations between the two, had served its purpose was not immediately apparent. The prime minister still refuses to brief Singh on important domestic and foreign affairs, and his party officials and MP's treat the office of the President with contempt. The most recent demonstration of this was the scathing attack on the President by 28 prominent Congress(I) MP's, and an open criticism of him by Union Minister of State for Public Enterprise K.K. Tiwary, following the appointment given to Congress dissidents Pranab Mukherjee and Gundu Rao by Rashtrapati Bhawan for presenting a memorandum against the Government.

The MP's who were critical of the President's actions included several from Punjab as well as from the ranks of the newly-elected members of the Rajya Sabha. Most of the signatures on the memorandum were collected by S.S. Ahluwalia, a freshly elected Rajya Sabha member from Bihar and a protege of Home Minister Buta Singh. Their memorandum, a copy of which was also sent to the President, noted: "They are (Rao and Mukherjee) meeting him in clandestine manner frequently, thus dragging him to serve the interest of the frustrated group of politicians and projecting him as their political godfather in the name of the loyalists. This move gains special significance at a time when the election of the President is to be held next year."

This is the first time that a ruling party, has openly criticised the President. According to Congress(I) circles, the statement was not only issued on the prodding of the high command but was also cleared by the prime minister's personal staff. But it was claimed later that the letter was signed not directly by, but on behalf of several of the purported signatories. R.L. Bhatia, general secretary of the All India Congress(I) Committee (AICC-I) whose name appeared on the memorandum, later denied even having seen a copy of the statement. But the damage was already done, and the President expressed his annoyance in no uncertain terms when he cancelled his engagements in Calcutta and returned to New Delhi to attend to the business of the rumoured cabinet expansion, a day later than his presence was required. Singh had been requested, through Cabinet Secretary B.G. Deshmukh, to consider the possibility of returning to the capital by September 13 so that the Cabinet expansion could take place on the following day. But the President returned only on September 14.

But this was not the only development to exacerbate tensions between the Government and the President. Earlier, the Prime Minister's Secretariat censored Singh's address to the nation intended for broadcast on the eve of Independence Day. The draft of the presidential speech had been readied on August 5. For eight days no one studied its contents. All India Radio and Doordarshan had recorded the broadcast on August 11 and 12, and the cassettes along with copies of the speech were despatched to all the missions abroad. But suddenly, followng Rajiv's return from Mexico, the Government discovered "mischief" in the speech. Rajiv summoned a meeting of the Political Affairs Committee of the Cabinet in which the speech was discussed for over three hours. In the process, the prime minister missed a dinner hosted by the former home minister, P.C. Sethi, attended also by the President. At 10.30 that evening, Buta Singh and Human Resources Minister P.V. Narasimha Rao drove down to Rashtrapati Bhawan and suggested to the President that he drop a part of the text which referred to the need for protecting the lives of the citizens. While the President saw nothing objectionable in the text, the Government ordered both AIR and Doordarshan to delete the sentences which read that, "it is the duty of the Government to protect the lives of its citizens". This was apparently done because the Government felt the statement implied that it had failed in ensuring the safety of the people.

SINGH'S main ire, however, is directed against Union ministers who show scant regard for his high office. Not only do they avoid functions attended by the President to which they too are invited, but they also ignore summons from Rashtrapati Bhawan. For example, Buta Singh recently called on the President to get his signature on the ordinance to amend the Commissions of Inquiry Act under which the Government sought powers to deny any inquiry report to Parliament. Before signing it, the President asked Buta Singh whether the regulation would mean the denial of reports to him as well. Presidential staffers, in that meeting, in fact quoted Article 78 of the Indian Constitution stating: "It shall be the duty of the prime minister to keep the President informed about the proposals before the Government." It was only after Buta Singh's assurance that the ordinance was not intended to keep the President out of the picture that Singh signed the document.

A week later a request from the President's office reached the home minister's office asking for the copies of the reports of the Mathew and Thakkar commissions. It received no response. Singh raised the matter with Buta Singh when the two met at a function in Rashtrapati Bhawan last fortnight. Again, the home minister promised the President that he would provide him the reports. He has not kept his word. Instead his supporters like Ahluwalia joined others in issuing the patently derogatory statement against the President. In February this year, Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh was deputed to provide the President with a summary of the Mathew Commission report on the Punjab-Haryana territorial dispute. But the President insisted on getting the report and V.P. Singh assured him that he would get one soon. Eight months later, the President is yet to receive the promised report.

Ministerial defiance apart, Singh's major problem seems to be his inability to establish a rapport with Rajiv. Barring social functions both of them have not met informally alone. Also, the prime minister has broken the established convention of calling on the President before and after foreign visits. The Government also discourages the President from going abroad and prefers that the vice-president represent India in countries which have issued invitations to the head of state. The Government rather reluctantly cleared Singh's visit to Nepal and his proposed visits to Yugoslavia and West Germany only after Rashtrapati Bhawan raised a commotion privately. But the timing of his trip might clash with the winter session of Parliament during which the ordinance imposing President's Rule in Jammu & Kashmir has to be ratified. This may require the President's presence at home. If Singh is asked to postpone his visit, the misunderstanding between the two will only grow further.

Though both the President and the prime minister maintain that their relationship is absolutely cordial, it is well known that they mistrust each other. According to the President's supporters Rajiv has been made to believe that Singh has all along been encouraging the "old guard" party dissidents in order to create for himself a solid power base which will support his candidacy for a second presidential term. But Singh's admirers maintain that the wedge between the two is primarily because Rajiv heeds the advice of only a select group of advisers—excluding old-line Congressmen who relate to the President but are unable to get Rajiv to listen to them.

However, last month Arun Nehru, the minister of state for internal security, made a renewed attempt to re-establish contact between the two. During a "courtesy call" to Rashtrapati Bhawan, Nehru discussed with Singh ways and means of clearing the air with the prime minister and patching things up. Nehru then followed up these discussions in direct talks with Rajiv. In a gesture that appeared to herald reconciliation, the AICC(I) general secretary announced what amounted to a withdrawal of his signature from the petition signed by the 28 Congress(I) MP's, and the prime minister ordered an investigation into how the statement came to be issued. This belated gesture by the high command to wriggle out of an embarrassing position might appear a clumsy political manoeuvre. But it does indicate that while Rajiv and the President may not be immediately willing to kiss and make up they are at least exchanging glances.

MARUTI ALLOTMENTS

Favoured Few

ON paper and in law, Maruti Udyog's board cannot be faulted. After all, at the end of a two-year court battle, the Supreme Court had not only permitted the country's most popular car manufacturer to make out-of-turn allotments of its vehicles to people who wanted to jump the customers' queue, the court had also spelt out which categories of people could get such special allotments: ministers, judges, senior government officials and armed forces officers, the physically handicapped, charitable institutions, and so on. And the company is now sticking faithfully to these norms while reserving 5 per cent of its total production for favoured customers.

Nevertheless, the people who have got the special allotments make an interesting list. For at the top of the list of out-of-turn allottees are judges themselves: one from the Supreme Court (R.B. Mishra), and as many as 65 from the various high courts, including some chief justices (Satish Chandra of Calcutta and S.S. Sandhawalia of Patna). Almost every fifth high court judge in the country has now got an out-of-turn Maruti allotment.

Bureaucrats have had their share of special allotments too: over 100 senior civil servants of the rank of additional secretary and above, including Expenditure Secretary R. Ganapathy, Petroleum Secretary G.V. Ramakrishna, Atomic Energy Commission Chairman Raja Ramanna, Director-General of Delhi Police Ved Marwah, University Grants Commission Chairman Yash Pal, member of the Central Board of Direct Taxes S.K. Roy, Additional Secretary in the Prime Minister's Secretariat Montek Singh Ahluwalia, National Security Guards Director-General R.T. Nagarani, and numerous others.

And the ministers who have asked for and got out-of-turn allotments include three chief ministers, such as Bihar Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey; Punjab Finance Minister Balwant Singh; Union Minister of State for Personnel, Administrative Reforms and Pensions P. Chidambaram; Uttar Pradesh Transport Minister Sanjay Singh; and Pondicherry Chief Minister M.O.H. Farookh. Other favoured politicians include opposition stalwarts Biju Patnaik, Sharad Pawar and Dr Farooq Abdullah.

The Supreme Court, while delivering its judgement on a writ petition by a consumer organisation that had protested about the out-of-turn allotments, had not specified in detail why such allotments were necessary to the specified categories of people. It had merely said that they were "in public interest". But Maruti itself seems to have carefully chosen people who might have to deal with issues concerning the company in their official capacity.

There is, of course, no

The people who got the special allotments make an interesting list— 3 chief ministers, 3 governors, over 12 central and state ministers, 65 judges, over 100 senior civil servants.

OVER 750 Maruti cars have been allotted out-of-turn to senior government officials and civil servants. Prominent among the names on the roll of honour are:

Politicians: Sanjay Singh, transport minister, UP; Balwant Singh, finance minister, Punjab; P. Chidambaram, Union minister of state for personnel; M.O.H. Farookh, chief minister, Pondicherry; S.S. Surjewala, irrigation minister, Haryana; Dr Farooq Abdullah, former chief minister, J&K; Bindeshwari Dubey, chief minister, Bihar; Chiman Bhai Patel, opposition leader, Gujarat; Sharad Pawar, opposition leader, Maharashtra; Liansuma, industry minister, Mizoram; Niaz Hasan, speaker, UP Assembly; U.A. Beeran, food minister, Kerala; Mufti Mohd. Sayeed, Union tourism minister; late Jagjivan Ram; Mohd. Usman Arif, governor UP; Biju Patnaik, opposition leader, Orissa; Yogendra Makwana, Union minister of state, agriculture and cooperation; Mangat Ram Sharma, speaker, J&K Assembly; Mrs Swarup Kumari Bakshi, minister, harijan and social welfare, UP.

Judges of high courts: R.N. Aggarwal, New Delhi; Amitav Banerji, Allahabad; S.Natrajan, Madras; R.B. Mishra, Supreme Court; D.N. Jha, Lucknow; V.A. Mohata, Nagpur; S.S. Chadha, Delhi; K. Sreedharan, Cochin; L.M. Sharma, Patna; S.A. Hakeem, Bangalore; D.P Gupta, Jaipur; K.K.Gupta, J&K; P.S. Shah, Bombay; T.R. Handa, Simla; A.N. Oberoi, registrar, Supreme Court; Satish Chandra, chief justice, Calcutta High Court; M.P. Verma, Patna; S.S. Sandhawalia, chief justice, Patna High Court; B.L. Loomba, Lucknow.

Civil servants and others: Ved Marwah, director-general of police, Delhi; S.K. Roy, member, CBTD; R. Ramanna, chairman, Atomic Energy Commission; R. Ganapathy, secretary, expenditure; R. Balakrishna, additional secretary, Cabinet Secretariat; Montek Singh Ahluwalia, additional secretary, Prime Minister's Secretariat; M.G. Katre, director, CBI; A. Rangachari, additional secretary, Finance Ministry; R.T. Nagarani, director-general, National Security Guards; R.K. Khandelwal, chairman, Joint Intelligence Committee; G. Krishnamurthy, Senior vice-president, Income Tax Tribunal; G.V. Ramakrishna, secretary, petroleum; D. Bandopadyay, Union secretary, labour; Yash Pal, chairman, University Grants Commission; S.S. Dhanoa, secretary, Health & Family Welfare; Mahesh Prasad, secretary, UP Government.

saying that someone who gets a special allotment of a Maruti vehicle will take a decision in favour of the company if the occasion arises. Nevertheless, judges have been favoured by the company when cases are likely to be filed against the company for the manner in which it has selected its dealers. Some of the bureaucrats who have been chosen work in the Prime Minister's Secretariat, Customs and Excise Departments, Company Law Board, Central Board of Direct Taxes, Comptroller and Auditor General's Office, and the Department of Personnel. In the Department of Public Enterprises, the favoured customer is Minister of State K.K. Tiwary. The same thing has been done at the state level, and Punjab recently decided to reduce the sales tax on the category of vehicles produced by Maruti.

There may not be a quid pro quo in such decisions, and when questioned on the subject Maruti Managing Director R.C. Bhargava stated matter-of-factly: "We have gone strictly by the Supreme Court guidelines."

Oddly enough, a large percentage of those who have applied for and got special Maruti allotments already have official cars at their disposal. This includes all the ministers and judges, the presiding officers of Parliament and the state assemblies, some of the senior civil servants and police officials. So their need for a second car could hardly be very pressing. Many of the favoured politicians are also well-off, and can quite easily afford to buy a Maruti in the open market rather than jump a queue of people who have been waiting for three years since they booked their Maruti vehicles.

In fact, many of those awarded special allotments by the company had not even booked a vehicle when bookings were open. Earlier, before the court case, the company had been making out-of-turn allotments only to those already on its waiting list. This time around, however, this qualifying condition has been done away with, presumably because the Supreme Court did not make any mention of it. Thus, of the 800 cars marked for special allotment between May and September, as many as 750 have gone to people who did not book cars by making an advance payment of the required Rs 10,000. The thousands of people still waiting for their Marutis even three years after booking for them may have their comments on this, but the company itself is in the clear.

NEERJA MISHRA

In Memory

THE saga of Neerja Mishra continues to unfold. Moved by the exceptional bravery of the Pan Am air hostess shot dead in the Karachi hijacking, more than 3,000 people have sent adulatory letters to her father, Harish Bhanot, Hindustan Times special correspondent in Bombay. Wrote Union Minister for Steel and Mines K.C. Pant: "They (the passengers) spoke in glowing terms about Neerja's courage, sense of duty and humanity." Wrote a Thane student: "We really loved her as a model and now we've begun admiring her as a courageous woman...we still love her, now even more."

Neerja: moving courage

From Keith D. Smith, Neerja's training instructor in the US: "She was truly the star of the class. Not only was she beautiful of face but also beautiful of spirit and intelligence." And from J. Hussey, a passenger from London who survived the hijacking: "In order that my family and eventually my grandchildren will always remember, I have planted a small maple tree in my garden. In the spring it will be yellow and in the autumn red and gold and I am having a plaque engraved in memory of Neerja Mishra and all those who died on that terrible day."

Last fortnight, Bhanot also fulfilled the sad duty of receiving from Pan Am Vice-President Martin Shugrue the golden wings Neerja would have received after completing six months as senior flight purser. Shugrue also gave a citation which said in part: "Her decision to take responsibility for the situation at hand was in the highest traditions of excellence and service to her fellow men."

It is now known that when the Jumbo was stormed, Neerja who was standing at the door welcoming passengers, rushed towards the intercom. But when one of the hijackers grabbed her by the hair, she shouted out the code number used to warn other crew members of a hijacking. Her cry was heard by another hostess who immediately informed the captain.

In the end, when the hijackers ordered the cabin crew to return to the back of the plane just before the shooting began, Neerja continued to station herself in the front row of the economy section. When the shooting began she was hit on the side but threw herself over three children who survived. Two more hits followed, one in the back and another in the arm. Still she tottered to the exit from where she was helped out by two crew members who had rushed back after evacuating passengers. She complained of pain while being taken into an ambulance but died before she could be attended to.

Bhanot, to whom she was deeply attached, is now busy writing a book on her life which he expects will be ready in two months' time. "When I heard about the hijacking I knew Neerja was in trouble," says Bhanot. "I knew in a situation like that she would take on the responsibility for others and show great courage. That ultimately cost her her life."

Bhanot has told Pan Am that he will not accept any compensation. Instead, he has persuaded the airline to set up a Pan Am Neerja Endowment to present an international award to any Indian woman who shows exceptional bravery. Contributions have started coming in from US citizens and Pan Am hopes to institute a major award.

The country's most advanced and cost-efficient range of explosives yet.

IEL introduces large diameter POWERGEL explosives — fully colloidal, for greater blasting efficiency. They provide superior rock fragmentation, better muck displacement, easier shovelling, hauling and crushing, and economy in drilling. Result: considerable savings in mining costs.

POWERGEL — 100% waterproof ... a longer life

Being water-in-oil emulsion explosives (the oil phase completely enveloping the aqueous phase), POWERGEL explosives are completely waterproof, with a rapid rate of reaction. They also have a longer storage life — almost 9 months.

POWERGEL — the safest, most reliable explosives yet

Their lower impact sensitivity and freedom from toxic fumes make POWERGEL the safest explosives ever. And yet they are reliably sensitive to conventional priming — for sure detonation, everytime.

PUNJAB

Ominous Shift

SIKH politics took a perceptible shift to a more militant, and clearly anti-Centre posture last fortnight. Setting the pace, surprisingly, was the octogenarian Baba Joginder Singh—an all but forgotten political entity. Presiding over the 'Shahidi conference' called by the Manjit Singh faction of the All-India Sikh Students' Federation (AISSF), the father of Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale and president of the United Akali Dal exercised an almost mesmeric hold over the 15,000-odd Sikh youths who full-throatedly called for a 'war' to achieve the ideal of 'Raj Khalsa'. The biggest gathering of Sikh youth after the Sarbat Khalsa of February 1986, the conference resolved to "fight to the finish for the establishment of Raj Khalsa which the Sikhs established in the 18th century".

More ominously, arches had been erected outside the historic Manji Sahib—the venue of the conference—to honour three terrorists including the suspected killer of Sant Harchand Singh Longowal. Later the families of the three terrorists were presented with medals and General Vaidya's killers praised.

Also present at the conference were former chief minister Parkash Singh Badal and J.S. Talwandi, ostensibly to further their attempt at forging unity among the three Akali Dals and the two factions of the AISSF. Badal protested later that his presence did not make him a "party to the resolutions passed at the conference" but he did not protest when the killers of General Vaidya and Longowal were praised. Predictably, Chief Minister Surjit Singh Barnala seized upon Badal's presence to say that there was now no question of working out a unity formula. Said he: "Our friend Badal has joined those who are praising the killers of Sant Longowal. How can we hold talks with such people?"

But Barnala himself shied away from taking any action against the convenors of the conference. Confided a trusted adviser of the chief minister: "Any move against Baba would be counter-productive at this stage." That seemed to confirm suspicions that Barnala would like to keep his doors open to the militants.

Joginder Singh with supporters (top); and with Badal and son Harcharan

Barnala also sent his emissaries—as did Badal—to Anandpur Sahib, where the five head priests were meeting last fortnight to work out a unity formula. Interestingly enough, the idea of getting the five priests together is a brainwave of Barnala's Finance Minister, Balwant Singh. Obviously, opportunism continues to be the pivot of Akali politics.

In contrast to Barnala's prevarication, the response of the Damdami Taksal leadership—which also was not represented at Amritsar—to the conference was swift and significant. Obviously seeing the need to counter Baba's growing following among the Sikh youth, the Taksal replaced Harinder Singh Kahlon (now in jail) as the convenor of the AISSF faction owing allegiance to the Taksal, with Gurjit Singh, a relative of Bhindranwale wanted in several cases of murder. For good measure, the 'Khalistan Commando Force' announced that Sarabjit Singh Ropar—who was holding the fort in the absence of Kahlon but has been missing—was in its custody and had confessed to helping the authorities arrest several terrorists including Tarsem Singh Kohar (ex-commander of the force) and Waryam Singh (one of the Muktsar assassins).

What is most worrying, meanwhile, is the message underlying the return of Joginder Singh. He had extensively toured the countryside for the last two months, preaching one message: "The Centre is a fox out to destroy the Sikhs. Barnala and Ribeiro are tools to do the job. Let all Sikhs unite and fight against the enemies of the panth." The response was revealing: even in G.S. Tohra's village in Patiala district and Barnala's home town, people turned out in force to assure Baba of their support.

Equally significantly, the "amrit prachar" campaign in the rural areas being conducted by the Taksal leadership and, lately, by the Manjit Singh faction of the AISSF as well, is also gathering momentum, even though all "amritdharis" straightaway come under the surveillance of the police. Most prachar meetings of the Manjit Singh faction are addressed by Harcharan Singh, Bhindranwale's brother.

Buoyed by the evidence of growing support, Joginder Singh was in total command at the conference, offering the highest award to the killers of General Vaidya, and saying: "They will inspire others to avenge the atrocities." Despite the notable successes of the offensive against terrorists, it is clear that the mosaic of Sikh politics continues to take on more and more militant hues.

TAMIL NADU

Tongue Trouble

IT was a routine circular from the New Delhi headquarters of the Press Information Bureau exhorting its offices to use only Hindi in the Hindi week observed last month and informing them that all letters from New Delhi would henceforth be in Hindi. This was meant only for Hindi-speaking states, but when it mistakenly found its way to Tamil Nadu, it stung the state to the quick and led to an outpouring of anti-Hindi and anti-Centre passion not seen since the violent anti-Hindi agitation in the mid-'60s.

Construing it as an attempt by the Centre to impose Hindi, thousands of students in towns across the state took out processions to district collectorates and burnt effigies of Rajiv Gandhi. Leaders of the ruling All-India Anna Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (AIADMK), normally docile with the Centre, and the opposition Dravidra Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK) angrily demanded that the circular be withdrawn. Said Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan, holding the fort in MGR's absence: "I have pointed out to the Centre that the continuance of the circular would adversely affect the law and order situation in the state." Warned DMK leader M. Karunanidhi: "Tamil Nadu is preparing itself for yet another intensive anti-Hindi agitation." Even as Rajiv assured Tamil Nadu MP's that the Government would honour Nehru's commitment not to impose Hindi on non-Hindi states till they wanted it, it seemed that the circular had proved again that the anti-Hindi sentiment in the state is still very strong.

But the truth seems to be quite the reverse. Available statistics show that every year more Tamilians are voluntarily learning Hindi. As knowledge of Hindi widens their employment opportunities outside the state, thousands of students, employees of the Central Government and public sector undertakings, and even employees of private firms are appearing for exams conducted by the various bodies promoting Hindi.

In Madras itself, according to the Dakshin Bharata Hindi Prachar Sabha, the number of students passing the six exams conducted by it has gone up from 12,149 in 1981 to 18,682 in 1985, an average annual increase of almost 13 per cent. Even state-wide figures show an increase in excess of the population growth rate. Between 1981 and 1985, the number of students passing the Sabha's exams went up from 41,818 to 49,471—a rise of almost 20 per cent. Says P. Ananthakrishnan, general secretary of the Sabha: "Even qualified Tamil pundits have begun to learn Hindi and some of them are able to speak it better than our pracharaks (teachers)."

"Tamil Nadu is preparing itself for yet another intensive anti-Hindi agitation."
M. KARUNANIDHI
DMK leader

"Even qualified Tamil pundits have begun to learn Hindi and some of them are able to speak it better than our pracharaks."
P. ANANTHAKRISHNAN
general secretary, Hindi Prachar Sabha

Informed sources say there is a steady annual increase of 10 to 15 per cent in the number of people passing the exams of the Central Government's Hindi teaching scheme for its offices and public sector undertakings. Said T.R. Kashyap, the scheme's assistant director in Madras: "We have 47 Hindi teachers for all of south India, of which as many as 30 are in Tamil Nadu."

The motivation for this trend is almost entirely pragmatic. Ambujam Ayyapan, an assistant in a Madras pharmaceutical unit, says she enrolled for the Hindi Prachar Sabha because, "I can try for a job in any other place if my husband, who is a banker, gets transferred." Others have less ulterior motives. Says N. Shahjahan, an employee in the accountant general's office in Madras and a Sabha student: "I am learning Hindi because it is the language spoken by the largest number of people."

In fact, the leaders now denouncing Hindi from the roof-tops are themselves guilty of double-speak. Most AIADMK and DMK leaders send their wards to English medium schools in Madras where, Hindi is usually taught as a second language. MGR's grandchildren from his adopted son were students of St Bede's Convent School. Electricity Minister S. Ramachandran, Law Minister C. Ponnaiyan, Food Minister S. Thirunavukkarasu, Industry Minister K. Rajaram and the Assembly Speaker P.H. Pandian all had sent or are sending their children to the Don Bosco Matriculation School. Even Karunanidhi's two sons studied at the Madras Christian College High School.

Their double-speak has begun drawing critical comment. Says V. Selvaraj, a Madras haircutting saloon owner who had been active in the 1965 agitation: "It's all right for these politicians to rave and rant about the imposition of Hindi. But it is unwise for anybody in Tamil Nadu not to learn Hindi because Tamil has no currency beyond the northern frontiers of the state." Selvaraj's sentiments reflect the increasing awareness in the state of the wisdom of learning Hindi. Either the politicians are unaware of this or, more likely, they ignore it for political points. But the cue for the Centre is that Tamil Nadu is, willy-nilly, imbibing the national language.

The world's earliest bank notes were issued in Sweden by Stockholms Banco in July 1661.

The early bank notes were promises to pay the bearer a specified sum from the funds of the Bank, which were private banking concerns. The Bank of England issued the first currency note in 1695.

In India, first currencies were issued by the three Presidency Banks—The Bank of Bengal, The Bank of Bombay and The Bank of Madras from the time of their inceptions till 1862. Between 1862 and 1935, the Government was issuing the currency. Since the forming of the Reserve Bank of India in 1930, the currencies of the country are being issued by this single authority from the year 1938.

Today, Banking Industry is the epicentre of a nation's economy, touching varying needs of all people.

IMPLEMENTATION MINISTRY

Ambiguous Role

LAST September, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had attempted a major overhaul of his government's ministries: several of them were renamed, some were restructured and a 28th—the Ministry for Programme Implementation (MPI)—created. A year later, very little is still known about what the MPI does. What sectors of the economy does it monitor? Which programmes does it implement? What has been its impact? An assessment by Assistant Editor AJAY KUMAR.

PERHAPS the most brutally frank performance appraisal of the MPI comes, significantly, from its own Secretary, Prahlad Kumar Basu. "The slippages have, in fact, gone up," he said referring to the time schedules of the projects and programmes the specially-created ministry was supposed to monitor and implement. But while Basu believes that the MPI still has a vital role to play, most secretaries and chiefs of public sector undertakings candidly describe it as superfluous. Said a minister bluntly: "I don't know what the MPI does that adds to what we already know." Admitted an official in the Prime Minister's Secretariat: "Secretaries are not sure if the MPI is helping them to solve problems or tattling to the prime minister's office."

On the face of it, the MPI has a lot of work. With a staff of 11 officers cobbled together from the Coordinating Division of the Cabinet Secretariat and the monitoring divisions of the Planning Commission, it monitors nine infrastructural sectors of the economy—power, coal, steel, railways, shipping, telecommunications, fertilisers, cement and petroleum—and 264 projects in 13 sectors with a combined outlay of Rs 65,000 crore. It also oversees the implementation of the 20-point programme and the annual action plans of various ministries. All its reports are submitted to the Prime Minister's Secretariat.

The problem is that the MPI does little else but monitor. For the infrastructure it prepares a monthly scroll-like capsule report setting out the performance, the problems and the suggested solutions for the prime minister but it does little to solve inter-sectoral problems or delays by state governments which hold up most projects. Basu denies this and cites several instances where the Union Minister for Programme Implementation A.B.A. Ghani Khan Choudhury called meetings to remove inter-ministerial obstacles but one secretary said tartly: "If it is solving inter-sectoral problems I am not aware of it."

Similarly, for projects it renders little help to the project executives because all it does is recycle the data provided by them. Said one secretary: "Seventy-five per cent of the input for the exception reports comes from the undertakings and 25 per cent from the ministry. The MPI's contribution is zero." By the third of every month, the project chiefs have to send the MPI a flash report—listing the milestones crossed or missed—with a copy to their administrative ministry. The MPI then questions the ministries on the slippages and after receiving their reply, prepares an exception report for the prime minister relying on the explanations given by the ministry. Since the MPI adds no fresh insight to the problems of the project, secretaries and heads of public sector undertakings say the MPI's contribution is confined to snazzing up their data. Says M.L. Shishu, chief executive of the National Thermal Power Corporation: "Flash reports which are post mortems are of no help to us. The MPI should help in spotting problems before we do."

Another reason why the MPI's role is seen as infructuous is that after Rajiv Gandhi came to power, the general level of monitoring of the infrastructure sector has improved greatly. Glib answers are followed by sharper questions on what the ministries have done to solve problems. Said an official in the Prime Minister's Secretariat: "Two years ago if any infrastructural ministry reported that they were 90 per cent on target, nobody would get concerned. Today, we'll chew them up if they are 5 per cent short." The Petroleum Ministry, for example, provides some evidence of the new culture. The ministry's Secretary G. Ramakrishna has prepared an exhaustive and detailed eight-stage monitoring chart for the ministry's 45 projects in the seventh plan. And as a senior ministry official bluntly asked: "When we are doing so much, what's the need for the MPI?"

Even with regard to the 20-point programme, the MPI's contribution has been marginal. Since the reviews are done every quarter, the end-of-the-year rush has been eliminated. "Instead," says Wajahat Habibullah, director in the Prime Minister's Secretariat, "we now have an end-of-the-quarter rush but at least that is an improvement."

Not everybody, however, thinks that the MPI's work has been in vain. Railway Board Chairman Prakash Narain admits that the MPI's manner of presentation is such that the important indicators are highlighted. Said a chief executive of a public sector undertaking: "There is so much of lethargy in-built in government units that there is definitely need for such a ministry." Others say that the need to evaluate themselves every month focuses on problems which sometimes tend to get overlooked in the normal rush of things. Admits a public sector undertaking chief: "People are afraid of the computers in the Prime Minister's Secretariat."

Khan Choudhury and Basu aver that the ministry has made a great impact. The prime minister gets a monthly run-down on the infrastructural sectors and projects whereas this used to be done every quarter or every year. Flash reports and milestones monitoring are absolutely new concepts which light up warning signals early. The Planning Commission was only monitoring growth whereas they place equal emphasis on productivity. From scratch—and with no addition of staff—the MPI has created a system which prepares first-class analyses. Says Basu: "The data is all admittedly from other ministries but the system of monitoring is entirely our contribution." Officials in the Prime Minister's Secretariat also touch that on an average, the MPI is sending the right signals and more important, at the right time. As Khan Choudhury puts it: "We do not take any remedial measures: those are to be taken by the prime minister and concerned ministries and units."

But this is where the secretaries and project executives justifiably find the MPI wanting. There is little point in monitoring if the MPI cannot come up with solutions. The ministries and the project chiefs do not need to be told of their problems. "Who knows this better than the man on the spot?" asks Steel Secretary R.P. Khosla. Areas in which the secretaries need help, they agree, include dealing with the state governments to speed up the time-consuming land acquisition process, cutting down on delays in supplies by public sector units and improving the often cumbersome tendering procedures.

Undeniably, the MPI's role needs to be defined more sharply so that the current accent on monitoring is replaced by a more practical role—that of problem-solving and coordinating. Till the Government does that, the MPI will continue to be seen as a ministry which does little else than poke its nose into others' affairs.

AVIATION

A New Order

OUT go the bureaucrats, in come the businessmen. That is the new order as far as two of the most prestigious public sector companies are concerned. When the boards of Air-India and Indian Airlines were belatedly reconstituted last fortnight, senior civil servants accustomed to dominating these boards had to make way for the manufacturers of two-wheelers, light commercial vehicles, kitchen stoves and steel, and for hoteliers, health care managers, image- builders and bankers. Their collective wisdom, the Government clearly feels, will improve the performance of two companies that earned a gross profit of Rs 130 crore last year on a turnover of Rs 1,600-crore.

Said Jagdish Tytler, minister of state for civil aviation: "This is the first time that we have selected people with a professional background and expertise to handle large government corporations." It is also the first time that private businessmen have been represented in such strength on public sector boards. Since the prime minister wants to loosen the bureaucratic hold on the public sector, this could be the shape of things to come.

The new directors of the airline companies also indicate who is 'in' and who is 'out'. Thus, Rahul Bajaj is the chairman of Indian Airlines even though he faced a tax raid on which the case is still pending. And Rattan Tata—who already heads a committee going into the reasons for the delays afflicting some public sector projects—will head Air-India.

Among the others are Ritu Nanda, daughter of Raj Kapoor, managing director of Niky-Tasha and wife of Rajan Nanda, the Doon School-educated president of Escorts. Also included is the Doon School-educated Vivek Bharat Ram, executive director of DCM-Toyota, and Arun Nanda of the high-flying Rediffusion, which has handled the Congress(I)'s election advertising campaigns. And if the Tatas helped put India on the civil aviation map, they find more than adequate representation on the new boards. Apart from Rattan Tata, there is Russi Mody of Tata Iron and Steel (which continues to be on the Finance Ministry's black list of tax defaulters) and Francis Menzes of the Tata Institute of Management Training.

But those left out are equally significant. Among the names sent up to the prime minister by Tytler were Mukesh Ambani, executive director of Reliance Industries, and Aditya Birla. Both were struck off the list after the prime minister cleared Tytler's proposal to induct professionals but asked him to prune his initial list. Tytler's immediate boss, Transport Minister Mohsina Kidwai, cleared the names Tytler suggested. It now remains to be seen whether the new experiment in public sector management will take off.

Tytler proposed that bureaucrats make way on the airlines' boards for people with a professional background, and the prime minister agreed. The new boards could indicate the shape of things to come for the public sector as a whole.

Just because grownups look at computers with a little awe and respect does'nt mean children have to do the same, too.

To a child's unbiased eyes, a computer is just another machine, which she learns to use by trial and error. She can learn to use it faster than a grownup, simply because her mind has no barriers. To her, it's fun — and probably a very, very logical thing too.

So don't wait till your child grows up.

Give her a home computer today, and let her learn about computers by not just learning — but actually using it. Let her become familiar with the keys, the operating functions (and you'll be surprised at how fast she'll pick it all up!).

Till she learns to work with it.

DUBAI HIJACK TRIAL

Fresh Delay

PRIME Minister Rajiv Gandhi's fiery denunciations of Pakistan for delaying the trials of Indian Airlines (IA) hijackers in Pakistani jails may yet come back to haunt him. For though India's handling of aircraft hijackers is in a different league from Pakistan's, there were more than a few red faces in North Block last month when the disappointing news came from Ajmer that the trial of the seven Sikh hijackers responsible for the August 1984 hijack of an IA Boeing 737 to Dubai had ground to a standstill.

Nearly two years after the proceedings began at a special court set up at the Central Jail in Ajmer—and just when the prosecution was close to concluding their evidence—the hijackers brought the proceedings to a screeching halt by claiming that they had "lost faith" in the trial judge. The hijackers have moved the Supreme Court for a transfer of the case to Chandigarh or anywhere within Punjab. The case is now expected to come up for hearing in the court of Chief Justice P.N. Bhagwati this week.

In their petition the hijackers have levelled grave charges against the judge and the CBI—who are supposed to have nothing to do with the case once they have submitted their investigation reports to the prosecution. They claim that the trial judge had joined CBI officials in trying to "seduce" them to plead guilty in return for a promised leniency in his judgement regarding provisions for their studies and frequent leave from jail to visit parents. The hijackers further claim that prosecution witnesses were threatened by the CBI and even after some witnesses testified as much in court, no action was taken by the trial judge. Although the court proceedings were to be in-camera, CBI officials, they say, were allowed inside the courtroom to assist the prosecution even though the parents of the accused were disallowed from entering the room.

Finally, they claim "it has been the practice of the trial judge to see all important witnesses (like ambassadors, foreign secretary, cockpit and cabin crew) in his chamber in the presence of the DIG CBI, SP CBI and other investigating officers" before and after the day's hearing to discuss matters concerning the progress of the case. As such, allege hijackers Kamaljit Singh Sandhu, Amrinder Singh, Devinder Singh, Tejinder Singh, Avtar Singh, Surinder Singh and Man Singh, "justice is neither being done nor seen to be done."

In its affidavit, however, the CBI has categorically rejected all the hijackers' contentions. Denying that they colluded with the judge to make them plead guilty, the CBI adds that since the maximum as well as the minimum punishment under the Anti-hijacking Act is life imprisonment, there is no question of a "lenient" judgement. Describing as "wholly incorrect" the charge of instructing, pressurising or influencing witnesses, the CBI maintains that no "CBI official (was) present in the courtroom during the examination of witnesses during trial of the case". Similarly, rejecting the charge of prior meetings with key witnesses together with the judge, they say, "Had it been so, the petitioners would have certainly objected to it during the proceedings of this case. The silence on their part till date is clear proof that the said assertions are not only after thoughts but false."

The transfer petition it maintains is "only an attempt to delay and protract the trial" at the fag-end of the case. The prosecution had already run through 53 of the 70-odd witnesses it was going to produce—including almost all its material witnesses—when the hijackers first expressed their desire to approach the Supreme Court.

In fact, says the CBI, the judge has been more than "indulgent and accommodating" towards the defence counsel. The CBI had wanted proceedings to be conducted on a day-to-day basis but this had been turned down on the defence counsel's plea that it was difficult for the Chandigarh-based defence counsel or even for the parents of the accused also based in Punjab to stay in Ajmer for a long stretch of time.

The hijackers have also attempted to take advantage of what they see as a legal loophole in favour of their plea for transferring the case from the special court. Their case was first registered in Chandigarh and later transferred to Ajmer under the provisions of the Terrorists Affected Areas (Special Courts) Act, 1985. But since all special courts in Punjab were abolished after the Rajiv-Longowal accord and further since Chandigarh is no longer considered a terrorist-affected area, they argue in their petition that their case should be transferred to any ordinary court. But the CBI has contested this also, maintaining that even in the revised schedule after the accord, hijacking cases still remain to be tried only by special courts set up under the act. Moreover, the Anti-hijacking Act also provides that such cases be tried only in special courts.

This is the first case of hijacking being tried in India—all previous hijackers were never returned to India. The Supreme Court's attitude towards them is bound to be of wide interest, even though the points raised by the hijackers have little to do with the crime itself. As the hijackers continue to get away with repeated delay tactics, the Indian authorities are getting increasingly uncomfortable as India not only wants Pakistan to punish the hijackers of IA planes but is also pressing for a quick trial of the recent Pan Am hijacking.

—TANIA MIDHA

The hijackers have charged the trial judge and the CBI with collusion but the CBI has rejected their contentions.

KARNATAKA

Harried Hegde

IN the office of Karnataka Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde stands a five-foot statue of goddess Porlu, a manifestation of Parvati. The superstitious in the Janata Party believe that the goddess, whose statue was installed by Hegde, wards off the evil designs of party opponents. But last month even Porlu seemed powerless as Hegde tried hard to wriggle out of a double-edged crisis created largely by his own partymen.

Hegde was already under pressure from an August memorandum signed by 90 of the party's 136 MLA's asking him to expand the ministry. Even as Hegde summoned a mid-September meeting of the legislature party to discuss the memorandum, the party was overtaken by the crisis created by the publication of the Venkataswamy Commission's recommendations to reduce reservations for the backward classes. Health Minister H.T. Krishnappa attacked the report openly: "The report is most unscientific and ridiculous." Hegde later said that Krishnappa had committed a faux paus by giving vent to his feelings when the Government was yet to take a decision on the report. But Krishnappa maintained that it was the Government which had committed the gaffe by releasing the report when polls to local bodies were round the corner.

To put more pressure on the chief minister, three MLA's—E. Nanjegowda, B.V. Karigowda and M. Varadegowda—sent their resignations from the state Assembly. Wrote Nanjegowda: "You could treat this as my resignation letter if the Government does not reject the report." Karigowda, part of the 24-member official team scheduled to attend the Asian Games, stayed back in protest.

All four belong to the powerful Vokkaliga community, which is angry at its exclusion from the list. A senior minister dismissed their resignation as insignificant. Said he: "If the MLA's were really serious about their resignation they would have sent their letters to the speaker instead of the chief minister." But clearly, Hegde cannot afford to antagonise the Vokkaligas, who comprise 11.6 per cent of the state's population and have 56 MLA's in a house of 225, of which 35 are in the Janata Party itself.

Showing that caste loyalties can override party labels, Vokkaligas across the political spectrum have been in the forefront of the agitation against the report. The agitation—led by the Congress(I)—has been marked by bandhs, processions and blockades in protest against the recommendations reducing reservations from 49 to 27 per cent and de-recognising several of the castes as backwards (INDIA TODAY, September 30). Last fortnight, the stir spread to new parts of the state, turning violent at places.

To confound the confusion, the Lingayats—who form 17 per cent of the state's population—started their own agitation late last fortnight by calling for a state-wide bandh against the report. Lingayats, who are not a backward caste even under the existing formula based on the Havanur Commission report, want to be declared backward so as to avail the benefits. Said I.M. Magdum, president of the All-India Veerasaiva Mahasabha: "It is intolerable that Lingayats have been consistently hammered by the Government."

Meanwhile, Hegde was being pressurised by his party MLA's to expand his team immediately so that more ministers can do party work for the impending polls to the Zilla Parishads and Mandal Panchayats. This rationale has put Hegde in a fix. Three months ago, he had dropped 17 ministers ostensibly so that they could do election work. But if he now takes a few of them back, he would become a laughing stock and, as a senior minister admitted, "Hegde's credibility will suffer another setback." However, Hegde earned himself a temporary reprieve by assuring the MLA's that he would "keep in mind" their views when he did expand his ministry. Said Hegde, somewhat facetiously: "They (the MLA's) first thought the ministry was too big and they now think it is too small. How can I ignore their feelings?"

But driven to the wall on the Venkataswamy Commission report, Hegde committed himself to retaining the existing level of reservations at the end of an 11-hour meeting with leaders of various parties and communities, legislators, academicians and ministers. Later, he also criticised the report, saying: "The methodology adopted by the commission was proper but decisions based on statistics cannot be considered flawless." A series of cabinet meetings were being called to take a final decision—clear indications that the Government was yielding to pressure. There seemed little doubt that not only would the Vokkaligas remain in the backward fold, some sections of the Lingayats would also be taken in. But with the backward castes identified by the Venkataswamy Commission threatening to launch their own stir if the commission's report is rejected, any quick-fix solutions could land Hegde with even greater problems.

J.K. Synthetics LTD.

JAYKAY

Speech of the Chairman, Dr. Gaur Hari Singhania delivered at the Annual General Meeting on 29th Aug. 1986.

Good morning Ladies & Gentlemen,

Thank you for coming to Annual General Meeting of J.K. Synthetics Ltd. The Report of the Directors and the Accounts of your Company for the year 1985-86 have been with you and with your permission I take them as read.

PERFORMANCE 1985-86 : GROSS REVENUE CROSSES RS. 500 CRORE MARK

We have had a record year with a gross profit of Rs. 61.53 crores, an increase of 80.6%. The gross income improved by 27% from Rs. 413.79 crores in the previous year to Rs. 526.08 crores. The good performance of the year has made it possible for your Directors to recommend a higher equity dividend of 20%. I am sure you will join me to thank all the employees for their dedication and hard work which enabled the company to achieve this good performance. I look forward to their continued cooperation for a steady progress of your company.

CURRENT OUTLOOK

During the first quarter of the current year volumetric production and sales of synthetic fibres and yarns increased by 7.7% and 8.4% and of white cement by 36.2% and 67.3% respectively as compared to the corresponding period of the previous year. However, in case of portland cement on account of go-slow tactics and illegal strike resorted to by a section of the workmen during April-June, 1986 period, the production and sales were lower by 74.6% and 69.7% as compared to the corresponding period of the previous year. While the margins so far have been under pressure, we hope that the Government, based on BICP reports, would soon remedy situation. The damages caused by the sudden and flash floods in Kota will also have some impact on the profitability. We, therefore, view the current year's performance with cautious optimism. No doubt the implementation of the projects in hand, referred to in the Directors' Report, would have a positive impact on the turnover and profitability of your Company.

NATIONAL SCENE

Since no company can operate in isolation from the overall economic and political environment in the country, I would like to say a few words about the same.

As you are aware, fissiparous and separatist tendencies are plagueing the national scene. At a time when our efforts should be directed towards economic and political regeneration and improving the standards of living of the masses, it is unfortunate that most of our energies have to be spent in a direction which may well prove injurious to the integrity of our Country.

CRUSHING INCIDENCE OF EXCISE, CUSTOM DUTY ETC. ON COMPANY'S PRODUCTS

You might have seen from the Annual Report that during 1985-86 your Company had contributed Rs. 232.44 crores by way of excise duty, sales tax and custom duty alone. This accounted-for for 33.2% of the gross revenue. The following table will give an indication of the high incidence of excise duty on finished goods and custom duties on imported raw materials with reference to net ex-works realisation of various products:

PRODUCT	APPROX. INCIDENCE OF DUTIES.
Polyester POY Yarn	75%
Nylon Yarn	70%
Polyester Staple Fibre	60%
Cement	51%

Any rational in-depth study at the totality of the synthetic fibre and cement industries would highlight the need for immediate moderation of duties as the same would result in wide ranging benefits which would flow from the growth and expansion of the Industry. The Finance Minister has already admitted that his strategy of increasing revenue yields through a combination of reasonable rates and simpler procedures has proved its effectiveness and yielded encouraging results. Looking to the massive increase in production capacities of various synthetic fibres and cement, I am hopeful, the Government will adopt a pragmatic and rational taxation policy.

The Bureau of Industrial Cost & Price (BICP) is already engaged in the cost study of Nylon Yarn, Polyester Yarn, Polyester Staple Fibre and Nylon Tyre Cord. I hope it will make such recommendation to the Government in respect of these products as would ensure a minimum 12% post-tax return on the net worth to the Industry, as adequate returns and incentives are necessary for accelerated industrial growth and to achieve the targets fixed in the 7th Five Year Plan.

CEMENT INDUSTRY

On account of uncompensated increase in input costs, the average return of the industry has come down to about 4% in 1985-86 as against 12% post tax return assured by the Government.

With a substantial reduction in the price of non-levy cement and the unreasonably low levy cement prices, unless immediately the levy prices are suitably revised, the industry is bound to become sick. The present unremunerative prices would discourage the new investments and be an impediment in achieving the 7th Plan targets of 49 million tonnes by 1989-90. Looking to the present situation of the Industry, All India Financial Institutions have already stopped financing the new grass root cement plants. I am sure the Government would soon remedy the situation.

CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITIES

From the following lines, you will observe that we are running the industries not only for earning profits but also as an instrument for improvement in the quality of life in the society.

Last year I had given you a brief idea of the manner in which we are discharging our socio-economic responsibilities. Now I would like to say a little as to how you our shareholders, our employees, the customers, the community and the Government have benefitted from the growth of our business in recent years.

a) Shareholders : Fair share in the growing prosperity

The dividends paid to equity shareholders have increased from Rs. 135 lacs in 1976 to Rs. 505 lacs in 1985-86 an increase of 374%. Moreover during this period, your investment in the company has also yielded significant capital appreciation by virtue of two bonus issues. An investment of Rs.37.50 in one equity share of the company in March, 1976 was worth Rs.244.20 in March, 1986; i.e. an appreciation of over 650%. You will agree with me that our shareholders have had a fair share in the growing prosperity of the company.

b) Employees' Welfare and Training : An expanding social effort

J.K. Synthetics cares for its people— and it shows. Our employees have benefitted immensely through long term wage agreements and benefits provided to them. Our concern for workers' welfare has led the company towards creating impressive facilities for them. Townships have been set up alongwith our various manufacturing establishments.

Well equipped medical centres and schools have been functioning at Kota and Nimbahera. Employees are encouraged to play sports — towards this end, Jaykaylon Pavilion and the Gopalkrishna Singhania Badminton Hall have been constructed in Kota. The company has also constructed Open Air Theatres in Kota and Nimbahera where pictures are regularly screened for the benefit of the employees. The company is also running following schools:—

1. Jaykaylon School at Kota with a strength of about 1150 students,
2. Kailash Vidya Vihar, Nimbahera a school affiliated to Central Board of Secondary Education with a strength of about 850 students,
3. Jaykaylon School at Jhalawar, started even before the industry had been established, with an enrolment of about 250 students,
4. JK White Cement School at Gotan (Distt. Nagaur) with a strength of about 100 students.

All these Institutions mainly cater to our workmen and the weaker sections of the society. Imparting better education, is enriching knowledge which improves the life standard. JKS does all this because it understands that its employees are its real strength-helping take the company from success to greater success.

To keep our employees aware of the latest fundamentals and techniques of industry, we have comprehensive training programmes. In July 1985, we established a new residential training centre at Amjhar, about 55 km from Kota. In 1986-87 we propose to conduct 103 Training Programmes in various disciplines covering 1600 participants. The company has a regular programme of recruitment of Management Trainees to meet its growing requirement for new projects. We are also conducting a phased education programme for our workers. The novel feature of the programme is that education is being imparted by worker teachers only.

Another major step in education of our workmen has been the momentum, the quality circles concept gained during the year— "THINKING AT WORK PROGRAMME" Each Quality circle is a small group of people who meet voluntarily on a regular basis. The basic objective of these meetings is to identify problems in their work area, analyse causes, devise solutions and wherever possible implement the solutions.

The Company has also launched a Suggestion Scheme in its Kota complex with an objective of rewarding the ideas generated by the workforce. During first six months of introduction of the scheme we received more than 5000 suggestions of which 500 have already been implemented. Thus an effort is made to make our workmen responsible citizens of the Society.

c) Customer-satisfaction our primary concern

We strive hard to give our customers good value for their money in terms of quality product and after-sales-service. Your company was the first to pass on the entire benefit of reduction in excise duty on polyester staple fibre and acrylic staple fibre to its customers from the very day they were announced.

d) Community : Our contribution towards improvement in Quality of Life

It is difficult to exactly quantify our contribution in improvement of economic condition of the people around the areas of our operations through direct and indirect employment. Some of our special contributions can be gauged from the following:

1. 115 bed Jaykaylon Women's Hospital at Kota
2. Sir Padampat Mother & Child Health Institute, Jaipur
3. LSS Paediatric Hospital and Research Centre, Kota
4. Police Line Dispensary, Kota
5. Jaykaylon Cricket Pavilion, Kota
6. Establishment of parks and fountains around traffic circles and providing traffic signals, Kota.

We have also been responsible for organising various sports meets including IXth National Badminton Championship, Ranji Trophy Cricket Championship Semi Finals, All India Hard Court Tennis Championship and Gopal Krishna Singhania All India Invitation Basketball Championship at Kota. We plan to organise many such events in the coming year.

e) Restructured 20 Point Programme : Afforestation and pollution control measures

In line with the recently announced restructured 20 Point Programme, your company has launched a massive afforestation programme to plant about 1,00,000 tree saplings in its Kota complex during next 4/5 years. We have also launched an anti-pollution drive and propose to spend in Kota complex alone about Rs.4 crores to create additional effluent treatment capacity.

You will please thus see that we believe and work as social change agents for alround development of the human society.

f) Government : Our growing contribution to national ex-chequer.

Last but not the least, national and state ex-chequer continue to be the biggest beneficiary of our growth. Contribution by way of excise duty, custom duty and sales tax by your company in the last decade have increased almost five fold from Rs.48.8 crores in 1976 to Rs.232.44 crores in 1985-86.

Thus all the partners in our business are benefitting by the growth of the company, which is contributing to continuous improvement in quality of life.

Before concluding it is with considerable feeling and sense of shared fulfillment that I thank my colleagues on the Board, the Central and the State Governments, Financial Institutions, Banks, our Customers and you the Shareholders for the valuable support in the last year.

Thank you

Note: This does not purport to be a record of the proceedings of the Annual General Meeting.

KARNATAKA

Settlers at Bay

FORTY-FOUR years ago, a poor Muslim woman driven by poverty left her home state of Kerala and came to Kodagu (Coorg) looking for a job. With her was her three-month-old son K.M. Ibrahim. Today Ibrahim owns more than 150 acres of coffee plantations. Much later, in 1968, Tony Mathew left the small town of Palai in Kerala to come to Kodagu to manage his uncle's coffee plantations. Today he owns a sizeable coffee estate himself. Ibrahim and Mathew are among the two lakh migrants from Kerala now settled in Karnataka's Kodagu district with similar stories of rags to riches.

Not surprisingly, their success is now beginning to haunt them. Resentful of their stranglehold over the district's economy, the more than two-and-a-half lakh Moolanivasis (original inhabitants of Kodagu) of Karnataka's smallest district are now making it increasingly clear that the Keralites are not wanted. Strikes, bandhs and economic boycotts have erupted in the last few months. Worse, since most of the Keralites are Muslims, attempts are being made to communalise the issue. One person was killed last fortnight when communal violence erupted in Virajpet.

The rush for Kodagu began during the 1940s. Today Kodagu has the highest per capita income among the state's districts: Rs 4,095, against the state's average of Rs 2,036. Migrants control 80 per cent of the district's coffee, orange, cardamom and pepper trade. Says C.B. Kaveriappa, political science reader at the Government College in Madikeri: "The workers have become bosses and the resulting ill-feeling is inevitable."

In the last few months several minor clashes have taken place and last month a district-wide bandh was called by local organisations. Jan Jagrithi, an organisation representing the Moolanivasis, has opened a provision store at Virajpet to undercut the rich migrants by selling cheaper goods. In Siddapur, a nearby town, the Kodagu Yuvajana Sangha is urging local people to buy from their own kin. Said Sangha President A.C. Subbaiah, a cinema owner in Siddapur: "We are feeling threatened and suffocated in our own district." But Ibrahim, who became the general secretary of the state Congress(I) during Gundu Rao's rule, attributes the trouble to "simple jealousy". He says: "I've come from Kerala, worked hard to become rich. So what's wrong?"

With Muslims now comprising nearly 40 per cent of Kodagu's population, communal tension is rising. In Ponnampet the villagers damaged a mosque and in Halgondu unknown persons broke the local temple's door. Some political parties, who want the migrants out, are trying to give a communal turn to a petty murder which took place in Turukurahatti two months ago. Clashes also took place on Bakr-id and Rakhi.

Kodavas with guns: explosive situation

Photographs by N.S. AZEEZ

The BJP and RSS are accused of communalising the issue, but the BJP state President B.B. Shivappa, a coffee estate owner in Kodagu, hotly denies this charge: "It is common to blame the BJP for all problems." But the police has arrested three BJP members for distributing provocative pamphlets. Says Abdul Rehman, an income tax consultant in Madikeri who formed a minorities forum: "Muslims, whether they are outsiders or locals, are feeling unsafe."

Kodagu has the unique devarakadus—God's forests—dedicated to the local village deity. These forests, believed to have been protected by Kodava ancestors to preserve the ecological balance, are considered sacred. The locals accuse the migrants of forcibly building houses in the devarakadus. According to the Forest Department's records, about one-third of the 606 devarakadus in 319 villages—over 9,000 acres—have been encroached upon. Inquiries, however, reveal that even locals are responsible.

The situation is made ominous by the proliferation of arms in the district. Since locals worship weapons, they have not been required to hold arms licences since British times. And with migrants getting licences liberally, there are 21,408 people in Kodagu who either enjoy exemption or have a gun licence. A police official estimates that there are some 50,000 weapons in the area, many more than what the police possess.

Though district Police Superintendent B.G. Kokatnur feels that "minor clashes have been disproportionately magnified", a tour of Kodagu confirmed that a cross-section of people are worried that the slightest spark could ignite widespread violence. Should that happen, the existence of the private armoury in the district makes the prospect frightening to contemplate.

MADHYA PRADESH

House Hunt

FORMER hockey Olympian Aslam Sher Khan has finally scored his goal. Last fortnight, exactly a month after he had forcibly occupied a government bungalow in Bhopal, the Congress(I) MP from Betul was finally allotted the same bungalow following the personal intervention of Chief Minister Motilal Vora. Vora rescinded his earlier order allotting it to somebody else and issued a new order authorising the house for the VIP house-grabber. This incident has again focused attention on the merry-go-round of government house allotments, a problem that has become endemic in the state capital.

Khan, an Indian Airlines employee-turned-politician, is said to be close to another airline employee-turned-politician—Rajiv Gandhi—and this may well have been the factor that forced Vora to overlook what otherwise amounted to a crime under the Indian Penal Code. "What can I do? I've acted under government orders," lamented Bhopal Commissioner A.S. Sathyam, a stickler for rules, who finally signed the allotment order.

Khan, who already owns two houses in Bhopal—his ancestral property and a housing board residence gifted by the state Government in recognition of his contribution to sport—had, on August 10, forcibly moved into a government bungalow that had already been allotted to State Minorities Commission Chairman Shamsuddin, four days earlier. Khan claimed that he did this "at the instance" of the chief minister and the PWD minister who assured him that the allotment order would follow. "My only fault," he said, "was that I entered the house without a proper order."

Khan, who stays mostly in a government bungalow in New Delhi, says he needs a third house in Bhopal for "use as a guest house for my constituents who visit the state capital for their work". "My ancestral house is dilapidated and the housing board place is not spacious enough for my large family," he adds, concluding predictably: "My political adversaries are trying to damage me on this issue." But the state home ministry and the Bhopal commissioner's office are apprehensive that other VIP's may try to emulate him.

Khan's is not a unique instance and neither is the malaise confined to politicians. Last year, five so-called journalists representing publications like Raktachap broke open the locks of five new quarters and moved in. Being lesser mortals than the honourable MP, however, one of them was arrested for trespass. But they are yet to be evicted from the government houses. In another instance, an Indian Police Service officer forcibly tried to occupy a house that had been allotted to him and then apparently re-alloted to somebody else at the instance of the then chief minister, Arjun Singh. In the ensuing row, both the allotment orders were cancelled and the house assigned to a third person, but before she could occupy it, the house was suddenly re-allotted to a journalist.

This comic merry-go-round first became common in Singh's time, and Vora has continued the inglorious tradition—taking over the role of the estate officer for allotment of houses in select localities. Officials with the right connections and other influential persons identify houses about to fall vacant and obtain allotment orders directly from the man at the top.

So many houses are allotted in this manner to journalists, politicians and other non-officials that senior government officers have to rough it out in guest houses for several months while they wait for a house.

Worse, most non-officials do not even pay the nominal rent charged. More than 250 luminaries, including ministers, MP's, MLA's and journalists owe the state Government over Rs 14 lakh in rent arrears. In fact, the impunity with which journalists have been occupying government houses without paying rent has been a long-standing scandal in the state. Besides, some 700 houses in the state capital, Bhopal, are under the unauthorised occupation of ex-MP's, ex-MLA's, ex-ministers and retired officials.

The political compulsions of the chief minister apart, the senior officials who are supposed to take corrective action are themselves guilty of the same wrongdoing. Some 40 officers of the Indian Administrative Service—who continue to occupy houses in Bhopal even after they have been transferred out—are themselves defaulters and owe the Government over Rs 2 lakh. Many among those posted in Bhopal occupy cheap government accommodation though they have built their own mansions in the city. These are rented out, in many cases, to government departments and corporations for extraordinarily inflated amounts. State government rules state that officials having their own houses but staying in government houses have to pay a penal rent. But this penal rent is waived if the government house is specifically allotted for an officer of a certain designation. The chief secretary, who has rented out his own house and whose subordinates decide which houses are earmarked, has got a government bungalow in his name to avoid paying the penal rent. Since the malaise starts at the top, Bhopal's government housing problem will continue to be exploited by those with the requisite clout.

BHOPAL DISASTER

Finding a 'Saboteur'

CLOSE to two years after the disaster in the Union Carbide pesticide plant in Bhopal, mystery still surrounds the source of the water which entered the methyl isocyanate (MIC) tank and triggered off the world's worst industrial disaster. Last August the parent Union Carbide Corporation (UCC) in the US dropped the bombshell in the media that the December 1984 accident was caused by a saboteur who had injected water into the MIC plant. The claim found few buyers and was widely seen as an attempt by the powerful multinational to dilute its responsibility in the face of huge compensation suits. But UCC officials persisted with the sabotage theory even though they shied away from revealing the identity of the saboteur.

Investigations have now revealed that the so far unidentified "saboteur" who is likely to be hauled up by UCC before a Bhopal court for causing the deaths of over 2,500 people is a lowly paid former employee of the plant, Mohan Lal Verma. Although UCC has not named him in its high-profile media campaign about the "deliberate act of sabotage", its lawyers are likely to press for Verma's presence when the Bhopal District Court starts hearings on the compensation suits this month. But the evidence against Verma can be questioned, as investigations suggest. Verma, who has been quizzed by UCC investigators, is aware of the multinational's designs but claims to be not worried. Says he: "I have faith in my innocence."

Several pointers indicate that Verma is the person UCC wants to pin down. Carbide had alleged that following a row with his superiors, a "disgruntled employee" who had been demoted a week earlier, had entered the plant without authorisation on the night of December 2, rigged up a water hose to the storage tank containing MIC and quietly injected about 500 kg of water to the highly volatile and toxic chemical, triggering the disaster. Verma is the only person who fits this description.

Verma, who took up the job of an industry inspector with the Madhya Pradesh Government's Directorate of Industries after the Carbide plant closed down, had a grudge against his employers because even after working for two years in the MIC unit—earlier he was in another unit of the plant—he had not been confirmed as an operator. He was the only fifth grade operator in the MIC plant; all his colleagues had moved up to the higher grade. Verma had asked the workers' union to take up his case. "Although I was fully trained, I was not given independent charge," he complained in an interview last fortnight.

Verma also confirmed that he had had a row with a superior officer shortly before the disaster. "I had admonished production manager S.P. Choudhury and was expecting my transfer from the MIC unit any time," he said. Although he was not demoted—the company's records show that no employee was demoted a week before the disaster—he was punished by being transferred to the less sophisticated Sevin unit. Verma contends that the transfer order was never served on him, which is why he continued to report to the MIC plant. But the company's records show that the order was indeed issued and it is on the basis of this that Carbide is likely to argue that Verma had entered the MIC unit without the management's authorisation.

But the UCC is overlooking one crucial fact. Verma had punched his card at 10.33 p.m. on the night of December 2, and the leak was first noticed at 11 p.m. "Was it possible for him to go to his locker, change into his uniform, connect the hose pipe to the MIC tank and inject 500 kg of water in 27 minutes?" asked former MIC plant operator T.R. Chouhan. The water pipe, said Chouhan, had a half-inch diameter and the injection of 500 kg of water would have taken at least 45 minutes.

Besides, according to the March 1985 report of the UCC investigating team, the temperature of the MIC in the particular tank (No. 610) before the accident was between 15 and 20 degrees celsius. The company's MIC manual says that at this temperature MIC would take at least 23 hours to react if water was mixed with it.

Carbide has also claimed that the man who put the water into the MIC was not aware of the disastrous runaway reaction it would cause and had injected the water only to spoil a batch of chemicals. But Verma dismisses this hypothesis, saying: "Am I a fool? I am a science graduate and I know what MIC can do."

Nevertheless, UCC has been working overtime to push the sabotage theory. A team of UCC officials, aided by officials of its Indian subsidiary, have been closely questioning former workers at the company's swank research and development centre in Bhopal. Some workers maintain that the officials tried to persuade them to state in court that they had seen Verma near the MIC tank that night though he was not supposed to be there. Some officials of Union Carbide (India) Limited deny that Verma is their target, but Vice-President K.S. Kamdar said guardedly: "In my long experience, industrial sabotage of this nature takes place mostly during the nights and the story is plausible."

Carbide had earlier tried to pin the responsibility on a Sikh employee, sacked along with several dozen other officers after the leak. But the company forgot that the man had stood surety for the managing director (now chairman) of its Indian subsidiary, V.P. Gokhale, arrested along with several other senior officials after the disaster. When he threatened to withdraw his surety, the company withdrew the sack order and posted him to its Lucknow plant. Now Carbide has zeroed in on Verma.

ACTION GROUPS

Knocked Out

THE arrest of a voluntary worker, Gautam Banerjee, and a British youth, David Bergman, working among the gas-affected children of Bhopal has focused attention on the voluntary groups trying to help the victims of the Carbide disaster. Banerjee was held for allegedly trying to tape a meeting of doctors discussing the problems of the victims, and Bergman was held under the Official Secrets Act after incriminating documents were allegedly recovered from Bergman's house.

There are almost two dozen voluntary action groups in India and abroad which are ostensibly providing relief and organising the victims to fight for their rights. But last month's incidents showed that they are not only a badly fragmented lot but deeply antagonistic to one another. Though most of them swear by Karl Marx, and some belong to the extreme left, at least three of them—Zahreeli Gas Kand Sangharsh Morcha, Citizens' Committee for Relief and the Bhopal Group for Information and Action (BGIA)—have called each other "CIA agents" and "Carbide spies". Their mutual distrust is so widely known that various intelligence agencies have been known to approach them for information on one another.

The Morcha—which is the largest of all the voluntary groups—split earlier this year with social scientist Anil Sadgopal, backed by his Kishore Bharati group, branching off.

Banerjee (with face covered) and Bergman (bottom): under arrest

Photographs by R.C. SAHU

He now lends his support to the BGIA, with whom Gautam Banerjee is associated. Alok Pratap Singh, a political activist of the Socialist Unity Centre of India (SUCI), which controls the leadership of the Morcha, now doubts the credentials of his former comrades. "The range of the foreign connections they had is unbelievable," he now says.

Singh suspects that most of the information the voluntary agencies collect is finding its way to "undesirable" foreign powers. Soon after Banerjee's arrest, the Morcha issued a statement calling for an official inquiry into how the BGIA had come into possession of "confidential" documents like the Indian Council of Agricultural Research's report on the effects of methyl isocyanate on animal and plant life. But BGIA member Sadhna Saxena hit back by calling the Morcha "agents of Union Carbide" and said they were critical of the BGIA because they wanted to escape the wrath of the police.

As it is, the activities of the voluntary groups, tired after a long fight with the authorities, are at their lowest ebb. The arrests and the alacrity with which the police has proceeded against them have also brought their vulnerability out into the open. The now open in-fighting is bound to affect their strength as an effective pressure group on the Madhya Pradesh Government, which is tragic because the state Government has shown itself incapable of taking any initiative unless the action groups put pressure on them.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

At a very young age, he could play the harpsichord and violin, improvise fugues, write minuets and read music perfectly at first sight. The rest is history.

nosays don't make history.

It all began with a lone F-27 taking off from Guwahati on January 26, 1981. Three years later, Vayudoot was still the favourite subject of the sceptics.

But a job had to be done.

And aviation history was made.

Highest operational growth — worldwide.

Amongst the airlines in the world, Vayudoot's network has been growing at a phenomenal rate.

32 stations in one year — an unparalleled achievement. By 1988-89, Vayudoot's network will have grown from the present 67 stations to 130.

What is remarkable is that expansion has taken place alongside profitability. The current year's operation will not only wipe out losses totalling Rs. 1.76 crores, but will in fact achieve a healthy profit-objective of Rs. 75 lakhs.

10 new Dorniers. Highest fleet utilisation.

The Vayudoot fleet of Dorniers, Avros and Fokkers is flying day and night across the network. The fleet will soon be augmented by larger-capacity aircraft, to meet future demands of flying over 5,00,000 people in 1987.

Customer Service — the accent on quality.

Statistics alone don't make headlines. And Vayudoot is conscious of the fact that customer service demands priority. The whole operation is being geared up to fulfil this task.

Cabin crew personnel have been recruited. And an all-station communication link-up is on the cards to facilitate quick reservations and service.

Modern management ethos.

Vayudoot is more than just a flying operation.

The organisation has successfully launched innovative ideas, such as the highly imaginative night-mail service, the 'Rent-a-Plane' scheme and the holiday packages.

A crucial aspect of the ethos is the constant striving for high productivity and low overhead costs. And a team of dedicated personnel is geared to customer satisfaction and corporate excellence.

The whole operation runs with clear, planned strategies. To fulfil a very definite task.

Of airlinking remote, inaccessible places.

Of saving time in transportation.

Of opening up the country for tourism.

Of boosting trade and business.

Of bringing India closer to Indians.

It's the very idea behind Vayudoot. And it's making history.

WEST BENGAL

Battle Begins

The elections in West Bengal are at least five months away, but the battle between the Communist Party of India-Marxist (CPI-M) and the Congress(I) has already been joined. With Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi going on a three-day swing through the state last fortnight and the ruling Left Front announcing the names of 242 out of 294 candidates, the campaign has practically begun. Clearly the battle for Bengal is going to be won or lost on the strength of a youthful prime minister's charisma and Chief Minister Jyoti Basu's record in office.

Ostensibly, Rajiv's visit was supposed to signal the start of a new style of solving state problems—of landing up with ministers and bureaucrats and taking instant decisions on pending projects. Thus, Rajiv was accompanied by 10 Union ministers, who sat with him in a marathon seven-hour session with Left Front leaders, at the end of which he announced that projects worth Rs 684 crore had been cleared for the state.

But however much Rajiv remonstrated that there was no political motive behind the bonanza, there was little doubt that he had an eye on the coming polls. In announcing that Rs 300 crore would go to the jute industry, he repeatedly stressed that this is what "our party people" had been demanding. And it was soon obvious, that the spot clearances were clearly part of a strategy to show the Centre as magnanimous and the Left Front Government as inefficient.

In two major meetings in Durgapur and Haldia—and in numerous roadside discussions with awed villagers—Rajiv tried to counter the state Government's propaganda about Central discrimination by arguing that the ineptness of the state Government ("Sometimes they even send project reports to wrong ministries"), and its misplaced sense of priorities were responsible for West Bengal's economic slide. Two examples:

► The state could not spend about a third of the Rs 3,500 crore sanctioned for the sixth plan because of poor resource mobilisation on its part.

► While the state's shortfalls in the sixth plan were 34 per cent in agriculture and 44 per cent in industry, it had spent 59 per cent more than the amount budgeted for information and publicity.

While Basu and his aides rebutted the allegations—the poor resource mobilisation had its reasons; the publicity budget had been exceeded because of the creation of fixed assets like a studio and a cinema hall—it did seem that Rajiv had clearly seized the initiative in the propaganda war. But the prime minister blundered badly in his reference to the Gorkhaland issue. Though he clarified there would be no further division of the state, he confounded everyone including his own partymen by saying that he had yet to come across the demand for Gorkhaland and that the movement launched by the Gorkha National Liberation Front was not anti-national.

The state Congress(I) committee is a party to a joint resolution calling it anti-national, and seven of its MLA's are listed to speak on a similar resolution in the Assembly. Complained one: "The prime minister should have consulted us, or at least told us his views on the agitation. But now we feel totally foolish." Seizing his opening, Basu lambasted Rajiv's stand on Gorkhaland, declaring: "The prime minister has done incalculable harm to West Bengal." Basu's charge that Rajiv was creating a potential Punjab in Darjeeling by his ill-conceived remarks seemed to touch just the right chord among the state's middle class.

Basu's imprimatur, meanwhile, is evident in the 54 new names which feature in the CPI(M)'s list of nominees. Included are Basu's favourites—economics Professor Asim Dasgupta (expected to be the next state finance minister), Buddadev Bhattacharya (former cultural affairs minister who was defeated in the last assembly polls) and Gopal Bose (candidate for the Naihati seat). Party cadres have welcomed the list as many old and almost incapacitated leaders have been axed, including three ministers. Basu has also kept his Front partners happy by resisting party pressures to cut their quota.

Congress(I) Vice-President Arjun Singh, who accompanied Rajiv, later said that the Congress(I) too would be announcing its state list in advance—probably at the month-end. But this could give disgruntled elements enough time to cross over to Pranab Mukherjee's faction, which could spoil things for the Congress(I). Nevertheless, as Rajiv's visit clearly brought out, the outcome of the next elections will largely be decided by the credibility of the two most visible personalities in the state: Rajiv Gandhi and Jyoti Basu.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Star Wars

USE the silver screen to debunk a political hero created by it: that is the dictum that Telugu actor and Congress(I) activist Krishna has used with telling effect in Naa Pilupe Prabhanjam (Clarion Call). A devastating piece of political satire, the film lampoons the chicanery, confusion and corruption of the Telugu Desam's 44 months in power with thinly veiled characterisations of Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao and the coterie of family members which surrounds him. The film—in which Rama Rao's parallel is a despotic ruler of an island state—ends with a call to the people to be more careful in choosing their next leader.

In what might be a commentary on Rama Rao's personal popularity, the film has been drawing packed houses at the 75 theatres in the state where its 54 prints have been exhibited regularly during the fortnight since it was released. Rama Rao himself has not commented on the film but its success has caused considerable apprehension among Telugu Desam legislators and ministers, who have invariably seen it on pirated video tapes. Charged an MLA: "Krishna got it past the censors only because the Censor Board is controlled by the Central Government."

Worried Rama Rao fans, led by their association President Sripat Rajeshwar, MLA, tried to stop the screening of the film in Hyderabad by threatening cinema hall owners. But the move backfired when distributors called a press conference to protest against the harassment. Observed a political commentator: "The fact that Telugu Desam legislators are developing doubts about the popularity of their leader shows that the film is bound to change the minds of the gullible villagers."

The hero of the film is Krishna in the role of a conscientious "deputy general" of the police in the island state of Trilinga Deevi (Trilinga is the land of the Telugus and Deevi is island) who decides to fight the despotic rule of its ruler Kodandaramaiah. Like Rama Rao, Kodandaramaiah has a booming voice, a stately gait, idiosyncrasies like rolling his eyes when angry and talks unceasingly of the Trilinga culture and way of life. Kodandaramaiah decrees that nobody should sit across him in his office—visitors sit in two rows of chairs facing each other on either side, as they do in Rama Rao's presence. Kodandaramaiah's spectacled pedda alludu (elder son-in-law) is Rama Rao's elder son-in-law Dr Venkateshwarao Rao, and the overbearing chinna alludu (younger son-in-law) is the Telugu Desam General Secretary N. Chandrababu Naidu.

Prodded by the frank but tactless advice of the pedda alludu and influenced by the machinating chinna alludu (called 'Babu Garu' in the film, as in real life), Kodandaramaiah runs his kingdom very much like Rama Rao has ruled Andhra Pradesh. Rama Rao had lowered the retirement age of government employees from 58 to 55; Kodandaramaiah reduces it from 59 to 56. Rama Rao encourages sycophancy by allowing visitors to fall at his feet; so does Kodandaramaiah. An empty treasury compelled Rama Rao to withdraw some of his populist welfare measures; Kodandaramaiah talks of taxing trees to finance welfare schemes.

Telugu actor—and Congress(I) activist—Krishna's film Naa Pilupe Prabhanjam is a political satire on Rama Rao's rule which has got the Telugu Desam worried by the crowds it is drawing.

Scene from Naa Pilupe Prabhanjam (top); and Krishna

The film does not have a story-line—it is a string of incidents held together by a sharply worded script. Nor is it great cinema, but it succeeds admirably in becoming a grim reminder of high-handed family rule. Only the denouement—Kodandaramaiah is forced to flee and his younger son-in-law is sent to jail—is fantasy; the rest is mostly true to life. Says S. Krishna Rao, a clerk in the state secretariat: "Only if our women who are sold on Rama Rao's charms see this film, can Andhra Pradesh hope for happier days."

Meanwhile, the Telugu Desam is said to be preparing in celluloid its answer to the challenge. Rama Rao's son, Balakrishna, is likely to star in the proposed film, but the party's ministers cannot decide whether the focus of their attack should be the Congress(I)'s earlier rule in the state or the life of Krishna. Either way, Andhra's star wars are clearly hotting up.

The Politics of Reservation

THE recent actions of the Andhra Pradesh Government in increasing reservations for the "backward castes" and the consequences that have followed, have brought to the fore once again this vexed question. In spite of many reports of commissions and committees, many judicial pronouncements and much violence, no satisfactory solution to the problem these reservations are intended to meet has yet emerged.

In trying to suggest one, it would be helpful to ask a few fundamental questions. What kind of a society are we trying to build? Do reservations help in the creation of that society? If not, what is the alternative?

The kind of India we aim at is described in the Preamble to the Constitution. Apart from liberty, fraternity and justice, our objective is "equality of status and opportunity". It is this objective the reservations seek to achieve.

Positive discrimination becomes necessary by government when certain groups have been "disadvantaged" or made "backward" by the present or past behaviour of society. If backwardness is not due to any action of society at large but to some failing in the individual or group, there is no obligation on society to confer favours on that individual or group; nor can governmental action cure the defects which cause this backwardness. Examples of such failings are lack of intelligence or talent, indiscipline, aversion to hard work or very commonly, a fundamentalist religious belief that rejects logical thought on which modern civilisation is based.

Judged by the test of whether the disabilities have or have not been caused by social action, reservations in favour of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes are justified. The former have for centuries been forcibly prevented by Hindu society from educating themselves. The denial of opportunity to the Scheduled Tribes is due principally to reasons of geography and history, but society is responsible for their neglect.

The justification for extension of reservations to the other castes is not at all clear. No castes, other than the scheduled, have been prevented by society from taking advantage of the opportunities available for their betterment. What does often prevent them from doing so is poverty, for which imperfections in the social order can be held responsible. Discrimination based on economic status is thus understandable; that based on heredity is not.

The articles of the Constitution permitting such discrimination refer invariably to backward classes and not castes.

> "The motivation for the ever-increasing reservations is not to the benefit of the ostensible beneficiaries but is purely political. Reservation is of electoral benefit to political parties."

The equation of caste with class is defended on the ground that in India the two are virtually synonymous because castes follow hereditary occupations. This, of course, is demonstrably incorrect. But even if it were not, would it not make sense to make reservations on the basis of occupations rather than caste? There can be justification for preference being given to the children of a cobbler who actually cobbles, but on what ground can a similar preference be justified for the children of someone from the cobbler caste who is a civil servant or a minister? And yet, so great are the vested interests so created that any suggestion to introduce a means test, even within the existing system, is violently opposed.

The assumption underlying reservations is that by favouring the backward castes, the level of the whole community will be raised. Experience since Independence has shown that the advantage of those reservations has been limited to a small group of those already privileged, leaving the rest of the community as backward as before.

The motivation for the ever-increasing reservations (despite the judgement of the Supreme Court that their maximum limit should be 50 per cent) is not to the benefit of the ostensible beneficiaries but is purely political. Increasing the quantum of reservation and including an ever-widening number of castes in the definition of backward is of electoral benefit to the political parties.

While the good that reservations do to the castes in whose favour they are made is best limited, their harmful effect on the country is great. The greatest harm is to national integration and unity. In a country which is not short of bases of division, caste-based discrimination causes intense inter-caste friction and even enmity. Moreover, such reservations give rise to inbuilt interest in the continuation of backwardness. A whole nation seems wanting to become backward rather than to advance. The effect on the efficiency of the public services is marked. In a polity where the state plays an ever-increasing role, the greatest harm results from the incompetence of the public services.

What then, is the alternative to the present system of reservations in a society where there are vast differences between the competence of various sections of the population? The search for one must start from the recognition that there is no instant solution because the key to it is education. My own solution would therefore be to make education of high quality, comparable to that available today only to the rich in the public schools, which should be at the kindergarten stage, should be purely on the basis of talent, talent being tested through recognised tests which eliminate the influence of environment. Full scholarships should be given to all those admitted after a stringent means test. Students coming out of these schools (the vast majority of whom would, because of the means test, belong to the poorest and most backward classes) will be able to compete on equal terms with the most advanced, doing away ultimately with the need for reservations. In one generation the objective would be much nearer achievement without any of the harmful effects of the present policies which, in any case, are not leading anywhere.

Number Game

RAJASTHAN'S Transport Minister Sheesh Ram Ola has got himself into an amusing tangle—though he may not see the humour in it. Ola faces a writ in the high court for getting the registration number RNV 1 for his new Maruti.

Ola: car tangle

According to Kanta Sharma, the petitioner, she had applied for this number before Ola and, like him, had deposited Rs 500 as required with the transport authorities. She went to court when, on inquiring with the transport secretary about her application, she was told that she couldn't get it because the number had been allotted to someone else.

Funnily, this is not the first time that Ola has been involved in a dispute of this nature. Some time back he had to face legal action when, after selling his jeep—RJP 1—he decided to retain the registration number for himself. Being number one constantly, Ola is beginning to find, is not easy.

Controversial Art

BHOPAL'S Bharat Bhavan and its cultural hierarchy have a knack of attracting controversy. This time, it is art gallery Director J. Swaminathan who is under attack in the local press over the sculpture of a shaheen (a falcon-like bird) that he carved for the town's Iqbal Memorial Park. The bird was put on display last year to depict the Urdu poet's "spirit of fearlessness, uncompromising will to fight the forces of darkness and indomitable thirst for freedom".

R.C. SAHU

Shaheen sculpture and (inset) Swaminathan

But critics say it isn't a shaheen at all. A citizens' group, the Public Social Welfare Society, has petitioned that the Bhopal Development Authority misused Rs 3.50 lakh of public funds for the statue, acclaimed by M.F. Husain, Syder Haider Raza and Krishan Khanna. The people aren't impressed: they want the "eyesore" removed.

Says Swaminathan: "It is not supposed to be beautiful. It's not one of the big-breasted, big-buttocked statues you see as art in public places. Made in the wake of the gas tragedy, it is a grim thing, a warning to multinationals."

Beautifying Bangalore

BANGALOREANS are happy to host the seven-nation South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) summit next month. But their delight is because the city is being done up—well, parts of it. So poor is the state of

G. DEEPAK PAWAR

Bangalore's M.G. Road being spruced up the "garden city" that an annoyed Hegde wrote to Mayor B.V. Putte Gowda, asking him "to clean up Bangalore in a fortnight," adding: "I do not want a reply. I want action."

The summit means better roads, clean drains, gleaming lamp posts, functional street lights and speedy disposal of piled-up garbage. The bill for the face-lift: Rs 2 crore, which the state is trying to get from the Centre. Also, apart from the swank hotels, the Nandi Hills resort 60 km away, where the delegates will take a break from the summit exercises, is being primmed and polished.

Ready Reddy

CIVIL servants like to keep a low-profile, but not Akepati Vijaya Sagar Reddy, 41, the popular and hardworking IAS officer who is (or was) Andhra Pradesh's commissioner for panchayati raj. In 1982, he was asked to go on short leave for criticising the frequent change of chief ministers in the state. In August, Reddy, a former major in the Madras Regiment, made critical references to NTR while talking to newsmen about the activities of the Federation of Ex-Servicemen's Associations. He was suspended on September 11 for his outspokenness.

Reddy: in limbo

But it is Reddy's suspension—and not his remarks—that is making waves. Cuddapah, his home district town, observed a bandh and students took out protest rallies in several towns in Krishna district, where Reddy was earlier posted. Ex-servicemen are also planning to come out in a major rally in Hyderabad on October 6 to register their disapproval.

Meanwhile, Reddy, unfazed, is appealing against the order to the Department of Personnel Affairs in New Delhi and is busy organising relief and rehabilitation work as a "volunteer" in the state's flood ravaged areas.

Record Breaking Games

IT seems a travesty that there exists no monument to a man called G.D. Sondhi who, at the 1948 London Olympics, proposed the formation of the Asian Games Federation to organise the Asian Games every four years, midway between the Olympics. Sondhi, the then Indian representative on the International Olympic Committee, now lies buried in the storage system of the computers spewing out Asiad-related information at the main press centre in Seoul, but his brain-child has blossomed into a bejewelled sporting extravaganza that, perhaps even more than the boycott-burdened Olympics, symbolises the true spirit of international sport.

DESPITE the predictable absence of neighbouring North Korea, and the seemingly related bomb explosion at Seoul's Kimpo International Airport while the 4,000-odd athletes were arriving for the Games, the 10th Asiad seems destined to be the most memorable ever, if the first week of competition is any indication. The setting itself is near-perfect. Against the backdrop of the gently rolling mountains that ring Seoul's skyscrapers like benign Buddhas, the city shivers with Asiad fever. Huge welcome arches and artfully constructed flower-beds add splashes of bright colour to the broad, bustling avenues and spotless sidewalks. In the stadia jammed with hysterically excitable locals, the major Korean companies have organised paid "support groups" for countries they have business dealings with in the ultimate Korean-style public relations exercise. In Seoul's hustling markets, the Asiad symbol is stamped on everything from underwear to after-shave.

But stripped of the commercial hype that envelopes the Games like gift wrapping, Seoul, at least for the 16-day duration of the Asiad, belongs to the sportsmen and women. Never before in the history of the Asian Games have records looked so vulnerable. In just six days of competition, an incredible 111 athletes have broken the existing Asian Games records, 93 in swimming alone. At the Chamshil swimming pool, records seemed to sink without a trace in virtually every event. In at least 15 events for men and women, all six finalists finished with timings far better than the existing Asian Games marks. The record-smashers included Indian policeman Khazan Singh Tokas, who gave the Indian medal tally its first semblance of respectability by winning a silver medal in the 200 metres butterfly, in a timing of 2:02:38, and Ranjoy Punja, the California-based engineering student who also shattered the Asian Games mark while posting his best ever timing, though he failed to win a medal in the face of the onslaught by Japanese swimmers who dominated the event.

But if Japan ruled the waves at Chamshil, the Chinese seemed almost invincible everywhere else. At the end of the ninth day, China had established a handsome lead with a tally of 143 medals, including 66 gold, compared to second-placed Japan with 128 medals (42 gold) and Korea with 110 medals (34 gold).

THE Chinese charge was led by gymnastic superstar Li Ning, who towered over the first week of the Games like the proverbial colossus. Li, a triple gold medalist at the Los Angeles Olympics two years ago, seemed to suffer no ill-effects from his evenings spent at the Games Village discotheque. The 23-year-old post-graduate student from Beijing captivated the huge crowds at the gymnasium with his effortless grace and supreme confidence. The muscular machine had predicted that he would leave Seoul with five gold medals; and though he finally ended up with four gold and two silver, he was clearly the star of the Games and spearheaded China's near-total domination of the gymnastics stadium. In the process, he firmly re-established his credentials as the world's best all-round gymnast.

Li's performance, the best so far in terms of individual medals, was only matched by that of the elf-like Chen Cuiting, who at 130 cm is the tiniest competitor at the Games. Cuiting, 15, labelled 'Asia's Nadia Comaneci', won the hearts of the capacity crowds with her daringly dazzling acrobatics that gave her a perfect 10 in the floor exercises, the first such score in Asiad gymnastic history. The aptly-named Cuiting waltzed away with three gold in leading her team to victory in the team competition and, along with Li Ning, gave notice that this was to be China's Games.

Despite a major setback in the men's and women's table tennis competition, where the world champions were shocked into submission by host country South Korea—their first loss in an international tournament in a decade—China dominated the Games like never before. At the start of the Games, Chinese officials had conservatively predicted that they would return with 75 gold. But unexpected victories in the swimming events and a clean sweep of the rowing and fencing events indicate that they will far surpass even their own estimates.

FOR China, the Seoul Asiad offers a unique opportunity to establish its claim as the leading sports power in Asia. In the 35-year history of the Asian Games, that honour had consistently been held by Japan until the New Delhi Games. China stayed away from the first six Asian Games and finished third in its debut at the Teheran Games in 1974. It improved its standing to second place in the eighth Asiad in Bangkok, finishing behind Japan, and only narrowly beat Japan to first place at the New Delhi Games in 1982 with 61 gold, 51 silver and 41 bronze, compared to Japan's 57 gold, 52 silver and 44 bronze medals. Clearly, at Seoul, the Chinese are determined to establish a commanding lead over their closest rivals, the Japanese.

Certainly, the big three—China, Japan, and South Korea—will finish way ahead of the other 24 countries taking part in the Games. At the end of the first week, the indications were that South Korea and Japan would be engaged in a see-saw battle for the second spot. The South Korean team, spurred on by frenzied supporters in the stands and by lucrative inducements—local sports fans have donated money towards an intriguing scheme whereby every South Korean medal winner at the Games and the concerned coaches will receive an extra medal made of pure gold worth 50,000 wong (Rs 700)—has made a superhuman effort to beat arch rivals Japan to the second place at the Games. Already, their table tennis, swimming, shooting and gymnastic gold medalists have become national heroes overnight, with South Korean television showing repeated sequences of their victories. The host country's coaches say that their athletes have been training for 700 days before the Games on the high-tech equipment and surfaces set up for the Asiad which is, for South Korea, essentially a show-window for the 1988 Olympics.

In contrast, the performance by the Indian contingent in the initial stages of the Games was an abject disappointment, despite the cheering by the Indian "support groups" in the stands. On arrival, the Indian chef de mission, the genial and over-worked Ashok Kumar Mattoo, and Minister of State for Sports Margaret Alva, who is here along with her businessman husband as head of the Indian delegation, had been overly optimistic about India's chances, rated especially good because of North Korea staying away from Seoul. But by the ninth day of the competitive events, India was placed low down in the medals table, even behind unfancied Iran, and without a gold medal yet to its credit. The embarrassing tally of three silver and seven bronze medals (the former won by yachtsmen Farooq Tarapore and Dhruv Bhandari, double-medal shooter Soma Dutta and swimmer Khazan Singh) presented no hope of bettering India's performance at the New Delhi Games four years ago.

Clearly, Alva's effort in prodding the Finance Ministry into releasing the extra foreign exchange needed to bring the Indian contingent to Seoul a week before the Games started has paid little dividends so far. India's main hope in the men's shooting competition, Randhir Singh, started off literally with a bang on the first day with a score that put him in second place. But he, like the rest of his team-mates, faded out subsequently to finish way down the ladder. "I can't explain it," shrugged the burly Sikh. "Nothing seemed to go right." Tragically, that seemed a refrain sung with embarrassing regularity as far as the Indians were concerned.

THE hockey team did the most damage to India's gold medal hopes with an ignominious defeat against Pakistan in the semi-finals, the premature clash between the two giants of Asian hockey resulting from Pakistan's shock defeat at the hands of Malaysia in a group match. As in their first match against the eventual gold medallists South Korea, India's semi-final performance was clearly a case of lack of strategy and pre-match planning. Both India and Pakistan muffed chances, but Pakistan played with greater understanding and coordination, they were quicker on the ball and closely marked the mercurial Mohammed Shahid. The Indian skipper at his best is the most exciting and talented forward in the game. But his over-confidence bordered all too often on selfishness when he got control of the ball, and the lack of proper support from the other forwards meant that the Indian attack often lacked bite. India might have won despite these faults if two easy chances had not been missed, one of them by none other than Shahid himself. The team finally faced the humiliating fate of battling it out for the bronze for the first time in Asiad history, and the fact that they did eventually get the bronze was poor consolation.

IT was the same story of so near and yet so far in the yachting events held at the beautiful port of Pusan, Korea's second largest city, 400 km from Seoul. Farooq Tarapore and his crew member Dhruv Bhandari established an early lead in the 470 Class and looked set for the gold till as late as the end of the sixth day of the seven-race event when they were still in the lead. But the last day was a disaster for the duo from Bombay. They finished fourth and got eight penalty points while the Chinese team, behind by one point at the start, sailed beautifully to get no penalty points. Tarapore and Bhandari had to be satisfied with a silver—seven penalty points behind the Chinese. Still, Tarapore and Bhandari deserve kudos because yachting is a neglected sport in India. As a disappointed Tarapore points out, Japan has 2,000 sailors in this particular class while India has just one team.

Meanwhile, the most embarrassing performance for Indian supporters was that of the gymnasts, who lacked the confidence needed for a major international competition. The Indian support groups looked almost ashamed when Indian gymnasts repeatedly fell on their backsides, even on the pommel horse, or stumbled and slipped on the other apparatus. But as gymnast Ratan Debnath said after the competition: "Our performance was not a disappointment. It was, in fact, pre-ordained. In India we are not provided rubber safety mats, so we are forced to practise on grass. Unless we improve and update our equipment Indian gymnasts will continue to do badly in such competitions."

But no such excuse could hold good for the golfing team, who were strong challengers after their two golds in the New Delhi Games even with the absence of Laxman Singh, who has turned pro. But at the perfectly maniured Hanyang Country Club. Rajeev Mehta and his team-mates figured way down in the final placings, being upstaged by a 16-year-old Philippine schoolboy who created something of a sensation by winning the individual gold. The football team was another disaster, losing all their group matches and ending up at the bottom of the table, while Chand Ram broke his Asian Games record but got a disappointing bronze in the 20-km walk, for which he had won the gold in New Delhi four years ago. The badminton team assured itself of a bronze, as did boxer Gopal Dewang. But the overall Indian performance was disappointing. In fact, early on it appeared that the only authentic Indian victory was by Bombay judoist Cawas Billimoria, 24, who won the grand prix award at the Games Village talent contest with his imitation of Elvis Presley.

Mattoo and other Indian officials and coaches defended the Indian performance by pointing out that India was not expected to do well in any of the events scheduled for the initial stages of the Games. "We will get our medals in boxing, wrestling and track and field," said Mattoo. That is certainly true. But even so, Indian officials had obviously been hoping for medals in the equestrian events, where in the words of Major-General Narindra Singh, a former member of the Indian equestrian team, "we performed damned poorly, well below our expectations." The equestrian team had given India two gold medals at the New Delhi Asiad.

SUSHIL SHARMA

CONSOLATION, if any, lies in the fact that India seems to have a special place in South Korean hearts, not the least because it was the New Delhi Asiad that gave South Korea the confidence to stage the Olympics in 1988, a fact gratefully acknowledged by most officials.

South Korean youth, who have packed the stadia, give genuinely warm greetings to people from "Indo", and officials in charge of the Games were quick to respond to an Indian protest about the map of India displayed at the opening ceremony which inadvertently left out Jammu & Kashmir. A counter-protest from Pakistan finally ended in a compromise decision to avoid showing the map again. Meanwhile Alva, who has done a remarkable job as the leader of the Indian delegation with her grace and charm and even wit, has accepted the apology without blowing up the issue into a major diplomatic tangle.

Alva's success has, however, been diluted to some extent by the less qualified members of the Indian delegation, like Aslam Sher Khan, the former Indian hockey captain who is now a member of Parliament. Khan strolls in for official and formal dinners when everyone else has finished eating—a major sin in a country that worships politeness and punctuality—wearing open-necked sports shirts and then proceeds to wolf down his food while the final speeches are being delivered.

MEANWHILE, the Indian support group in Seoul is sponsored by the big three of South Korean industry—Hyundai, Daewoo and Samsung. The three firms, like other South Korean corporations, have recruited students and employees to form cheering squads for Indian participants in the belief that this gesture will strengthen commercial ties. In some cases, this has led to the incongruous sight of Korean students wearing traditional Arab costumes complete with headgear, cheering for countries like Saudi Arabia, Iran and Iraq.

If there is anything that has marred the smooth and efficient functioning of the Games, it is the excessive security, considerably tightened after the bomb blast at Kimpo airport. Journalists, spectators and even VIP guests are screened at all Games sites with metal detectors, body searches and even mirrors on trolleys that are pushed under arriving cars to check on the undercarriage. Even the engine bonnets are opened to check for potential explosives. Armed guards patrol every street corner and the stadia are like fortresses. The Koreans believe that North Korea will do anything to disrupt the Games, and consequently their Olympic prospects, and tourists have had a harried time with the constant checking of bags and baggage at hotel lobbies where the delegations or even journalists are staying. There are even guards on 24-hour duty on every hotel floor. The security measures have proved irksome for many officials and media personnel, not to speak of travellers who have to report two hours before every domestic flight at the airport where long queues have led to constant delays and rescheduling. The South Koreans, however, are determined that the Games should proceed without any major mishap and the security guards have been specially instructed to be extra polite while conducting their checks.

In any event, Seoul has its sights set much higher. Everything and everybody is geared to making the Games a showpiece with an eye on the 1988 Olympics. Thousands of volunteers have come forward to offer their services for the efficient running of the Games, and Seoul's world class sports facilities and stadia often have more volunteers than spectators.

Seoul has also shrugged aside the dampening effect of the rain that drenched the opening ceremony, with its heavy emphasis on traditional folk dancing and Taekwondo, the Korean martial art, and emerged with flying colours. If there is one major problem it is the lack of South Korean officials and volunteers with an adequate knowledge of English, causing major communication problems. But officials say they already have an army of student volunteers taking courses in English to help them cope with the massive influx of foreigners expected during the Olympics.

That aberration is, however, a window to South Korea. Seoul itself is a bustling and modern city (pop: 9 million) which is at the same time steeped heavily in tradition. The Korean people are ever eager to please, excessively helpful and polite and almost over-enthusiastic in their desire to make foreigners feel at home. The youth, apart from the more radical breed of students who have voluntarily stopped their protest battles with the police for the duration of the Games, are respectful to their elders and show an amazing amount of discipline and industry in everything they do. Unlike other nearby countries like the Philippines and Thailand, South Korean youth have also stayed uncorrupted by the heavy American military presence in their country, except in pockets like the city of Taewan with its cluster of discos, night-clubs, bars and gambling halls. The Americans have their own television channel, which keeps them well supplied with football and baseball games back home.

BUT the Games have produced their own external influences. At the Games Village where, unlike in New Delhi, the tastefully laid out apartments have already been sold to customers prepared to wait till 1988 for possession, Saudi Prince Turki Al Saud has shocked the South Korean volunteers helping out at the Games by insisting on doling out $50 tips to all and sundry. In a country where tipping anywhere is frowned upon, Turki's generosity has not been received as well as in the Lotte department store where, accompanied by four armed bodyguards carrying pouches of dollar notes, he ran up a bill totalling a staggering $8,000 in one outing. Turki is a participant in the bowling competition, which also features the oldest participant in the Games, the 56-year-old Rosario De Leon from the Philippines.

As for the Indian athletes at the village, already they are showing signs of home sickness, not the least because of the lack of Indian-type food. Korean food is essentially meat and fish, but far too bland for Indian palates; the only option is American-style hamburgers. The lack of Indian residents in Seoul also means that there is a shortage of Indian restaurants serving typical Indian khana in the city to break the dietary monotony.

Most Indian participants, however, were pinning their hopes on the track and field competition to improve their medal showing. P.T. Usha, India's main hope in the athletic stadium, began confidently setting a new Games record in the 200 M heats and still looked in line for five golds—with a little help from her teammates in the relays. On current form, Usha's closest challenger in the sprints is Lydia De Vega of the Philippines, who had predicted that she will win the 100 metres gold. But the Philippine star has been on the injury list in recent months and Usha's coach Nambiar dismisses her as a serious challenger. "Usha is 100 per cent fit right now and in peak form. She should have no problems at all in her events," he says while watching Usha pedal around the village on a cycle to improve her leg muscles. Similarly, Valsamma, Suman Rawat, Vandana Rao and Asha Aggarwal exuded confidence and looked in top condition as the geometrically-designed main stadium came alive with the start of the glamorous track and field events.

Saving grace: sprint star P.T. Usha

Indian coaches were also quite hopeful of grabbing a brace of medals in the boxing ring, and at least another two more in the wrestling arena though, even as Mattoo admits: "The lack of experience of the Indian wrestling squad in the recently-introduced Greco-Roman style could prove a major handicap."

Despite the initially disappointing start, the 300-strong Indian contingent still looks capable of coming in fourth, finishing behind China, Japan and Korea. But it is highly unlikely that they will be able to repeat their medal performance of the New Delhi Games. And, despite Alva's repeated insistence that medals are not everything, when the curtain finally comes down in Seoul, it will be the medals that eventually matter.

You can tie up with us for a profitable distribution opportunity.

Swede (India) Teltronics Limited, in technical collaboration with the international telecommunication giant, Ericsson Information Systems AB of Sweden, brings hi-tech push button telephones to India. To tap a market of over 28 million users. Swede (India) invites top-bracket distribution organisations to share this opportunity, with powerful logistics and after-sales service inputs.

A MULTI-CRORE MARKET... WAITING TO BE TAPPED

India today, has only 4 million telephones — with only 4 telephones to 1000 people. The barest minimum required in comparison with world standards is a phenomenal 28 million. What's more, the use of two instruments per connection has been legalised. The estimated replacement market is as high as 4 million instruments. In addition, private telecom networks, institutions, the Railways, Defence and public sector undertakings represent a vast potential.

Swede (India)'s competitive price — a result of sophisticated operations and rapid indigenisation — will provide a crucial purchase incentive. As the first and the largest manufacturer of electronic push button telephones, Swede (India) is poised for leadership.

THE COMPANY ... AND ITS WORLD CLASS CONNECTION

Swede (India) Teltronics Limited is a joint venture with the Karnataka State Electronics Development Corporation (KEONICS) and is the biggest among the select few organisations licensed to manufacture telephone instruments. And the century-old Ericsson Information Systems AB of Sweden is one of the world's largest telecommunication equipment manufacturers, with a turnover of Rs. 4406 crores and a network of 32 offices worldwide. The result? 5 lakh hi-tech telephones per annum by 1989... for a vast, hungry market. Starting with 20,000 SKDs right now. The prototypes have passed the stringent standards of the Department of Telecommunications and the Department of Electronics; they will adapt easily to Indian conditions.

SWEDE (INDIA) TELTRONICS... THE HERALD OF A HI-TECH GROUP

Swede (India) Teltronics is just the beginning. Headed by doyens in Indian telecommunications, the Swede (India) Group will soon expand to cover not just telephone instruments but the marketing of EPABX systems (with C-DOT technology) and other new and advanced products in related fields. With the result that the Group's planned diversifications will amount to a turnover of Rs. 100 crores within a short span of just 5 years.

SWEDE (INDIA)'S RANGE... MODELS OF EXCELLENCE

Swede (India) will manufacture the sleek, world renowned DIAVOX range of push button telephones: standard desk telephones, loud-speaking telephones, two-line telephones, hotel telephones, telephones with abbreviated dialling and last number redialling, executive/secretary systems and office communication systems. The advantages? Greater efficiency and convenience. With a contemporary addition to user-lifestyle.

INVADING THE MARKET ... PHASE BY PHASE

Swede (India)'s marketing strategy envisages two phases. Phase 1 covers the metros; Phase 2, the other important towns.

Phase 1	Phase 2
1. Ahmedabad/Baroda	1. Bhopal
2. Bangalore	2. Bhubaneshwar
3. Bombay	3. Chandigarh
4. Calcutta	4. Coimbatore
5. Delhi	5. Dehradun
6. Ernakulam	6. Goa

9. Pune	9. Jaipur
10. Trivandrum	10. Lucknow
	11. Madurai
	12. Nagpur
	13. Patna
	14. Raipur

Distribution to other towns will begin soon after Phase 1 and Phase 2 operations are under way.

Careful analysis of market potential and effective marketing and advertising strategies will ensure that Swede (India) gains a substantial edge.

PRESTIGE, PROFITS ... AND PHENOMENAL GROWTH

Swede (India) offers you a chance to associate with the world leader in telecommunications. To share in the prestige and profitability of its venture.

If you are an established distributor/manufacturer of consumer durables or office automation products and are looking for a profitable diversification project; if you are financially sound and have the capacity to stock, service and invest; if you are confident of developing and handling Swede (India)'s marketing operations in your zone or state; if your offices are in key areas and can provide faultless after-sales service ... send in a comprehensive profile, within 10 days, to:

THE SENAS

Militancy on the Move

PERHAPS nothing symbolises the worsening communal situation in the country more than the emergence of private armies—senas—among Hindus and Muslims. The senas not only reflect the ugly mood among the communalists in both communities, they are a sign of desperation and loss of faith in the administration. Principal Correspondent FARZAND AHMED visited the communally-sensitive spots of Uttar Pradesh and met Muslim leaders in Delhi to file this report on the growth of the Muslim senas.

THE seemingly endless summer of communal disharmony between Hindus and Muslims is threatening to unfold into a new season of militancy with the formation of centralised private armies—senas—which are becoming the self-appointed guardians of each religion. Ironically, the trident or trishul has become the symbol for both sides, representing Om as well as Allah.

Just how ominous this development is became evident last fortnight when a group of young men brandishing trishuls invaded a historic mosque in Delhi's Ferozeshah Kotla, and Muslim youths, also carrying trishuls, burnt down Hindu shops around Jama Masjid. Over the last several months, the trishul has become the symbol of militant neo-Hindu groups such as the Hindu Shiv Shakti Dal, the Shiv Sena, and the Bajrang Dal. But last month's incidents in Delhi, though minor, revealed for the first time the growing strength of the relatively new Muslim senas. In this clash of the trishuls, the Muslim senas have staked their own claim on the trident because, their leaders say, the word Allah when written in Arabic, forms an identical shape. It also represents for them Ali ka Panja, the symbolic palm—with three fingers held aloft—of Hazrat Ali, the fourth caliph of Islam.

Banner at Jama Masjid: well-organised

And so there have emerged within the Muslim community the Adam Sena, Ali Sena, Al-Jehad (in Delhi and Meerut), and Hyderabad's Jehadi Lashkar. Their adherents are still small in number but their organisers are men of experience and standing, and adept in attracting fresh recruits. Already, the organisers have begun to distribute trishuls which are only six inches long so that they are not covered under the category of lethal weapons.

These senas mushroomed almost simultaneously, but the Adam Sena is by far the best organised. Headquartered in Delhi's Jama Masjid, it is led by Syed Ahmed Bokhari, the firebrand naib imam of Jama Masjid and son of Shahi Imam Abdullah Bokhari. During the month of Ramazan this year, posters appeared almost overnight on the walls of buildings surrounding the Jama Masjid and other parts of old Delhi, announcing the sena's formation and inviting Muslims to join. An estimated 5,000 Muslims it is believed had become Adam Senaites by the time communal riots broke out last month. Many of the members had travelled to the recruitment centre from far-away places in western Uttar Pradesh. Their uniform of green shirts, shorts and cap resembles the saffron ones of the Shiv Sena. And like in the RSS shakas, the Adam Sena trains its "volunteers" in judo and karate for "self-defence".

Muslim politicians and other community leaders view the formation of the senas with distaste. "This is a really very bad trend," warns Kalimuddin Shams, deputy speaker of the West Bengal Assembly. "People with no following are creating these stunts for cheap publicity without realising what impact it would have on our suspicion-ridden society." Shams's sentiments are echoed by several prominent Muslim leaders, including Syed Akhtar, the Jamait-e-Islami Hind's Lucknow-based secretary, who dismissed the idea of Muslim senas as "a gimmick".

But religious fanatics hardly need the sanction of wiser counsel. Their drive is single-minded. Just before the communal flare-up in Delhi, Rafi-ullah Khan, 25, a small cloth merchant in the old town's Chitli Qabar Bazar who runs two weeklies, the Milli Masail and Mazloom Morcha, had declared in an article: "Trishul ka muqabla Ali ke panje se hoga." (The hand of Ali will take on the trishul.) "The purpose of our senas," he says in his capacity as the leader of the Ali Sena, "is to unite Muslims wherever they are and check the 'trishul-gardi' (menace of the trishuls)."

"My father counsels restraint but I was compelled to come out in the open after the trishuls started appearing."

SYED AHMED BOKHARI
naib imam, Jama Masjid

"The purpose of our senas is to unite Muslims wherever they are and check the menace of the trishuls."

RAFI-ULLAH KHAN
cloth merchant

AHMED Bokhari told INDIA TODAY that he had not entered the fray earlier because his father, the Imam, had counselled restraint. "But the situation finally compelled me to come into the open." The compelling factors, he said, included a case filed in the Calcutta High Court seeking a ban on the Holy Quran, "interference in the Shariat (Muslim Personal Law) and the Babri Masjid-Ramjanmabhoomi controversy". Muslims had yet to recover from the "shocks of these rapid events when Hindu trishuls started appearing". Even though Ahmed denies having advocated the arming of his supporters with the hilal (a dagger shaped like a new moon), his supporters confirm that in a speech he had angrily asked the Government to clarify its stand on the carrying of trishuls by Hindu senas. Ahmed claims that he has always been a moderating influence on the Muslims but admits having "lost (his) grip" last month when some of his followers went on a rampage in the Jama Masjid area and burnt Hindu shops. "It reflected," he said, "the pent-up anger of these people against continuous provocation from the trishul-dharis."

Similarly, adherents of the Muslim Senas say that Hindu-motivated trishul attacks in Uttar Pradesh prompted the formation of the Ali Sena in Meerut and Delhi. According to police sources, the Ali Sena was created to challenge the Bajrang Dal, which draws its symbolic strength from the power of Hanuman. In the Ali Sena, Hazrat Ali—a symbol of courage and strength for Muslims—counters Hanuman. In answer to the Bajrang Dal's cry of Jai Bajrang Bali, the Ali-Senaites chant, "Ya Ali."

"People with no following are creating these stunts for cheap publicity without realising their impact on our society."

KALIMUDDIN SHAMS
deputy speaker, West Bengal Assembly

Interestingly, the organisers of the Adam Sena first approached Syed Shahabuddin to take over the leadership of the organisation, but he refused. The formation of these senas, says Shahabuddin "indicates the collapse of the administration". And there is little doubt that suspicions on both sides have grown progressively and show no signs of abating (see box). If the Muslim senas claim that they are directly the result of the growth of the earlier Hindu senas, the Hindu senas now claim that the rise of the Muslim groups simply reinforces the need for even more Hindu vigilance and militancy. Panchajanya, the Hindi mouthpiece of the RSS, recently ran a frontpage story alleging that Muslim militants and orthodox leaders, in league with Punjab terrorists and dissident Akali leaders, were forming a morcha "to teach a lesson to the enemies of Muslims and Sikhs" The tragedy is, in an atmosphere so riddled with religious suspicions, ordinary people could easily react with paranoia and take seriously any conspiracy theory advocated by a communal group.

There is no doubt that many Muslim leaders, instead of attempting to calm the communal situation, have taken advantage of it and tried to create a psychological atmosphere in which religious crusaders will claim to be the representatives in India of the Islamic resurgence now sweeping other Muslim countries. "This is a dangerous game," warns Rizwan Ahmed, editor of Patna's Azimabad Express, an Urdu daily, who fears that these senas might create "Islamic guerrillas"—a development which would be "disastrous to the country's secular fabric". Shahid Siddique, editor of Delhi's Urdu weekly, Nai Duniya, is even blunter: "These Muslim senas will invite more brutal reaction and provide a handle to all those forces which have been talking about Muslim terrorism and fundamentalism."

The formation of such senas is not entirely without tragic historic precedent. During the period before partition, Muslim senas such as the Majlis-e-Ahrar led by Ataullah Shah Bokhari, the Khaksar movement of Allama Mashrauqi and the Muslim National Guard of the Muslim League, played a sordid and ultimately counter-productive role which resulted in bloody rioting and the killing of thousands of innocent people on both sides of the religious divide. The latest developments have clearly alarmed the Muslim leadership in the Congress(I). Said Congress(I) MP and Seva Dal chief Tariq Anwar: "We condemn all such organisations and the Government should take stern action against such outfits." The Seva Dal has already asked the Government to ban all organisations, including the senas, whose membership was not open to all communities. This may be a short-term measure which could send the senas underground, but at least it would be a demonstration of the Government's desire to take action—any kind of action—to stem the dangerous communal drift now sweeping the land.

HINDU SENAS

Battle Cry

THE new wave of senas have their origin in save-the-religion battle-cries raised by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP)—the intellectual arm of the RSS—in 1980 following the mass conversion of Harijans of Meenakshipuram to Islam. More fuel was added to the Hindu fire after terrorist attacks on Hindus in Punjab and anti-Hindu disturbances in Jammu and Kashmir. Disparate Hindu sects held several joint convocations in several cities and formed a loosely-knit Hindu Manch to save the "dharma".

One outcome of this was the formation of the Bajrang Dal, the militant youth arm of the VHP, which took up the cause of liberating holy shrines at Ayodhya, Mathura, and Kashi which, they averred, had been converted into Muslim shrines by Mughal rulers. In rapid developments marked by the Ramjanmabhoomi-Babri Masjid feud, the Shah Bano case and the Muslim Women's Bill, and the continuing killing of Hindus in Punjab, Hindus began to band together in self-defence groups. The trishul—hitherto kept by sadhus and devotees of Shiva—became their unifying symbol. And new militant slogans emerged—Jai Bharat Jai Hinduvir, and Jo Hum se Takrayega Choor Choor Ho Jayega (those who oppose us will be completely crushed)—as evidence of the rising Hindu anger.

HARI OM GULATI

Bajrang Dal protest: rising militancy

There followed the mass production of trishuls in Delhi, Meerut, Moradabad, Saharanpur, and Ghaziabad. Hindu youths began to be baptised in their thousands into the Bajrang Dal, the Shiv Shakti Sena, and the Akhil Bharatiya Shiv Shakti Dal. Hindu Manch chief K. Narendra, proprietor-editor of the Urdu daily Pratap, says that the Hindu organisations have mushroomed only in the last 10 months. One prominent trishul-bearing organisation—claiming a following of 15,000 members in Delhi alone—is headed by 43-year-old Veerendra Sharma who runs a lottery business in the Tis Hazari Courts area. This sena, formed after the assassination of Mrs Gandhi, has as its symbol a portrait of the slain leader with a trishul in the background. Its headquarters is in the lower-middle class Hindu-dominated area in Delhi's trans-Jamuna locality where many Hindu refugees from Punjab are being resettled—and recruited into the Hindu sena.

Evidence of Hindu militancy was starkly obvious in the Ferozeshah Kotla incident. Hindu Manch youths carrying trishuls walked into the crumbling mosque, a protected monument, and clashed with another group of youths. In another incident earlier, one person was pierced to death by a trishul inside a place of worship in old Delhi. The trishul is no longer just a symbol—it has now become an instrument of violence.

Dashing Diplomats

AFTER months of speculation it now appears certain that the Indian High Commission will get a spanking new look at the top. Both the High Commissioner P.C. Alexander and his deputy Ramesh Arora are to leave their posts shortly. Alexander, who has been in his post for barely over a year, has been conjectured for a variety of posts in India including that of a state governor, with the Prime Minister's Secretariat or a Rajya Sabha membership. Amongst the gaggle of names skirting the London diplomatic grape-vine as his successor are Planning Commission Member Abid Hussain, former foreign secretaries Romesh Bhandari and M.K. Rasgotra, and even Lok Sabha Speaker Balram Jakhar, who is currently in London for the Commonwealth parliamentary conference. For his part, Alexander, who in his brief spell has impressed many with his astuteness and savvy, smiles cryptically, refusing to offer any clues. The front-runner to replace Arora, tipped for ambassadorship in Teheran, is former foreign office spokesman and currently Chief of Protocol, Salman Haider. The rapid turnover of high commissioners—Prakash Mehrotra who preceded Alexander also zipped in and out of London like a bat out of hell—reflected the whimsicality of South Block in making key MEA postings. Its prestige and trappings apart, the London high commissioner's post is a sensitive assignment especially when Indo-British relations are tottering precipitously. As for the hapless staff at India House, one more new high commissioner means yet another round of profligate introductory meetings with government officials, party stalwarts, Indian lobbies, the media and what-have-you. Informed of impending changes, a local wag demanded: "Since there is so much mindless to-ing and fro-ing, why not post a local man who will stay put? Why not someone like Swraj Paul?"

HARI OM GULATI

Alexander: on the move

Indiscreet Paul

In a recent television programme, industrialist Swraj Paul had claimed that soon after her triumph in the 1980 general elections, the late Indira Gandhi had offered him any assignment, including that of the high commissioner in London or as ambassador in Washington. Paul did not, however, say why he didn't take up the offer. While his indiscreetness might be considered "undiplomatic" at Aldwych or Whitehall, Paul has been making news on the industrial front. The United Merchant Bar—a joint venture of Paul's Caparo Industries and the British Steel Corporation—was opened at Scunthorpe last fortnight by Chancellor of the Exchequer Nigel Lawson. The most modern mill of its kind in Europe, its competitiveness is expected to enable it to corner more of the UK market. During 1986 so far, Caparo Industries pre-tax profits are up to £615,000 from £91,000.

Unity Catalyst

THIS fortnight a one-day "Unity of India" conference is being held at Wembley by a cluster of Indian outfits. Punjab again is the catalyst that brings some highly disparate organisations together. The Punjab Unity Forum's literature states that a "handful of misguided extremists have resorted to violence and terrorism and many moderates and innocent people, amongst them Hindus and Sikhs, have lost their lives". To meet the challenge the Unity of India conference was being organised. The participating organisations include the India Association, Institute of Sikh Studies, Indian Overseas Congress, Sikh Forum, International Punjabi Society, Indian Workers Association and Foundation for Critical Choices for India. The conference is being inaugurated by Sardar Swaran Singh and among the speakers are I.K. Gujral. The chief organiser P.S. Raina says the Punjab Unity Forum will also launch on the same day a magazine titled Unity.

Bebop Granma

BRITAIN'S Channel-4 often sets high standards in its effort to give the country's ethnic minority a voice. Its weekly "Bandung File", strewn with banana skins and pitfalls, last fortnight featured a special report on Khalistan. An opinion poll suggested that the Sikh majority was not in favour of a separate state and if it did evolve, they would not budge from Britain. However, those who held forth in the programme were the Khalistan protagonists voicing the familiar litany of grouses with Jagjit Singh Chauhan stating that Sikhs did not wish to join the "economic muddle" that was India. Happily, Channel-4 last fortnight also beamed an hour-long prime-time profile of playback singer Asha Bhosle. Described as the "granma of bebop" who had outsold Sinatra, Crosby and the Beatles, there was many an off-beat moment of the singer. One Engish critic confessed she found Eena Mena Dika irresistible.

TAX OFFICIALS The Reward

THE new reward scheme introduced last year by the Finance Ministry for the employees in the Central revenue collecting agencies has proved to be a windfall for some of them. Not only has the amount

NAMAS BHOJANI

RAVINDRA NATH KAKKAR

Tops the list of award winners with Rs 10.48 lakh. In November 1985, he seized 602 kg of heroin and 4,565 kg of hashish worth Rs 8.77 crore from a heavily guarded farmhouse near Bombay.

NAMAS BHOJANI

J.E.A. SALDANHA

On April 12, 1985, he made an impressive Rs 8.66 lakh in rewards. His career-best effort was recovering gold worth over Rs 3 crore concealed in an Ambassador car in Bombay.

THEY are luckier than most other government servants in at least one respect—reward money. In the last 15 months, over 700 officers of the Directorate of Revenue Intelligence (DRI) and Central Customs and Excise Department have raked in about Rs 2 crore over and above their pay for nabbing economic offenders or smugglers of contraband gold, textiles, electronics, hashish and heroin worth over Rs 300 crore in the open market. In some cases, the reward money earned has exceeded their total salaries drawn over the last 10 years, and in a majority of cases the interest earned on the reward money is four to five times higher than their take-home salaries.

The handsome rewards can largely be attributed to the drive launched by the Finance Ministry to make smuggling a high-risk low-profit venture. Officers are now entitled to a tax-free 20 per cent of the total value of seized contraband—which in one stroke has eliminated the chance of their being tempted by the 1 per cent offered by smugglers (operating on a 200-300 per cent profit margin) to look the other way.

That the move has paid rich dividends is evident in the phenomenal spurt in seizures of contraband goods since April last when the new guidelines went into effect. From a meagre Rs 66-crore worth of goods seized in 1982, the figure shot up to Rs 191-crore in 1985 and is likely to cross Rs 250 crore in 1986. Monetary rewards have similarly zoomed from Rs 60-lakh in 1982 to Rs 5.52 crore in 1985 and are likely to touch Rs 7 crore in 1986. Not surprisingly, the reward-takers have included officers from the rank of assistant director downwards to humble peons and drivers. Some examples:

► Ravindra Nath Kakkar, 50, an assistant director with the DRI in Bombay, tops

the list of award winners with Rs 10.48 lakh. Fortune smiled on him in November 1985 when he, at considerable risk to his life, seized 602 kg of heroin and 4,565 kg of hashish worth Rs 8.77 crore from a heavily guarded farmhouse in Talasari near Bombay. The reward of Rs 5 lakh was followed by another of Rs 2 lakh some months later when he, as a member of a raiding party, recovered gold worth over Rs 4.77 crore in suburban Jogeshwari. With that, his income pattern improved considerably and, despite a salary of Rs 3,200, he now owns a second-hand air-conditioned Premier Padmini car.

A father of two, Kakkar lives in a modestly furnished 1,500 sq ft government flat in Matunga and has invested a major part of the reward money in national savings certificates and fixed deposits in nationalised banks and expects his investments to double in the next five years. He plans to invest the rest in a flat in Bombay. Says the former army officer who joined the Customs Department as an appraiser in 1959: "I have done nothing I should not have done as an official of the DRI. But we are grateful to the Government for this scheme which insulates us of seized goods risen substantially, the scheme has proved to be a financial boom. Assistant Editor PRABHU CHAWLA visited Bombay and Madras to profile some top reward-winners. His report:

DRI officials with seized gold: rich vein against any other allurements. Even if I die now my family will not be starved of money. What else does a government employee want?"

► J.E.A. Saldanha, 53, a stoutly built assistant director in the DRI, had a fairly eventful career till April 12, 1985 when he notched up an impressive Rs 8.66 lakh in rewards for the recovery of smuggled goods. Acting on a tip-off that an Ambassador car laden with contraband would pass through Bombay, Saldanha, aided by a small posse, intercepted the car. A preliminary search drew a blank but a closer inspection revealed a curious forging under the rear seat. It turned out to be a cavity filled with 12,000 tolas of gold worth over Rs 3 crore. For this career-best effort, Saldanha was sanctioned an advance award of Rs 5 lakh which was later raised to Rs 8 lakh—an unprecedented sum when his career till date had brought him only a piffling Rs 19,500 as reward.

Unlike most of his colleagues, Saldanha lives in a 425 sq ft flat in Mayfair Apartments which he bought for Rs 14,000 in 1965. His major concern is ensuring a secure future for his family. He has invested his money in fixed deposits, national savings certificates, Unit Trust of India and in private firms. He earns about Rs 8,000 per month from these investments which is more than twice his monthly salary of Rs 3,200. Says Saldanha: "The Government has recognised that those working in sensitive departments have to be given extra encouragement for an additional risk involved in their job. It is not a commission but a premium on risk which helps us in taking more initiative and risk." Parsimonious by nature, Saldanha has no intentions of moving out of his modest flat and still has no car, preferring to save money.

► B.G.N. Iyengar, 55, an assistant director heading the DRI's intelligence cell in Bombay, has over the last 18 months, been associated with 14 major cases in which contraband worth over Rs 7.82 crore was seized. His share of the 20 per cent reward worked out to Rs 7.15 lakh. This soft-spoken Brahmin from Karnataka has been awarded the President's Medal twice for distinguished service. He came within a hair's breadth of losing his life in 1982 when fleeing contraband runners fired at him, injuring him in the mouth. For his bravery he was sanctioned Rs 10,000. Earlier, in 1977, he nabbed a Swiss-German at Bombay airport and recovered from him diamonds worth Rs 60 lakh for which he received an award of Rs 6,000.

But under the new rules he has received much bigger amounts. His largest reward, Rs 3 lakh, was for the seizure of a textile and video cassette recorder consignment worth over Rs 1.98 crore last year in Bombay. And in May this year, he netted Rs 1.50 lakh for his role in the seizure of a gold consignment worth Rs 1.20 crore also in Posted at Madras airport, he heads the list among the junior officers with Rs 5.50 lakh as reward. In February this year, he recovered gold worth Rs 36 lakh concealed in a Suzuki generator.

Bombay. Iyengar lives in a 500 sq ft apartment in Versova, and commutes by train. He too has invested his award money in government bonds and securities and plans to return to his home state upon retirement. Says Iyengar: "This is a temporary arrangement. I want to settle in Mysore and would like to buy property there. Till then I think I will have to keep money in places from where I can draw immediately. Nothing better could have happened to an officer at the fag-end of his career."

▶ S. Vishwanathan, 34, is a customs intelligence officer posted at Madras airport, who, with Rs 5.50 lakh in reward money, tops the list among the junior officers. During the last 15 months, he seized gold consignments worth Rs 2 crore from air passengers. He struck gold, literally, when his observant eye chanced upon a passenger from Sharjah smoking cigarettes as though they were going out of style. Suspicions aroused, Vishwanathan asked him to open a large box. The box contained steel stools whose wooden tops seemed rather heavy. When broken, they were found to contain gold worth Rs 15 lakh. Two days later, he intercepted a Singaporean national with a plaster on both legs. He seemed innocent enough until a baggage search revealed a plaster roll. Vishwanathan promptly had the plaster on his legs taken apart, recovering 1 kg of gold. For these seizures, Vishwanathan got an advance award of Rs 1.50 lakh.

VISHWANATHAN, who has built up exhaustive dossiers on contraband runners, was one of the customs officers seriously injured in the bomb blast at Madras airport last year. Hospitalised for over 40 days, he went back to work with a vengeance and in February this year recovered gold worth Rs 36 lakh concealed in a Suzuki generator. But his newly-acquired affluence has not changed his life-style. He still lives in a small house in the Tambaran area with his mother and sister and goes to office on a moped. Says Vishwanathan: "I have invested the money in government securities and national savings certificates. I had started the construction of a house but could not complete it. Now I have completed it with the money I have received." Vishwanathan's salary of Rs 2,000 is just enough for his needs.

With two daughters to marry off, Nisar intends to use part of the money for that purpose. He is also planning to take his mother and wife for the Haj. And of what is left, says Nisar: "I will improve my ancestral property in Coimbatore."

▶ S. Jayant, 34, received Rs 4.75 lakh as reward for the role he played in the Coimbatore gold smuggling case. His wife Uma has already bought gold jewellery worth Rs 10,000. He also plans to move out of his one-room flat in a poor section of Madras. "I want to move out of this area and have given some advance for a flat which will cost me about four lakh," he says.

AWARDS

Big Boost

THE new rates of monetary rewards for customs, excise and other economic intelligence agency employees and informants were introduced in March 1985. The incentive scheme, finalised after three years of file pushing, replaced the earlier provisions in which officials were entitled to a paltry award ranging from Rs 80 for every haul of gold worth Rs 2,000. No awards were given for the recovery of contraband like hashish, electronics, textiles or heroin.

The new guidelines not only raised the amount of reward to 20 per cent of the market value of the goods recovered, but also extended the eligibility for the bonanza to all employees working in the Income Tax Department, Enforcement Directorate and Excise Department. The new rules also provide that all those who haul in illegal arms and ammunition, foreign exchange, or seize goods on which government duties were evaded, will also be rewarded.

To boost morale further, the finance minister has decreed that revenue collectors should be paid at least 50 per cent of the estimated reward money within two weeks of recovery and the rest soon after cases are settled in court or within concerned departments.

Under the guidelines for the actual disbursement of the reward money, the authorities are asked to keep in mind the "specificity and accuracy of the information, the risk and trouble undertaken, the extent and nature of the help rendered by the informers, the risk involved for government servants in working out a case, the difficulty in securing information", among other factors. The idea behind this directive is to distribute the total reward money in such a way that all those who worked as a team in a case are suitably rewarded while those who played a major role receive more than the others. Says Jyotirmoy Dutta, chairman, Central Board of Excise and Customs: "We are conscious of the fact that some officials do deserve more than the others and they should be paid more so that others can compete with them."

The big rewards at stake have brought in their wake a very human problem—professional jealousy. To keep it in check senior officers make it a point to associate as many officers as possible when a big seizure is in the offing. Thus M.S. Agharker, C.L. Mathew and K. Raghavan—all of the Bombay DRI—split the reward for busting a Jamnagar-based smugglers' gang. Earlier, only Agharker and Mathew were involved but later, when the time for breaking up the operation came, Raghavan was brought in for his skill at handling such a raid.

While the reward scheme applies to all officials working for the Finance Ministry, officers of the DRI have netted the most. Against an average seizure of Rs 7 crore during 1983-1984, DRI investigators seized contraband worth over Rs 48 crore out of the total recovery of Rs 188 crore in 1985. And they repeated their performance in 1986, seizing half the value of the total smuggled goods worth over Rs 75 crore during the first quarter of the year itself. The money winners include inspectors, constables and peons. At the DRI office in Madras, all 14 intelligence officers, two assistant directors, two superintendents, two drivers and four sepoys have benefited. Says Deputy Director S. Venkatdri: "In all major cases each one of us has a role to play. While the case is followed and finally solved by one or two officials, they alone cannot handle all the paper work and the post-operation investigations. Others have to be suitably rewarded so that it encourages team spirit and avoids heartburning."

M.S. AGHARKER

Awarded Rs 1.50 lakh for busting a Jamnagar-based gang of smugglers, Agharker was involved in unearthing contraband worth Rs 98 lakh in a flawless operation.

WHAT is cause for concern, however, is the complaints of harassment pouring in from air and sea passengers and business houses. Opinion in industry and the foreign travel trade feels that customs officers are shooting in the dark to earn rewards. But Jyotirmoy Dutta, chairman, Central Board of Excise and Customs says emphatically: "We simply can't call a scheme a bad one because it has caused avoidable problem for a very small number of people. We always take strong action if the complaint is genuine and each officer is responsible for his action. He can be a faulter once but not twice."

Finance Minister V.P. Singh, the architect of the scheme, is also its strongest votary. As he puts it: "So what if some officials who play an active role in curbing anti-national activities and recover more revenue get rewarded in the process? Let them feel that the Government can also ensure their affluent growth and they need not depend on shady arrangements." Says DRI Director-General B.B. Kumar: "The finance minister has created an environment in which smuggling has become uneconomical. If officers are sure of getting enough financial incentives they will plug and choke the sources generating black money."

But the fact is that the new arrangements are a mixed blessing. The hunt for rewards has bred unhealthy competition among officials working in the Customs and Excise Department and also created deep jealousies among senior officers excluded from the rewards scheme. Officers above the rank of assistant director or assistant collector who actually supervise the investigations, are sore over being kept out. In fact, the finance minister, while approving the scheme, had not excluded any officer from it but some last minute bureaucratic jugglery ruled them out of the entire scheme. Amusingly, North Block has been flooded with requests from income tax and excise officials seeking postings in the DRI or customs because their normal run of work does not necessarily lead to such rewards.

What many of the hopefuls fail to realise is that very often a big seizure may elude their grasp by the proverbial whisker. In fact, last year a team of DRI officers in Goa intercepted and impounded a boat carrying contraband gold and other goods. Kakkar and another officer, Patanker, were escorting the boat and its Pakistani crew back to Bombay in rough seas. Suddenly, the boat with the confiscated goods collided with a fisherman's boat and sank. The DRI officers also got lost and after a seven-hour ordeal, managed to land in Gujarat—thanks ironically to the navigation skills of one of the Pakistani smugglers they had arrested. In the old days a loss of life in such circumstances would have spelt financial ruin for an officer's family. But in the wake of the new policy, officers are willing to take greater risks not only because of greater rewards but also because they have less reason to worry that their families will fall into penury in case they are killed or injured.

Why the devil...

Why? Because it's the devil who's supposed to fan the fire of negative emotions like envy. But then, why the devil should anyone continue to envy the ONIDA TV when one can buy it and enjoy it evermore? Except, of course, some of your neighbours who have already bought some other brand and are stuck with it!

For them, it's very tough not to envy your ONIDA. Its classy, futuristic looks (which all recent brands are trying to copy)...Its astounding true-to-life colour..The sharpest picture (due to much higher resolution than any other TV)...And its celebrated Japanese pedigree which puts every other TV almost a generation behind!

But be that as it may, neighbours will always be neighbours. And when they drop in to watch the Sunday Feature Film ... you can only keep a cautious watch. And during the interval, perhaps, you can drop them a mild hint ...That buying an ONIDA will always mean a happy ending. ■ ONIDA with cordless remote

VAISHNO DEVI

Transforming the Temple

THE action—swift, decisive, surgical—bore all the hallmarks of a Jagmohan initiative. In one fell swoop, with barely a week remaining for Governor's rule to come to an end in Jammu and Kashmir, Jagmohan signed and executed a proclamation under which one of the most revered Hindu shrines in north India, Vaishno Devi, was taken over by an independent board. Thus at 2.40 a.m. on August 31 ended the complete control that some 4,000 baridar families (who shared the offerings showered on the deity) and the Dharmarth Trust—run under the sole trusteeship of former maharaja Dr Karan Singh—had exercised over the shrine for more than 100 years. The governor's order, signed in total secrecy at 6.30 p.m. the previous evening, was executed eight hours later when a handful of state bureaucrats accompanied by 300 armed policemen made a six-hour trek to the shrine and announced the take-over of the shrine on the public address system.

An outraged Karan Singh vowed legal action to challenge the legitimacy of the take-over "of the only Hindu trust in a state in which the Hindus are in a minority and a trust which runs over 100 Hindu temples in the state". Governor

Dr Karan Singh has condemned the take-over as an assault on Hindu sensibilities, but Governor Jagmohan sees it as a reform long overdue.

Jagmohan, he said in an interview, "is like a bulldozer out of control. He suffers from uncontrollable megalomania. He thinks that he can pull a Turkman Gate in Jammu and get away with it". (The reference was obviously to Jagmohan's controversial eviction of Muslim slum dwellers from an area in Delhi during the Emergency.)

Jagmohan however, simply viewed the take-over as a matter in the public interest, a reform long overdue. His office has been deluged with congratulatory letters and telegrams since August 31 when the management and control of Vaishno Devi changed hands.

"We hail the action," wrote the satsang of the Morning Walkers Association of Delhi. "The mata has justly punished the pandits who controlled Vaishno Devi." The head of Punjab's Sanatan Dharma Pratinidhi Sabha, Goswami Girdharilal wrote: "I congratulate you. Mata has finally obtained mukti (deliverance)". Wrote S. Aggarwal from Haryana: "The shrine was a pathetic site without even toilet facilities. You have performed a great service."

Far from having produced a Hindu backlash therefore, Jagmohan's precipitous and at first glance, risky move, has resulted in an eruption of sympathy from the numerous pilgrims and worshippers who regularly make the arduous, 14-km uphill trek to Vaishno Devi, located 6,000 feet high in the Trikuta hills from Katra, which is a two-hour drive away from Jammu. This is largely because the shrine as well as the area surrounding it had become a cesspool of human refuse. Drinking water, toilet and accommodation facilities at the shrine visited by about 15 lakh people every year were abysmal.

Officials count the day's offerings

Collector Anil Goswami, on horseback, supervises the frenetic work underway to improve facilities for pilgrims. His deadline is October 3.

After having trekked the 14-km climb along a dangerously rutted and crater-marked track, pilgrims were often forced to sleep out in the open near foul-smelling garbage heaps once they reached the top. Because of its size and the small opening in a cave through which pilgrims have to crawl in order to reach the sanctum sanctorum of the Devi, no more than 8,000 pilgrims can worship in one day. Thus devotees often have to wait for days on end before getting their turn to worship. And the system had deteriorated into a racket run by godmen and influential pandits who, for hefty sums of money, would arrange for pilgrims to jump their turns or give them more or less time for worship depending on the amount of money that changed hands.

The main object of the take-over—improvement of facilities for the pilgrims—is dramatically obvious from Katra, where the pilgrimage starts, right up to the shrine. Jagmohan has given strict instructions that nothing must stop the yatra. So even as pilgrims wind their way up the tortuous mountain-track, some 2,000 workers toil around the clock, paving and grouting the kutcha road, sweeping, painting the railings, constructing dharamsalas and dispensaries.

Some 600 lighting poles are being repaired; three new water storage tanks with a capacity of one-and-a-half lakh gallons are nearing completion; two new water pumping stations are under construction; three generators have been ordered to ensure continuous power supply and 100 new toilet facilities are being built. All this under the watchful eye of Udhampur District Collector Anil Goswami, 31, who has been appointed executive officer of the new board. Goswami visits the shrine every day on horseback to personally supervise the work. His deadline: October 3, the day that the Navaratra festival begins. "The take-over has been a popular move," he says, "but this popularity will only last as long as the Government can deliver."

Dr Karan Singh, however, strongly feels that Jagmohan could have worked with the Dharmarth Trust in ameliorating the facilities instead of "nationalising" the property. "I was discussing these ideas with Jagmohan several months ago. But I had no further communication with him until the sudden take-over. They blame the trust for not making improvements but we did what we could with the resources available to us." He notes, for example, that he had made financial arrangements for the construction of a ropeway to the shrine, "but it was held up by the state Government. Why? Why didn't the Government do anything? Instead they sneak in with armed guards and take over a holy place of worship. I am shocked".

"My question," says Jagmohan, "is that the shrine and the people who were responsible for its management were a vast empire earning crores of rupees. Where did the money go? Why was it not ploughed back into improving the facility? In doing what we have done we are not slighting the Hindu religion but keeping up its best tradition which has always been reformist." According to the governor's office, the ropeway idea was not feasible because it would be dangerous to keep people suspended on a bridge awaiting their turn to enter the shrine.

Jagmohan, say sources, had put the shrine take-over as one of the first items on his reform agenda after Governor's rule was declared. He had personally visited the shrine during that period and was, according to one insider, "horrified at the state of affairs". But he could not afford to make fully known the plans for the take-over because the Dharmarth Trust and the baridars would have obtained an anticipatory stay order from the courts or appealed to communal feelings. "This could never be a half-way measure," says Goswami, "and I doubt whether a popularly-elected government in Kashmir could have taken this step."

There is little doubt that the offerings and donations at the temple are enormous. During the first 20 days after the take-over, the donations made inside the cave amounted to Rs 20 lakh—Rs 16 lakh in cash and the remaining amount in gold and silver. Before the take-over, these inside offerings were shared by the baridars, 75 per cent going to Rajput families and the remaining being distributed among the Samnotra Brahmins living nearby. According to traditionally set formulas, a family's "bari" could come every two, four or six years on a given day of that particular year. Among the baridars were the pandits who presided over the deity as well as brought favoured clients, who rewarded them well for performing special pujas.

The Dharmarth Trust, established by maharaja Gulab Singh in the mid-19th century to manage Hindu shrines, was in overall charge of Vaishno Devi and the properties. While the trust did not take money from inside the shrine, it collected property rent, voluntary donations and earned income from forest contracts. Official sources also say that small shops close to the shrines were recently given year-long leases at between Rs 35 lakh and Rs 80 lakh. The Dharmarth Trust earned half its income from Vaishno Devi.

The entire income now accrues to the new board. Chartered public accountants have been assigned to compute and certify the earnings from the shrine. And at least two government officials are assigned around the clock to sit inside the cave, along with pujaris now on the Government's pay-roll, to monitor offerings and donations and ensure that everybody gets their fair turn for worship. TV cameras to be installed will monitor the activities inside the cave "so people can see if there's any hanky-panky going on", Goswami says.

Shankar Das, a baridar who has escorted several luminaries, including Mrs Gandhi, for darshan, says the traditional role of pujaris has been unfairly demolished.

There is little doubt that thousands of baridars who traditionally depended on the shrine for their income have been badly hit. A handful of them have grown fabulously wealthy and invested in property but a large section of them simply blew up their money. Says Pandit Shankar Das, a traditional baridar who has escorted luminaries like Mrs Gandhi for darshan: "Ours is a large family. Even if we get Rs 40,000 after six years it has to be shared among dozens of members. Our family in the old days did the Devi's puja when the yatra wasn't popular and there were no earnings. We did puja from oil extracted from chir pines when no oil was available. Now we are told that our role as pujaris is finished and we are not even allowed to escort those who ask for us by name into the cave."

Under the take-over act, a tribunal is being appointed to compute compensation for the dispossessed baridars and Goswami has pledged that he will give paid jobs to baridars on a priority basis if they ask for them. "Right now, they don't want to work in the shrine in a paid capacity," he says, "but we are morally bound to see that a baridar who was solely dependent on the shrine for an income gets to lead an honourable life."

Plans are already under way to start land improvement schemes for baridars with small holdings who have lost their incomes. Other schemes include the construction of hospitals, schools and job training centres to create an expected 1,000 new jobs. "The idea is to use the income of the shrine for the overall economic development of the area," says Jagmohan. "And all this is happening because the Devi must have wished it."

CAR PLANS

EVEN as the Government continues to dawdle over reformulating its policy for the automobile industry, another hopeful entrepreneur has announced his plans to start manufacturing cars, this time in collaboration with Fiat of Italy. Venkatram Reddy (whose previous experience consists of running the Nagarjuna Hotel and the Deccan Chronicle newspaper in Hyderabad) has signed up with Fiat for manufacturing its Premio 1300 model, which is due to be launched in Europe later this year. The proposed Rs 304-crore project to make 30,000 cars annually may, however, take awhile to get on the road. Apart from the question of the new automobile policy and government clearances (both of which could take time), Reddy has also to first handle his existing Rs 28-crore Annapurna Foils project. The plus point for the Fiat project is that it is proposed to be located in Medak, Mrs Gandhi's former Lok Sabha constituency. Also, Fiat has promised to invest in the project's equity and to buy back some of the production.

NAME GAME

CLOSE on the heels of the Binaca-Cibaca affair comes another to-do about changing names. The Abacus, Delhi's first computer mart, metamorphosed into the Calculus, following a divorce between partners Abacus Computers and Anand Manufacturing. When Anand began advertising that the Abacus had now become the Calculus, Abacus Computers (which makes personal computers and other systems) said it was still alive and kicking, and announced plans to open show-rooms all over the country. Who eventually will qualify to call itself the pioneer is anybody's guess, but one of the two will have to settle for being nothing more than a chip of the old block.

HI-TECH DRUGS

IN a fresh bid to get the Government's clearance for its Rs 119-crore viscose fibre project, Modi Fibres has renamed itself Modi-Cortex (Cortex being the parent company of the project's foreign collaborator Courtaulds). Project promoter S.K.Modi has also signed a Rs 500-crore export deal with Courtaulds, which will buy back some of Modi-Cortex's production for sale in Western Europe and also for parts of the African, Asian and East European markets. Courtaulds will also invest in 26 per cent of the project's equity. The project had run into strong opposition from Grasim Industries, currently the only manufacturer of viscose fibre in the country. And reports of a compromise between the Modis and the Birlas (who run Grasim) seem to be without basis.

SOFTWARE BOOST

SOFTWARE exports may get a new thrust if a Department of Electronics policy package goes through. The long overdue package is expected to be announced shortly and will include a proposal to set up a software development agency. India exports some Rs 35 crore worth of software annually but the potential is much greater, and many big companies have recently tied up software collaboration arrangements with foreign firms. But software manufacturers complain that the Government has failed to clarify several issues on the software front. The new policy is expected to remedy some of this.

DURABLE INDEX

CONSUMER durables are now the fastest growing sector in Indian industry. In both 1984-85 and 1985-86, growth in the production of consumer durables outstripped all other sectors by a wide margin. Thus, in 1984-85, consumer durables production grew by a handsome 19.1 per cent, well above the overall industrial growth of 6.8 per cent. This was repeated last year, when consumer durables production grew by 14.4 per cent while overall industrial growth was no more than 6.3 per cent. In sharp contrast to this, consumer non-durables have seen virtually no growth (0.4 per cent in 1984-85 and 1.6 per cent in 1985-86). Unfortunately, consumer durables have a very low weightage in the overall industrial production index (3.81 per cent). And consumer non-durables have a weightage of 26.65 per cent.

MODEST AWARDS

THE Government is now holding out a fresh carrot for public sector companies: awards to be presented by the prime minister for companies showing improvements in financial and physical performance with some weightage for 'qualitative dimensions' like technology absorption, self-reliance, export effort, industrial relations and safety. But the main stress will be on growth in turnover, reduction in costs and profitability ratios on the financial front and to capacity utilisation and diversification. Assessments by the concerned ministry will be vetted by experts to make the final selection. But the awards themselves are modest: a silver bowl, a silver salver and a certificate of merit. The total cost is to be less than Rs 5 lakh. The awards are open only to companies in steel, minerals and metals, coal, power, petroleum, chemicals and pharmaceuticals, engineering, consumer goods and textiles.

An Unhealthy Relationship

SIX years ago, when the police in Bhagalpur began to blind their prisoners with the tacit approval of the entire Bihar police, one of the reasons given for this barbaric act was the policemen's utter desperation at the ease with which even dacoits with two and three previous convictions for robbery with violence were able to obtain bail. Yet bail is precisely what the Central Government has strenuously sought to deny to L.M. Thapar, one of the country's most respected industrialists. Should we presume, then, that the state sees robbery with violence as a less serious offence than the violation of the country's foreign exchange laws?

On the face of it such a suggestion is absurd. But a moment's reflection will show it is not wholly so. What has aroused the ire of at least the petty functionaries of the state is not the violation of this or that law, but the eminence of those allegedly breaking it. The purpose of enforcing the law of the land with the maximum rigour in such cases is not to uphold the rule of law, but to make an example of the law-breakers. It is to humiliate them and to pull them down. It is to impugn the legitimacy of their success and to plant the suspicion that this success has not been won by hard work, foresight or even sheer luck, but by manipulation and theft.

L.M. Thapar is not the first major industrialist to have been treated in this way. Last year, Kapal Mehra, the founder and chairman of Orkay Silk Mills, a major producer of synthetic fibres, was jailed for an alleged violation of the foreign exchange rules. He too was denied bail. During the height of the tax recovery drive of 1985-86, three senior managers of Voltas nearly suffered the same fate. The treatment meted out to S.L. Kirloskar is still too fresh in people's minds to need repetition. Numerous industrialists have had their offices and homes raided, and these raids have been widely publicised even when little or nothing incriminating has been found.

In the Thapar case, the grounds for arrest had not been furnished by the Government even one week after the arrest. But to judge from the prosecution lawyer's remarks, these were flimsy even by the most generous reckoning. On September 12, he told the Delhi High Court that the Government had taken action based on a RBI complaint that one or more of the Thapar firms had violated the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (FERA) by not repatriating foreign exchange earnings and by setting up a subsidiary company abroad without first taking the RBI's permission. When one or more limited liability companies have broken the law, it is at least open to question whether and to what degree its chairman or principal shareholder can be held responsible for each of its actions.

> "The purpose of enforcing the law of the land in such cases is not to uphold the rule of law, but to make an example of the law-breakers; to humiliate and pull them down."

Here, however, L.M. Thapar has claimed that since the RBI's permission had been taken for opening the parent company abroad, his board was of the view that no further permission was needed to open a wholly-owned subsidiary. Even if this plea turns out to be specious, it is at least arguable. In any country where the relationship between government and private industry is healthy, a violation of such a law would have been dealt with first through discussion, admonition and a heavy penalty. If the law required a civil or criminal suit, this would have been done discreetly, so as not to tarnish the reputation of the firm or its managers. And bail would have been granted as a matter of course, once the authorities had seized or sealed the pertinent files.

The key phrase is, of course, a healthy relationship. The treatment being given to Indian industrialists is entirely different because the relationship is an unhealthy one. It is characterised not by trust but distrust; not by cooperation but conflict. The state and private industry are not partners in development but adversaries.

This is illustrated best by contrasting this relationship with the one that has existed for the last nearly three decades in South Korea. In the late 1950s, faced with the rapid tapering off of American aid and spurred by the need to build up exports simply in order to survive, the South Korean Government placed almost the entire responsibility for industrialisation on private industry. It identified key investment areas, framing the projects and preparing feasibility reports, before inviting tenders from the private sector for their implementation. In this process, strength has bred strength so that South Korea today has no less than 17 companies (including one entirely state-owned steel plant) in Fortune's list of the 500 largest non-American companies. But it also has an industrial sector which takes its obligation to fulfil specified national economic goals for granted. By contrast, although India's private sector was older and better established than South Korea in 1955, the Government set out to "marginalise" it and build a public sector in pursuit of a socialist society that would do the job that South Korea's "Chaebol" did.

Today, 30 years later, the public sector has failed to perform this task and in the seventh plan, the Government has been forced to leave the lion's share of industrial investment to the private sector. But whatever Rajiv Gandhi and V.P. Singh may have intended, the bureaucracy has seen in their emphasis on a clean government a golden opportunity to renew its attack on the private sector. But tarnishing the private sector's reputation will not improve the public sector's performance or widen the taxable base of the economy.

Sooner or later, the Government will have to decide whether scoring populist points with an urban electorate will help it more, in the long run, than creating a better climate for investment and growth. In 1955, both India and South Korea had per capita incomes of about $80. Today, ours is under $300 while that of South Korea is over $2,000.

PETROCHEMICALS

Boom Industry

FOR months, those in the big league have been talking of nothing else. And many have followed up talk with action, feverishly handing in applications to the Government, sewing up funds in advance, readying plant blueprints in the hope that the Government will finally flag them off.

The focus of this intense corporate attention is an industry that, till recently, quietly ticked on in relative obscurity —petrochemicals. "Everyone's talking of petrochemicals," affirms S. Ganguly, chairman and managing director of the public sector Indian Petrochemical Complex Ltd (IPCL). Ganguly is right; even the Government is talking of petrochemicals. Last fortnight, the Department of Chemicals and Petrochemicals was drafting a 15-year industry plan that could trigger off an even bigger demand explosion, for the report is expected to recommend lower taxes and input prices to the Cabinet.

Even before that report was being penned, private sector giants like National Organic Chemical Industries Ltd (NOCIL), Reliance Industries, JK Synthetics, the Mallya group, Hindustan Lever and Grasim Industries were bracing to expand production capacities or jockeying to climb on board one of the huge joint sector projects that the Government is scheduled to clear shortly in such exotic areas as purified terephthalic acid (PTA), aromatics, linear alkyl benzene (LAB), and in polyester fibre and yarn. R.P. Goenka's Duncan group already has one in its pocket: it has joined hands with the West Bengal Government to launch the Rs 1,200-crore Haldia petrochemicals complex. NOCIL talks of investing Rs 1,300-crore in the next few years, and Reliance's plans are even more grandiose, while IPCL already has on its hands the giant Maharashtra gas cracker complex.

For those who miss the mega-project bus, there are the smaller state government-promoted downstream petrochemical ventures. Gujarat has a Rs 3,000-crore complex in the pipe-line at Kawas based on offshore gas—and the offers have been pouring in. Reports H.K. Khan, the state's principal secretary: "We have 20 companies that want to join our downstream projects." Among them: Shri Ram Fibre, G.P. Goenka's Gujarat Carbon, Birla companies Grasim and Century Rayon, a Kilachand company, and Mafatlal outfits NOCIL and Indian Dyestuff Industries. Some, like the Southern Petrochemicals Industries Corporation (SPIC), have already sewn up deals with state governments. SPIC has banded together with a Tamil Nadu Government undertaking to turn out 50,000 tonnes of LAB annually.

Clearly, the petrochemicals industry is on the verge of taking off—and it has been put there by a huge demand that companies cannot meet even now, sizeable profits, prospects of quick growth, and a market that could burgeon rapidly if the Government cuts taxes. Just how vast the opportunity may be is reflected in recent official sanctions which have jacked up licensed production capacities in the synthetic fibre industry to 11.2 lakh tonnes; the seventh plan target is a mere 3.3 lakh tonnes. The growth potential on other petrochemical fronts could be equally staggering. The demand for the plastics required for the electronics industry alone will climb by a healthy 30 per cent a year in the seventh plan. NOCIL Managing Director M.S. Patwardhan further backs up the point: the country's per capita consumption of plastics is 600 gm a year; in Europe, it is 40 to 80 kg. Indeed, an official study found that about Rs 50 crore worth of wooden boxes were used last year to package the country's fruits—and a one acre orchard required wood from 10 acres of forests, clearly a wasteful use of forest resources. Says a government official: "Even if we were to replace 10 per cent of this wood, we would need about 1.20 lakh tonnes of polymers and we produce much less than this today."

Many believe that the overall petrochemicals and downstream product mar-will grow by at least 15 to 20 per cent a year. Even the more conservative 10 to 15 per cent rate forecast by others is alluring enough. Says Patwardhan: "Demand is increasing by between 10 and 15 per cent a year. This is high by any standards."

But production capacities are lagging way behind demand, so much so that over 40 per cent of the country's requirements of petrochemicals and downstream products is imported. Says Anil Ambani, executive director of Reliance: "There is no reason why we cannot serve all our petrochemical needs ourselves. We have a market which has the highest aromatic content in the world but we are net importers of all key products." Example: the production of low density polyethylene (LDPE), an intermediate used to make moulded goods, falls short of demand by well over 1,000 tonnes a year and the shortage is bridged by imports. Says Chemicals and Petrochemicals Secretary D.V. Kapur: "We can't have high growth rates on the basis of imports."

Such formidable statistics are compelling enough reason for companies to commit large funds to the industry's future. IPCL, for instance, is investing Rs 1,000 crore in the Maharashtra complex to fulfill both the existing and the emerging demand," as Ganguly puts it. If companies are sallying forth on a new business frontier, it is also because yesterday's mainline areas such as electronics are largely viewed as overcrowded. But the real lucre could be the profits: at least a cool 15 per cent after tax, says A.J.A. Tauro, president of Haldia Petrochemicals. Adds Tauro: "Some petrochemical products are very profitable. Intermediate products are not so attractive though they do offer reasonable returns. High profitability lies further down the road."

It is also true that the rush into several segments of the petrochemicals industry is prompted by a desire to integrate backwards. A classic example is JK Synthetics. It is bidding for the Rs 750 crore joint sector aromatics project at Salempur, 80 km from the Mathura refinery in Uttar Pradesh, as well as for a similar Madras Refineries venture as both Orissa Synthetics, a JK group stable-mate, and JK Synthetics itself need PTA which is imported.

Finally, petrochemicals hold out to state governments the possibility of development and jobs. Khan echoes the point when he argues that state governments are interested in the industry because it "will offer employment and the possibility of a large number of small units coming up." So the state has acquired 200 hectares at Kawas for a plastics processing zone for small units.

Certainly, these arguments are convincing explanations for the big petrochemicals push. Still, several industry executives argue that firms aren't looking before they leap. IPCL's Ganguly, for one, contends that corporations see easy pickings without realising that it's a high-initial-cost, high-technology industry. He warns: "The present prices won't hold good when so many enter the industry. But the most efficient producer should win the pot of gold—if there's any." Haldia's Tauro is just as quick to argue the contrary: "The fears of those who think that companies are jumping in too rashly aren't justified." Haldia will turn out four major intermediates and Tauro claims that all of them can be easily hawked.

Amidst that verbal joust, it was increasingly evident last fortnight that the official report on the industry would have a decisive bearing on the debate. Petrochemicals Secretary Kapur may have indicated the shape of things to come when he said: "We are 25 years behind developments elsewhere. Demand in this industry is going to be so great that we will have to adopt an extraordinary approach." That approach could include concessions like providing feedstock at international prices to select exporters or to those whose products need to be promoted in the national interest, and lower taxes and input prices. Sky-high levies and administered naphtha prices have contributed to a high-cost domestic petrochemical economy. But the report, Kapur's last hurrah before he retires, could seek to rectify this. If the report does indeed turn out to be a path-breaker, the industry's Cassandras will be proved wrong—and the petrochemical boom will have finally arrived.

COMPUTERS

Plunging Prices

SHARP price drops are not new in the hotly contested computer market, but this one was different. In a move that stunned the computer industry, the Delhi-based Hindustan Computers Ltd (HCL) announced last month that it was slashing the price of its personal computer from Rs 42,000 to Rs 20,000. The dramatic newspaper advertisement brought retail computer sales to an unprecedented standstill—and sparked off a fresh price war in the industry.

"We didn't want to get into a price war, but we're cutting prices," declared P.R. Shankar Kumar, general manager at DCM Data Products. For good measure, the Bangalore-based Eiko Computers offered a computer for Rs 16,300, Sterling Electronics in Madras announced that the price-tag of Rs 29,970 for its computer would also include a printer, and Wipro officials were scheduled to meet in Bombay to chart business strategies. Promised Ashok Soota, president of Wipro: "We are planning to announce lower prices by the month-end."

Even as a fresh battle for market shares was on, several industry executives were quick to allege that the price cuts were misleading and that companies had been overcharging customers. Said Farath Kapur, a director at Computer Shack, the retail computer outlet: "The HCL ad is just a gimmick." Added a director of a company in the South: "It's like quoting for a Maruti without wheels." He also argued that industry costs had not fallen, and that the price cuts showed that companies had been profiteering.

Some computer executives point out in defence, however, that firms are not flush with funds and that research and development costs had to be amortised in the early years. But the price reductions are clearly far less sweeping than the advertisements suggest. HCL's Rs 20,000 price-tag, for example, is for a basic machine and a few extras. If additional frills are tagged on, the bill would come close to Rs 29,000 or more. This is true of the other companies as well. "Most corporate users would need the frills," notes a DCM official.

It is also true that the new price-tags only bring out into the open a situation that has ruled the industry for months: firms have been freely handing out price discounts to customers. Equally clearly, companies will now bill buyers separately for a host of items that were free before. Examples: freight and handling costs. While Wipro's Soota conceded that customers will get fewer maintenance and warranty period benefits, an HCL spokesman argued that separate pricing enables clients to buy what they want. "Our computer came with a lot of hidden costs that the buyer couldn't perceive. So we decided to put a value to them and let the buyer decide what to pay for." He also disclosed that the decision to cut prices had been taken months ago, when it became clear that the company's 80 per cent annual sales growth target for micro computers would not be met.

"It's a very smart marketing move," Nelco President and Chief Executive S.K. Mukherjee says admiringly, "but the question is for how long people in India will still want you to hold their hand and teach them what they can do." Nevertheless, the companies themselves do not seem to be worried. HCL hawked 1,700 business computers last year and now expects sales to almost double this year. Eiko Marketing Manager Pradeep K. Bhargava believes that his firm will sell a whopping 4,500 business computers this year when it sold just 175 last year. These could be overestimates, but most people in the business agree that the industry will peddle 20,000 computers after the price reductions, instead of the 15,000 forecast earlier. "Fence sitters will be tempted to buy computers," says an industry analyst.

Clearly, the lower prices will have other significant fall-outs. For starters, retail computer shops may be under pressure because their profit margins will be on a lower base price. Rishab Kumar, Wipro general manager, forecasts that small firms using screwdriver technology will be wiped out. Contends Kumar: "They can't invest the Rs 25 lakh needed for things like cabinet moulds. They'll be forced to continue importing by buying replenishment licences. That will add to costs. The big companies will be indigenising far more this year."

Such arguments are backed by a quick survey by International Data Corporation (India), the market research firm, on the impact of lower prices. Among its other conclusions: prices will drop even further; five major companies will emerge by the end of 1987; some of the big boys will move out of the low end of the market; the software business will get a boost; and firms that have foreign collaboration agreements that include expensive import requirements will have to review them to cut down on costs. If all that is indeed on the anvil, the world of bits and bytes is in for tumultuous times.

KANPUR

Industrial Graveyard

Singh Engineering: in the red

SINGH Engineering in Kanpur was one of the first re-rolling units to be set up in the country, and with three flourishing units was a name to reckon with in the business until a decade ago. Today, its unit on the Grand Trunk road has closed down, its Fazalganj unit is leased out, and three-quarters of the land of the Panki unit is used to cultivate wheat and grow rosewood. The company has installed sufficient capacity to roll out 450 tonnes of steel daily, but manages barely 30 tonnes, and has inevitably slipped into the red.

Singh Engineering is only one of over 1,000 sick or closed industrial units in Kanpur, once northern India's industrial capital. That is almost every fifth unit in the city. And on virtually every front, the evidence of industrial decline stares the observer in the face.

Thirty years ago, the textile mills employed 80,000 workers. Today there are 35,000, nine of the 10 running mills have been taken over by the Government, and 14,000 of their 35,000-strong work-force are surplus and may be retrenched.

Forty plastic units (out of 250) have wound up in the last three years, according to the Uttar Pradesh Plastic Manufacturers Association. The JK group—Kanpur's best known industrial conglomerate—has closed down four units over the last few years (JK Manufactures, JK Electronics, JK Sato and JK Bayon), and set up eight new units elsewhere: in Rajasthan, Orissa, Madhya Pradesh and Maharashtra. Other industrial groups have also contributed to the flight of capital. B.B.L. Srivastava, general manager of the local District Industries Centre, said he had no estimate of the exodus, but unofficial estimates put it at 60 per cent. One result: in places like the Raina industrial estate, developed by the Uttar Pradesh State Industrial Development Corporation (UPSIDC) four years ago, 70 per cent of the plots are vacant.

Similarly, in the Dadanagar industrial area, drawn up in 1960 as one of the biggest cooperative projects in Asia, 19 units have closed down in the last three years while over 100 members of the cooperative society have moved out. Seventy-six out of the original 311 plots are still vacant. The number of permanent employees has dropped from 20,000 five years ago to 5,000. And, in a classic symbol of what has happened to the city's industries, the sprawling factory of the Laxmi Ratan Engineering Works (LREW) is now used as a godown by the Food Corporation of India.

Perhaps the only two industries doing well in the city are leather and hosiery, though the footwear business has wound down and two-thirds of the 15,000 workers once occupied in making shoes have shifted to Agra since 1980.

If Kanpur seems to be in a state of terminal decline, the problems seem endemic and unsolvable: no power, high sales tax rates, high labour costs (businessmen say minimum wage rates compare with those in Bombay), loss of orders (the Forest Department used to buy polythene bags for its nursery plantations, but this has been diverted to the Hill Development Corporation), shortage of raw material and a lack of infrastructure. For a telephone or telex connection in the Panki or Raina industrial estates, one has to run to the Jhansi circle. Said Ramesh Mehrotra of Cans India: "We were assured a telephone connection in six months of setting up the factory. I have been running from pillar to post, although I set up my unit in 1983." Power problems have added to Mehrotra's woes, and he has so far lost Rs 1 crore. Gaur Hari Singhania of the JK group also said: "We closed down four units in Kanpur because of the power shortage. If you call Kanpur the industrial capital of Uttar Pradesh, it has to be given some facilities to grow into that role."

Almost no one, therefore, talks with any hope for a city with a total investment of over Rs 800 crore in close to 6,000 industrial units, and an industrial workforce of 2.5 lakh. And the comments from the city's entrepreneurs are an endless litany of woe. Says M.R.K. Inayati, who runs N.I. Steel Pvt Ltd: "The steel re-rolling units are struggling to keep the pot boiling even if the furnaces blow cold air." Adds a spokesman of the Kanpur Steel and Engineering Association: "Forty-five per cent of the 1,100-odd engineering and steel units in Kanpur are facing closure." And, speaking of the power problems faced by the plastics industry, Kishan Gandhi, general secretary, Uttar Pradesh Plastic Manufacturers Federation said: "We are a continuous-process industry, but we have not been granted this status yet. We get power for only 20 hours in a 48-hour working week."

DEVAKI NANDAN DIXIT
chairman, British India Corporation

"These mills are old enough to become monuments. And our main problem is overstaffing."

EVEN the state Government and other authorities seem to have decided that Kanpur's heyday is over. Already, a section of the Industries Directorate has been shifted to Lucknow, and the rest of the financial and industrial development organisations might follow soon. The zonal headquarters of the State Bank of India have moved there too, as well as the foreign exchange division of the Reserve Bank of India. Kanpur's leather and tannery industry continues to flourish, but the headquarters of the Leather Export Promotion Council have moved to Madras. Despite government denials, industrialists suspect that the headquarters of the UPSIDC and the Uttar Pradesh Financial Corporation also might move to Lucknow.

When industry declines, trade unions get active. Gate meetings are a common sight, especially outside textile mills—where the fear of large-scale retrenchment haunts workers. "The meetings are much better attended now than before," said Ganesh Dixit, general secretary, Hind Mazdoor Kisan Panchayat, and some say union membership has quadrupled recently. Some 1,700 labour organisations function in the city. A Cotton Mill Joint Sangharsh Samiti has been formed by representatives of major unions to launch a joint offensive against retrenchment. And trade unionist Subhashini Ali, who is the wife of film director Muzaffar Ali and a familiar sight at gate meetings, said: "We are now organising workers of the small-scale units so that the fight against the industrialists and managements can have added meaning."

But the managements have their problems too. Production in textile mills is only 40 per cent of capacity, government-run mills lose a staggering Rs 75 crore every year, and gross overstaffing makes labour account for 30 per cent of total cost (against between 10 and 15 per cent for better-placed units). The Bombay Textile Research Association said in November last year, after a study of the work-load in Kanpur and Bombay mills, that 14,000 of the 35,000 Kanpur textile workers were redundant.

But the fact is that the Kanpur mills are also hopelessly out of date. Said Devaki Nandan Dixit, chairman of the British India Corporation, which runs three mills: "These mills are old enough to become monuments. And our main problem is overstaffing."

Despite the sense of gloom and crisis, however, the die-hard hopefuls continue to look forward to better days. Said UPSIDC Regional Manager S.B. Shukla: "Units have been coming up in the new industrial areas that we have developed." Added Gyanendra Misra, former general secretary of the Hind Mazdoor Sabha and a director of the Artificial Limb Manufacturing Corporation of India: "I cannot visualise a situation when Kanpur loses its identity as an industrial town. To say that industries and entrepreneurs are badly placed is a mistake, though there may be a power problem."

Nevertheless, there can be little room for cheer when existing units are on the decline, industrialists invest funds elsewhere, industrial promotion organisations begin to shift office and industrial employment drops steadily as factories close down or retrench workers. The British in 1819 may have planned the future of the then Cawnpore around industrial development, but today Kanpur's future is pretty gloomy.

TOURISM

A New Thrust

THE hard sell of India is on. For long peddled as the land of mysticism, ancient culture and elephants, the country will now also be packaged by the Department of Tourism as the land of fun and games. This shift in emphasis is part of a major government effort currently underway to breathe fresh life into the tourism industry. On the planning board are marine parks, Disneyland-type amusement parks—both inspired by non-resident Indians (NRI's)—water sports, adventure tourism and the development of some of the exotic little isles of Andaman and Nicobar and Lakshadweep. The Government is looking at various other proposals sent by NRI's from Bangkok and the United States. Duty-free shops—until now restricted to airports—could now sprout in the metropolises. These will be open to foreigners, tourists, diplomats and the increasingly visible tribe of NRI's.

The NRI and the foreigner are being hotly wooed as potential investors. Ushering them in at immigration counters might soon be "younger, better-looking Indian police officers", as Tourism Secretary S.K. Mishra puts it. NRI's will be allowed to hold up to 40 per cent equity in hotels (the ceiling is now 30 per cent) and foreigners might be given multiple-entry five-year visas. The Government has also more than doubled its advertisement budget to about Rs 7 crore—most of it for its campaigns in Europe and the US—which have been designed to reap the harvest of the two Festivals of India. With this aggressive advertising thrust, the Government hopes to raise the number of foreign tourists from over 8 lakh last year to more than a million, as well as raise the foreign exchange inflow from Rs 1,300 crore brought in by tourists last year to Rs 1,800 crore.

On the anvil are tourist charter flights to six cities, including Trivandrum, Delhi, Bhubaneswar and Calcutta, perhaps initially from West Germany. Weekly charter flights already land at Goa. The Government is also promising the travel trade less red tape, more attractive depreciation rates on hotels and cars and lower customs duties on about 200 items. Among them: air-conditioned tourist cars, water sports equipment, scuba diving, camping and sports gear. Added incentive is a higher interest subsidy (up from 1 to 3 per cent) on loans from financial institutions.

India, for long peddled as the land of mysticism, will now be packaged by the Department of Tourism as the land of fun and games.

A major thrust is planned in the Andaman and Nicobar and Lakshadweep islands for domestic tourists. Runways will be expanded to accommodate the wide-bodied Airbuses and the Government plans to buy a Rs 25-crore luxury cruise ship for Port Blair. The India Tourism Development Corporation (ITDC) will build a 300-bed hotel in Port Blair which will eventually be expanded to 1,000 beds. Two new islands, Neil and Havelock, will be opened to tourists but the Government will not allow any construction in many of these and other islands since the Department of Environment is anxious to preserve their ecological state. Water sports—particularly scuba diving—will be a highlight of the islands. An airstrip at Agati in Lakshadweep has also been sanctioned, but to prevent tourists from spoiling the environment, the Government might introduce a luxury-liner to which the tourists will return each night.

In the North-east, Mizoram, Nagaland and Tripura will each get three-star hotels and lakes in the area will be developed for water sports. To beef up the convention business, ITDC, the Karnataka State Tourism Corporation and the chamber of commerce will build a 2,000-seat convention centre in Bangalore. A similar centre with 1,000 seats will be built in Agra.

The private sector has reacted with guarded optimism to the ministry's proposals. Inder Sharma of Sita World Travels says he is happy about the Government's intentions but he thinks that it would be better to concentrate on the nitty-gritty. "We should remove all the immigration and red-tape hassles first. What we really need are more clean two and three star hotels. We cannot create oases in a desert." Gautam Khanna, vice-president, Oberoi Hotels, is optimistic but not euphoric: "The Government has to give proof of its intentions. Thus far they have not divested themselves of any property... Air-India should also get out of the hotel business."

But the consensus within the trade appears to be that while the new initiatives are to be welcomed, the Government should demonstrate its earnestness by first cleaning up and modernising existing tourist attractions such as Goa, Bhubaneswar and Varanasi before plunging into schemes which still have a pie-in-the-sky ring to them.

TISCARE
A quality product from Tata Steel

Milch cattle receive special care under animal husbandry programmes organised by the Tata Steel Rural Development Society (TSRDS). Started as a voluntary agency in 1979, TSRDS today covers 120 villages around Jamshedpur and 110 villages in Tata Steel's mines and collieries. People's participation plays a vital role in this ambitious venture that extends beyond animal husbandry to other areas of rural life as well.

Two crops where there was one

TSRDS entered a mono-crop area with very low irrigation facilities. Realising that rabi cultivation could revolutionise rural economy, it undertook field-based training programmes and started demonstration farms.

Today, hundreds of families are reaping second crops, thanks to cash crop cultivation over vast acreages.

Helping people help themselves

Rural industries are encouraged so that traditional skills and craftsmanship may be gainfully employed to augment family incomes. On-going schemes include cane furniture making, cocoon rearing and tussar silk weaving.

Community forestry has also been given an impetus by Tata Steel. A concerted programme of afforestation, through plantation and introduction of new and useful species of plants, has helped turn vast stretches of barren land into green areas.

The rehabilitation of fast-vanishing tribes like the Birhores, building of link roads and irrigation projects, the supply of clean drinking water, the establishment of schools and health services, are some of the other TSRDS schemes that have helped change the face of rural areas around Jamshedpur.

Tiscare has come to mean hope in so many areas. Ranging from health services to sports programmes. Employee welfare to community service. Rural development to relief and rehabilitation. Tiscare means many different things to many different people.

To Tata Steel, it is a continuing commitment to improving the quality of life.

PUBLIC SECTOR

Merger Moves

FOR the public sector, big has suddenly become beautiful. In an unusual burst of activity, the Government is moving to prune costs and eliminate competition among firms that hawk similar wares. The new watchwords: mergers and holding companies. A proposal to combine the State Trading Corporation of India and the Minerals and Metals Trading Corporation has been hanging fire for months, and a committee is examining a proposal to form a holding company for Indian Airlines, Air-India and Vayudoot. The Rajasthan-based Instrumentation Ltd, which competes with Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd (BHEL) in the electronics instruments market, is to become a BHEL subsidiary.

There is more. Three losing Calcutta-based pharmaceutical firms could face the prospect of a shotgun wedding, and the Cabinet has cleared a proposal to set up two holding companies for a clutch of engineering firms, most of them based in Calcutta and Allahabad. "Bigger companies are healthier, generate their own resources and finance their own expansion. If smaller companies are put under bigger ones, the Government will be freed of the responsibility of financing them," explains K.K. Tewary, minister of state for public enterprises.

The wave of mergers and holding companies is part of a package aimed at pepping up state enterprises. Other elements of the package: annual targets for companies, a proposal to convert government loans to 20 losing concerns into equity, and updating technology.

The latest flurry of activity is clearly rooted in the recommendations of a series of committees that looked at the issue of revamping government firms. Along with earlier committees, a committee headed by Arjun Sengupta, then additional secretary in the Prime Minister's Secretariat, had backed the holding company structure to insulate public sector managements from bureaucratic interference. Matters have come to a head because government firms are expected to contribute to seventh plan funds but may not be able to ante up much. Last year, 85 state units were Rs 1,620 crore in the red. Belt tightening could help improve results.

Senior government officials were quick to suggest precisely this last fortnight. A functionary of the Department of Chemicals, in whose bailiwick pharmaceutical firms fall, said that the products and marketing efforts of Smith Stanistreet, Bengal Chemicals and Pharmaceuticals and Bengal Immunity overlapped. Maintains a public sector grandee: "Bharat Heavy Plate & Vessels and Bharat Pumps & Compressors make compressors. It makes sense to group technologically allied companies."

Then, big companies can lure better managers. Bharat Bhari Udyog Nigam, the new Calcutta-based combine, and the Allahabad-based Bharat Yantra Nigam represent sales of Rs 275 crore and Rs 274 crore, respectively. Says a government official: "Small public sector companies don't attract good people at either the bottom or top levels. Big firms offer better career prospects."

Still, holding companies and capital restructuring are not novel to the public sector. The Steel Authority of India Ltd (SAIL) had a holding company in the '70s, but gave it up when the Janata government came to power. And the National Textile Corporation (NTC), which is awash in red ink, has had a holding company for years.

Last fortnight, the chairman of a major state-owned firm argued that holding companies fettered operations because company boards would have to pass special resolutions to transfer men and funds, and that the Sengupta Committee's suggestions on introducing autonomy were naive. Says he: "We have to go to the Government for foreign exchange. We can't even sign a collaboration agreement without government approval." The Government has also written off the losses of state-run enterprises such as the Ranchi-based Heavy Engineering Corporation, only to see them plunge into the red again.

That is certainly a damning indictment, but holding companies have their defenders too. Public sector men argue that SAIL fared well when it had a holding company, and that NTC has been in the dumps because most of its powers have been usurped by the Textiles Department. Tewary for his part promises that the subsidiaries of the new conglomerates will enjoy great freedom. Even so, he concedes that holding structures are not the final solution to the ills of state sector firms: "This is an experiment. We will try not to commit the mistakes made in the past." Still, it may be difficult to stick to that promise if greater autonomy remains a pipedream. And big may not remain beautiful either if the latest revamping strategy comes to naught.

EDIBLE OIL

Topsy Turvy

FIRST the rise: edible oil prices leap skyward. Then the raids: the Maharashtra civil supplies authorities along with armed police pounce on over 30 dealers. Inevitably, the relapse: nervous unloading of stocks, fresh crop arrivals and rumours of more anti-hoarding initiatives spark off a decline. The Bombay edible oils market has been having an exciting time of late.

The brouhaha was perhaps unavoidable. The groundnut oil price, which governs the movements of most other edible oils, was a sedate Rs 197.60 for 10 kg on July 1. One month later, it had perked up substantially to Rs231.92, and yet another month later, it had scaled a new peak of Rs 270.40. In just two months, prices had risen more than 35 per cent. The glorious gallop could hardly go unchecked.

Initially, there were the peace missions—meetings between trade associations and state civil supplies authorities, parleys with the Centre, letters and telegrams. In fact, in mid-August a voluntary price ceiling was agreed on. The arrangement lasted precisely three days before the bulls started roistering again. So on September 12 came the raids, which left the market in disarray and resulted in a two-day trade bandh. After all the ado, finally, come the long-term steps: the Centre has raised the minimum support price for kharif oilseeds and is planning various other measures to encourage oilseeds cultivation.

"It is a simple question of demand and supply," says Navinbhai Shah, vice-president of the Bombay Oilseeds and Oil Exchange. "There wasn't enough oil coming into the market from the producing centres because there wasn't enough oil to go around. The only way prices could have been checked was by the Government pumping in more imported oil." Shah is dead right. Oilseeds output this year will be 116 lakh tonnes, 20 lakh tonnes short of the target of 136 lakh tonnes, chiefly because the rain gods were less than bountiful in the groundnut belts of Gujarat and Tamil Nadu. In terms of edible oils, that means a production of only 35 lakh tonnes—this when the year's demand is projected as some 49 lakh tonnes. The Government has not fully covered the deficit with imports.

The edible oils trade squarely blames the Government for the shortage that now exists, arguing that massive imports in the past with the avowed purpose of keeping prices at a reasonable level made oilseeds farming uneconomical. The argument is not entirely unfounded, but a government official explained last fortnight that imports were now being pared to provide farmers incentives to grow more oilseeds.

If the rising prices have been partly checked by the raids, and by increased Central allocation to the vanaspati industry and for the public distribution system, the only long-term solution lies in boosting supplies. The yields in India are practically the lowest in the world.

While the rising prices have been partly checked by the raids, the only long-term solution lies in boosting supplies.

The Government is evidently aware of this. Union Minister of State for Agriculture Yogendra Makwana recently announced that a comprehensive package was on the anvil to boost oilseeds cultivation. The higher floor price is perhaps the first sign. The other is the paring of imports. This marks the beginning of a new official balancing act to keep edible oil prices high enough for farmers, simultaneously ensuring that prices do not hit the roof in retail shops. Says a government official: "We're certainly supporting the prices of those oilseeds which sagged earlier." The implications of this are clear enough. The days of cheap edible oils are over.

UNIT TRUST OF INDIA

Fund Flush

THE very first day's takings were a whopping Rs 2-crore. Mastershare, the country's maiden venture into mutual funds, has evidently got off to a spanking start. Launched by the Unit Trust of India (UTI) on September 19, the fund aims to corner as much as Rs 50 crore, with permission from the Government to retain another Rs 25 crore of over-subscription. If the initial reaction is anything to go by, the money is there for the asking.

The Mastershare is not the only feather in UTI's cap for the current year. A couple of months earlier, it had in tandem with Merrill Lynch, picked up a handsome £75 million in the first-ever India Fund. And its domestic operations are keeping excellent pace with the other successes: 1985-86 saw a Rs 1,033-crore increase in investible funds, an increase of close to 50 per cent.

UTI is certainly going places. And with the Mastershare—described as the small investor's entree to the stock-market—it is going to take a large number of people along with it. "The average investor with limited resources has always been our prime concern," says Chairman M.J. Pherwani. "This is another scheme for him to make the most of his money."

The scheme is simple in principle: One buys the Mastershare (the minimum investment is Rs 1,000) and leaves the rest to the UTI experts. They will invest the money in growth-oriented, high-flying scrips and undertake all the red tape involved in operating on the market. The Mastershare will itself be listed on all the stock exchanges. It will thus have easy liquidity, though the UTI will redeem it only after October 1993.

What the fund-flush UTI's increased presence in the market will do is to inspire another share market boom. Almost all the India Fund and Mastershare money will be invested in equity and debentures. This means that, initially at least, investors are likely to be presented with a bonanza.

But the critics have been sharpening their knives too. Stock-market circles contend that there is not enough floating stock for the UTI to pick up. "Bunk," counters Pherwani, "look at the number of capital consents and new issues. A hundred crore is a drop in the bucket." He has a point in this. The market capitalisation of the top 10 companies alone was Rs 2,317 crore in the year 1984-85.

The other criticism is that the Mastershare scheme, because of its in-built tax advantages (Mastershare holders will be entitled to the same tax exemptions as Unit holders), will help only the rich. This is even more emphatically denied. "The rich will have already crossed the investment limits for exemption purposes. Mastershares will not give them any significant advantage. Besides they can afford to hire the best investment experts and plan their portfolio. The small cannot and it is for them that we are doing the job," says Pherwani.

"The average investor with limited resources has always been our prime concern. This is another scheme for him to make the most of his money."

M.J. PHERWANI
chairman, UTI

The difference between UTI and the others, the chairman adds, is that "we are given a fee while the investor takes the profit. For the rest, be it debentures or equity, the investor gets the fee while the company takes the profit".

UTI now has other plans up its sleeve. The India Fund's success has paved the way for more such ventures in the future. And while it is premature to talk of a fresh issue of Mastershares, such a possibility is not ruled out. Mutual funds, very much the rage abroad, have at last come to India.

CALCUTTA

Hotel High

ITS hotels, with rare exception, are of a piece with the city: seedy facades, sagging arcades, thinly peopled lobbies and restaurants that tiredly belt out the strains of other times. But the times are a-changing in Calcutta. Job Charnock's city is readying to roll out the welcome mat again for the well-heeled traveller.

Last fortnight, the ITC-managed Welcomgroup chain of hotels announced that it was negotiating for a prime location in central Calcutta to build a 200-room hotel. Not to be outdone, the management of the West Bengal Government-owned Great Eastern declared its intention to demolish in phases the 150-year-old hotel in the city's central business district, replacing it with a spanking new 14-storeyed monolith. Both the announcements came even as the Oberoi group was half-way through a Rs 24-crore programme to renovate the Oberoi Grand. The new-look Grand will have a new colonial style drive-in, an underground car park, additional restaurants, clubs, and suites with private saunas and lawns. Simultaneously, the Taj chain was busy putting up the 200-room Taj Bengal, its first foray into Calcutta.

The four ventures mean an investment of over Rs 100 crore, and will offer clients 1,000 deluxe rooms in a city that now has three nominally five-star hotels, but only one genuinely deluxe hostelry. So there could be room enough for the new entrants. For starters, big business is scouting for investment opportunities in West Bengal. Then, a number of international airlines, including Singapore Airlines and Poland's LOT are bracing to touch down at Calcutta airport. Last month, the Tokyo-based principal of McKinsey and Company, the international consultancy firm, offered its services to turn Calcutta into the "gateway" of eastern India.

The optimism, however, is not universally shared. Executives of rival hotel groups are quick to suggest that the new ventures will not be money-spinners. Said Satish Kumar, vice-president of Oberoi Grand: "ITC's and the Taj's decisions to put up new hotels are not strictly business decisions. Their motive seems to be to establish a base in Calcutta for the future." That is partly true. ITC is kicking off its Rs 40-crore venture, because it wants a hotel on its home turf. Explains an ITC spokesman: "We are ashamed not to have a Welcomgroup hotel in the city where we have our headquarters."

But the Taj project is commercial enough. Project costs have doubled from Rs 12 crore to Rs 25 crore, but the four-storeyed hotel may enjoy a cost advantage over its rivals—it will have to pay the West Bengal Government a relatively piffling rent for the four acre plot on which it is to be sited. So soft were the terms that the venture kicked up a storm in the Calcutta press a few years ago.

Ironically, however, the Government has not been quite as responsive to the needs of its own hotel. Great Eastern's management has been arguing that the profitable state-owned hotel has to be rebuilt. "Our facilities are outdated, our rooms are enormous and the air-conditioning is prohibitively expensive," says hotel administrator A.K. Banerjee. But its ambitious solution to the problem has run into a wall: the Calcutta Metropolitan Development Authority, the Government agency responsible for the city's development, has declined to clear it so far.

The Taj Bengal: new presence

Nevertheless, Calcutta plainly faces an unprecedented hotel boom. The loser in this could be the highly profitable Grand. Its steady stream of clients has been undeterred by the stiff room rates (50 per cent higher than its five-star competitors). "The Taj is certainly a force to be reckoned with," admits Oberoi's Kumar, "but we intend to give them a run for their money." That could presage a room rate war, but with renewed hope on the city's economic horizon, the prospects of that happening seem remote.

It takes an Otis engineer 7 years to attend to a complaint.

Before an Otis engineer dares to so much as lay a finger on your elevator, we put him through five years of rigorous training.

At an institute run by Otis.

In the first year, all he does is learn how to fix and repair ropes, doors, cables and gears.

And that's not because he's a slow learner.

It's just that when you're part of a company that moves the Earth's population every 9 days, the last thing you need is something turning out wrong. From people who're there to set things right.

The competent few who make it through a gruelling exam at the end of the year, have the privilege of entering the portals of the Otis Machine Assembly Shop.

Where they can witness for themselves how an Otis elevator is manufactured.

And imbibe the ethos of a company whose Principals spend $ 2 million a day on research and development, worldwide.

By now 730 days have lapsed. And it's time to move the brightest engineers to the third year.

Where each of them learns the basics of elevator maintenance.

They work alongside a full-fledged service engineer. Accompanying him on calls.

Having excelled in this, the Otis engineer now spends the fourth year studying lift adjustments for various kinds of elevators.

And finally, in the fifth year, he actually gets to handle jobs. Under the critical gaze of a senior foreman.

It'll take him another two years at least before he can lead his own servicing team.

Of course, when you call in with a complaint, you'll find an Otis engineer attending to it in no time at all.

But that's no great shakes, really. After all, he started out seven years ago.

Otis. The international number one.

All the signs are reflective of economic health—both inflation and the price of gold are relatively low, and money supply, bank credit and exports are on a healthy track. Share prices are also showing signs of recovering. Exports have already recovered. The only matter of worry is on the infrastructure front.

All data are seasonally adjusted. The current trends are computed on the basis of six-month (weekly data) or two-year (monthly data) figures. Quarters in the text refer to the calendar year quarters.

Wholesale prices continue to remain reasonably steady, despite a spurt in late August, auguring well for the future.

The increase in consumer prices is now at a decelerating pace, and may improve given the trend in wholesale prices.

Money supply growth is accelerating. But even with low inflation, the expansion in M3 is normal, and may even be slightly restrictive.

Though apparently below trend during the last month or so, credit availability in real terms was expansionary in the second quarter.

The first quarter relief on imports seems to have been temporary. Exports have picked up, but caution should guide future outlook.

As a multiple of imports, reserves are equivalent to 4.3 months of imports. But there has been a noticeable decline in the last four months.

Whether the rally in some issues is corrective is yet to be seen. The 10% drop in share values may have been good for an over-heated market.

Notwithstanding the present rally, a persistent gold bull would still be losing his fight with inflation. Gold prices have declined slightly.

THE MARKETS

New Cheer

COME September, and the stock-markets are finally in a cheerful mood. Sustained buying by the cash-rich Unit Trust of India (UTI) has finally sent the bears on the run, while Finance Minister V.P. Singh's promise of a plan to give a boost to the market has raised general confidence about the future. Several industries seem to be in for good times: higher tea prices at auction centres have sent tea shares soaring and the reports of cement prices being decontrolled have helped cement shares.

Till late August, UTI's strategy of following up selective buying with selective selling (of such shares as Grasim, Hindustan Aluminium and Larsen and Toubro) had seen the market still in an uncertain mood. But UTI's subsequent buying spree on several counters saw the Bombay Stock Exchange sensitive index of equity prices shoot up by 12.67 points in one week, to 563.22, while the Financial Express and The Economic Times indices also notched up substantial gains. Several scrips did well for themselves as a result, including Bajaj Auto, Century Spinning, Gujarat State Fertilisers, the fancied Indrol and Kinetic Engineering.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

But there were the laggards as well. The two Tata giants lost ground, partly because of UTI selling, partly because of the state of the truck market and partly because steel costs have gone up without any immediate prospect of a hike in steel prices. Orkay Silk Mills also notched up only very small gains, despite the company chairman's painting of a bright future. And Reliance lost ground marginally, even as the report of the Rangarajan Committee was awaited on the question of whether the banks had violated Reserve Bank guidelines in giving loans to Reliance's proxies. Larsen and Toubro was affected by fears of a decline in financial performance.

So far, however, the recovery in September has done little more than make up for the ground lost in August, and The Economic Times share index, for instance, is still well below the 500-point mark, not to speak of the year's peak of around 550. Also, the market remains unhealthily dependent on the UTI, whose buying and selling operations have become the focus of practically all attention.

This is unlikely to change until the bulls recover sufficiently from their drubbing in recent months and are in a position to make fresh commitments of any significant nature. Also, with the market having been in a bearish mood for so long, some of the investible funds may have sought profits elsewhere, in such items as bullion (gold has seen a sharp price rise in the recent past). But so long as the bearish mood shows no signs of returning, there should be reason for cheer.

The Archetypal Woman

"When lovely woman stoops to folly and Paces about her room again alone,
She smooths her hair with automatic hand
And puts a record on the gramophone".
—T.S. Eliot

WHEN Eliot wrote these lines in The Wasteland in the mid-1920s, he was creating an icon of the liberated western woman which would endure for half a century. Today the gramophone has yielded to the video cassette player but the icon remains firm: a word-picture whose 'meaning' is inherent and self-evident. The art of advertising which identifies and manipulates 'by type' is supposedly expert in the creation of complex life-style icons. And advertising addresses women all the time.

Who is the real Indian woman? She is the small town housewife with three children and the metropolitan career woman. She is the one who stopped studying at school and the Ph.D graduate. She is the 18-year-old college girl buying jeans and the 60-year-old country mouse shopping for potatoes, kerosene and matches. But in the commercial media, we see very few images of her.

"Will the real Indian woman please stand up?" If you were to address such a question to the advertising industry you would get an answer by way of two approximate demographic images. One is the 18-24 year old, with at least a school level education and from the upper-middle income group. She wears cosmetics, uses toiletries, buys ready-made garments, sanitary towels and personal products. The other is older (25-34), also urban, similar in education and income level, but wears a saree and tikka and buys detergents, scourers, cooking media and food products.

There are two conflicting assumptions here. The first is that one type is the other grown up. That is to say, at an age of exactly 24 years and 11 months, the girl in jeans gets married, acquires a saree and turns from idle fun to the serious business of setting up house and family. The other assumption is ludicrous—that the jeans-wearer never gets married but fades away into some psychological limbo and the saree-wearer equipped with pressure cooker emerges full-fledged from the void!

Ask the advertising man why he restricts his icons to women between 18 and 35 and he might answer that the Indian woman has a very young profile by age. In fact, 58 per cent of women are below 24. What he would not tell you is that those below 18 have next to no spending power. He might also skirt the facts emerging from the Third National Readership Survey, that there are 13 per cent more women over 45 than between 25 and 34, and they have 10 per cent more purchasing power.

> "With the decreasing product differences between competing brands, the psychographic profiling of feminine types might be the only way of carving out niches in the market-place."

In Indian advertising, the 'over-40s woman is completely ignored, except by way of 'grandma recommendations' for children's tonics. Even advertising for hair-dye shows women in their early 30s. There seems to be an implicit assumption that at about 40 the Indian woman goes to seed. This appears to be a false notion and I believe there is an untapped goldmine in the 'over-40s' segment for the imaginative marketeer who addresses himself to an Indianised version of Joan Collins in 'Dynasty'. Such an attempt was in fact made by Richardson Hindustan with Oil of Olay. The positioning was sound but the product failed for entirely different reasons. It was priced out of consumer reach.

Consumer studies show that the woman in the 25-30 segment suffers from severe limitations. She is in what may be called 'the early full-nest stage' of her life, and has little discretionary personal income. For that you must go to the over-40s who spend lavishly on travel luxury goods and appliances, expensive furniture and perfumes, home improvements and up-market paints.

It follows that the greatest advertising opportunity lies in the psychographic profiling and segmentation of feminine type. With the decreasing product differences between competing brands and the increasing hybridisation of life-style, this might prove the only way of carving out 'positional niches' in the market-place; for 'Market Share' closely follows 'Share of Mind'. Always!

I set down some possible advertising archetypes. The model and terminology are based on a psychographic profile of the American woman by Kathy Ziff.

► The Sensuous Woman: Eyes closed, luxuriating in unabashed self-abandon. Film model: Parveen Babi.

► The Siren: Sexy, provocative, using body language. Film model: Mandakini (Ram Teri Ganga Maili). Advertising model: Garden Vareli.

► The 'Come Hither': Shy and sexy. Film model: Sharmila Tagore.

► The Exotic Art Object: Personality subservient to mood. She serves as a decoration. Film model: Rekha (Umrao Jaan). Advertising model: Raymond's Suitings, Old Spice.

► The Cheer Leaders: Friendly, engaging, non-seductive. The girl next door. Film model: Jaya Bhaduri. Advertising model: Fair & Lovely.

COSMIC RAYS

Anuradha's Bounty

SCIENTISTS call them the starry messengers. But 74 years after cosmic rays were discovered, astrophysicists are yet to decipher their origin. Moving at almost the speed of light, these tiny, highly energetic cosmic particles are thought to have trekked through space for around 10 million years before bombarding the earth. When recorded they look like microscopic tear drops which scientists believe contain information about the origin of the universe. Peering at more than 10,000 such "signatures" imprinted by cosmic rays on acrylic plates, scientists at Bombay's Tata Institute of Fundamental Research (TIFR) last month came up with fascinating details about the nature of some of these particles.

Sending up a barrel-shaped cosmic ray recorder, coyly called "Anuradha", inside the US Space Shuttle Challenger, in April last year, the TIFR scientists found that low-energy cosmic rays had intensified more than 50-fold since they were last recorded three years ago. Said Prof. Sukumar Biswas, who heads the five-man Anuradha research team: "There is something happening up in space that is causing this dramatic increase. Understanding this phenomenon would give us clues about the rays' origin."

NAMAS BHOJANI

Anuradha's findings have already generated a great deal of scientific debate about why there has been such an intriguing increase in low energy cosmic rays. Discovered as recently as 1974 by an earlier Spacelab mission, low energy cosmic rays have always puzzled scientists. Although they travelled at half the velocity of the usual cosmic rays, they were nevertheless able to traverse millions of kilometres and penetrate the solar system. And unlike their higher energy cousins, these particles had a different chemical composition—leading researchers to believe that they originated from other sources.

The TIFR scientists believe that the increase in low energy cosmic rays is partly due to the sun changing its polarity. In a curious phenomenon, the magnetic poles of the sun reverse themselves every 22 years, with the North Pole becoming the South Pole and vice versa. The last time this happened was in 1980. TIFR scientists theorise that when the sun changed its polarity it seems to have aligned itself with the magnetic field of stars, thereby attracting more such cosmic rays into the solar system.

The Anuradha experiment is India's latest contribution to cosmic ray research. With more than six national laboratories and 25 universities doing some form of cosmic ray studies, India has been a front-runner in this area of research. In a deep mine in the Kolar Gold Fields, TIFR scientists along with a Japanese team are trying to find out whether protons, the basic building blocks of nature that were thought to be stable, do decay into smaller particles. These particles have already been noticed in cosmic rays and if it is proved that protons do decay, then it means that the universe with its 10 billion galaxies is slowly dying. Another significant experiment is going on at the Physical Research Laboratory in Ahmedabad, where scientists are studying the "nuclear tracks" left by cosmic rays on meteorites hitting the earth, for clues about the solar system's origin.

Biswas' team have been working on low energy cosmic rays ever since they were discovered and has come out with various explanations about their origin. In a rare gesture the US offered to send up a cosmic ray recorder if the TIFR built one. The building of Anuradha itself took four years and was a triumph of indigenous ingenuity. While the Challenger orbited the earth 116 times, Anuradha's gently rotating recorder, consisting of plastic sheets stacked like a cake, faced a volley of cosmic rays at seven a minute for 64 hours. It took a year for scientists to decipher the 10,000 sheets of data that Anuradha's computer had produced and much remains to be interpreted.

But despite more than 60 years of research on cosmic rays, scientists the world over have yet to agree on their origin. Initially it was believed that they were produced by supernova explosions or giant stars breaking apart. Then scientists speculated that these rays were accelerated in the interstellar medium when they collided with magnetic clouds littered all over the universe. It is now believed that these rays have extragalactic origins.

But if this sounds like a lot of Star Wars jargon, it is bread and butter for cosmic ray scientists. And the mystery of the origin of cosmic rays only seems to deepen as more researchers crowd the field. As Biswas says: "It's a never-ending quest."

ELEPHANTS

Killed for Ivory

IN the thickly forested Bandipur wildlife sanctuary in Karnataka it is often the vultures circling high above that bring news of death in the jungle. And last month, as a posse of forest guards rushed to the spot above which the vultures hovered, they were forced back by the stench of rotting flesh. On a slight hump a body of an elephant lay sprawled on the ground, its face a bloody mess. Its trunk lay curled in a pool of blood. Two white stumps near its mouth were all that was left of its tusks. And from its forehead blood oozed from a gunshot wound.

There was little the foresters could do but record the elephant's death and leave it to the buzzards to reduce the four tonnes of flesh to skeletal remains. But the toll is mounting. Five elephants have been shot dead by ivory poachers in Bandipur and 12 in Karnataka as a whole in the past three months. In the neighbouring state of Tamil Nadu, another four tuskers have met with a similar cruel fate.

Ivory poaching, in fact, has become as routine as felling trees in the forests. Altogether, around 100 elephants are now brutally massacred for their tusks every year in the states of Kerala, Karnataka and Tamil Nadu. With poachers selectively hacking adult male elephants—the only ones in the herds to grow tusks—the very survival of the great Indian tusker is now in question.

Ecologists have already noticed an alarming drop in the number of adult male elephants. In Bangalore, ecologist R. Sukumar, who recently completed a four-year study of elephants in the southern states, estimates that the number of adult male elephants fell from 603 in 1981 to an alarming 258 last year. They used to constitute 7 per cent of the total elephant population; that number is now down to 3 per cent. Earlier, there used to be two adult male elephants for every 10 adult females; now there is only one for every 10. This genetic imbalance has obvious implications. Warns Sukumar: "If this continues we may soon be faced with the serious situation of having no adult tuskers for breeding."

That is not an idle threat. Before poaching became rampant in Sri Lanka, 90 per cent of the male elephants had tusks but now this is down to 10 per cent. Ecologists fear Indian tuskers are not far off from the same fate, with even small elephants whose tusks weigh a bare 2 kg not escaping the poacher's bullet. For while in north India only half the male elephants are tuskers, in the south—which has half the country's elephant population—nine out of ten elephants grow tusks. There is apprehension now that in the not too distant future, the Indian male elephants may be only makhanas, or tuskless.

So extensive have been the killings that in the past decade almost 18,000 kg of ivory, worth Rs 2.7 crore have been smuggled out of the forests by unscrupulous poachers (each kilogramme of ivory fetches Rs 1,500, and an average tusk weighs 10 kg). Most of this has found its way into the flourishing ivory market in the country and the rest has been exported out. Recent reports also speak of the precious ivory being smuggled to Dubai, where the Arabs are said to be hoarding it as "white gold".

Realising that the problem had reached dangerous levels, Parliament in the recent monsoon session banned the sale of Indian ivory all over the country and stipulated that all those trading in African ivory would need a licence. And the Department of Environment (DOE) has agreed to fund half the cost of state government anti-poaching measures. Funds from the Central Government could not have come at a better time. The state forest departments are ill-equipped to meet the challenge from poachers, who have sophisticated weaponry and extensive contacts both among the tribals that inhabit the forests and ivory traders. Most of the guards are equipped with obsolete .303 rifles or muskets, hardly the type of weapons to frighten away poachers who carry the best in the business. Moreover, in Tamil Nadu there is a shortage of ammunition, leading a forester wryly comment: "We use only the butt end of the guns." In Karnataka although the Forest Department asked for 200 more rifles the ordnance factories have asked them to wait for two years. Admits S. Kondas, Tamil Nadu's chief conservator of forests: "We are no match for poachers. We have been outmanoeuvred and outgunned by them."

An encounter in the Bandipur sanctuary last month best illustrates the impotence of the Forest Department in fighting poachers. Madhav Muthu, a forest guard, while sitting in his machan spotted a fire lit by poachers around 8 p.m. Since the range office was 8 km away and since no vehicle is provided to forest guards, Muthu hitched a ride in a passing lorry and managed to reach the range office a full three hours later. By the time the range officer got a posse organised, another hour had been lost. Now there were other problems to follow. Of the two guns they had, only one was working. And as soon as they got into the vehicle, a 20-year-old station wagon, it broke down and they had to borrow a jeep.

By the time they reached the site where they spotted the fire, it was 2 a.m. It took them another hour to locate the poachers, and when they finally confronted them the poachers opened fire, blowing a hole the size of a fist in the chest of Siddaramma, a forest guard, and killing him instantly. With their only working gun the foresters returned the fire, killing a notorious poacher called Rathnam, but the remaining 11 poachers got away. Among the items they left behind were six sophisticated rifles, 100 kg of rice and other rations meant to last more than a month and 200 rounds of ammunition.

The encounter in Bandipur was the closest that the Karnataka foresters got to nabbing a poaching gang. The shortage of policing staff has not made the job of the foresters easy. In Tamil Nadu there are only six watchers and one guard to comb 40 sq km of forest land. The ratio is no better in Karnataka, except that the foresters have equipped themselves with wireless sets. M.K. Appaya, chief wildlife warden of Karnataka, adds: "There have been very few convictions of poachers, and even if they are penalised they get off with light fines."

As a result elephant poaching continues to flourish. Forest intelligence cells have very little dope about the poachers. They only know around 20 odd large gangs operate most of them from Tamil Nadu and Kerala. Since most of the forests in these states are in the bordering districts poachers easily slip in and out because of the lack of coordination between the various forest departments.

RAJ CHENGAPPA

Forest guards on the poachers trail: outmanoeuvred and outgunned

The men behind the 20 gangs rarely involve themselves in the actual killings, which are left to middlemen to organise. The middlemen themselves hire sharpshooters to do the actual job and enlist tribals to learn about elephant movements and provide rations to the poaching teams. The killings are almost always at night and that too at short range. A more cruel practice is putting a bullet into the elephant's knee and laming the beast. With the elephant unable to move, the poachers come back and collect the tusks at will. While earlier sulphuric acid was used to detach the tusks from the elephant, nowadays it is axed from the mouth.

Many of the forest guards find it easier to to be in league with the poachers. In fact a large number of elephant killings in the forest go unrecorded. While in the past decade the three state forest departments have recorded only around 500 elephant deaths from poaching, ecologists say that around the same number have gone unreported. In a bid to avoid detection many of the foresters even try to burn the carcass. To prevent this, the Nilgiris Wildlife Association, a voluntary organisation, got tribals in the area to report elephant killings. And last year it was able to get 14 forest guards suspended for trying to destroy evidence of a poached elephant.

Ironically poaching seems to have intensified after both Tamil Nadu and Karnataka stopped the auctioning of tusks recovered either from elephants dying of old age or from poachers. The two states now have between them six tonnes of ivory in their forest godowns. And the poachers are encouraged by the fact that forest departments are not organised enough to nab them.

But plans are finally being drawn up to make the anti-poaching drive more effective. Tamil Nadu is planning to equip its forest guards with wireless sets and introduce rewards for forest guards who catch poachers. Karnataka has asked for sophisticated guns and is equipping each range with more jeeps and men. And the Central Government is urging the three states to set up a joint anti-poaching cell to ensure greater coordination. All this, of course, has come late in the day. And if the poaching is not checked quickly, the only Indian tuskers to be found will be in the zoo.

The World of a Blind Man

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

TO most of the world, Mangalsain Bhalla is just another blind man, who has found a vocation in teaching music. In the hustle and bustle of everyday life he is just one more lost, faceless human being, part of a familiar neighbourhood scene of daily drudgery in which he taps his way with his cane from his two-bedroom flat in New Delhi's Sarojini Nagar to his school. But the world around Bhalla is also blind. It is blind to the raging intensity, the nuances, the pathos, and humour in Bhalla's life. When it sees the familiar sight of Bhalla tapping his cane, the world cannot know that Bhalla has a wife who is also blind, that he has two beautiful children blessed with perfect eyesight, and that Bhalla goes on "sightseeing" excursions. His last trip was to the Taj Mahal. This is not an essay on blindness, the plight of the blind, or even about the heroic struggle of blind people to overcome their handicap. What follows is simply the exploration of one man's inner world.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

BHALLA even dreams in voices. In sounds. "Without them, my world dies." Born blind, he does not know what light is. "I don't even know what darkness is."

As the evening shadows deepen, Bhalla, sitting on his charpoy in his little bedroom, knows that night is approaching. He can "hear" it. The endless chirping of sparrows now huddled together on the shoulder of a drain-pipe on the building, has ended. Now is the time for the hiss of a dozen pressure cookers as neighbours get their dinners ready. The occasional whiff of spicy food signalling preparations of evening meals wafts in. And the cacophony of Doordarshan's night programmes. All tell him it's 'night'.

In the kitchen he can hear his wife, Sanvari, getting their dinner ready. She became blind at seven after an attack of smallpox. They met at a national convention of the blind nine years ago. Theirs is a marriage of voice and sound—her lively voice, the rustle of her night-gown, her soft footstep, and, his gruff voice and shuffling walk.

He did not know there was an opposite sex until he was 17 and a classmate told him about the facts of life. "Till then, I didn't even think of sex. How could I? I had no mental images about it. Only after my friends told me I started feeling the sexual urge. I knew the difference between man and woman only after marriage."

Their two children—Sampada, 7, and Dipanshu, 5—play nearby. He has never seen them grow. But he has listened to their voices mature. "When they call me papa, half my tiredness goes. I am the happiest person in the world."

"Sometimes, being blind helps. Recently, when a Hindi film was being telecast there was a rape scene on. Sampada turned around and asked me, 'Papa, what are they doing to her?' I replied instantly: 'How do I know? I can't see what's happening'."

Flowers, clouds, beauty. They are mere words, descriptions. As he makes his way to school each morning he feels only the heat of the morning sun on his back. "I can only hear the wind rustling through the leaves of the trees. And I know that some have sweet smelling flowers and the others thorns." And during his visit to the Taj Mahal, "its main dome echoed voices perfectly. Its beauty can't be felt."

At times it does not matter at all whether he can see. At other times it hurts—when his friends told him his wife "looked radiant" when she was pregnant. And now tell him that his son looks like him. Or once before marriage when he went to a cinema hall to 'listen' to a movie and he heard people laugh at him." I wanted to commit suicide then. But on my way to the medical shop I heard a small boy selling newspapers and I thought I have a better life than he does."

He did not realise he was different till he was five years old. He was playing around on the sofa when his mother admonished him, "stop doing that." He sat in puzzled silence, then asked: "How did you know what I was doing?" When she didn't answer he thought, "she has an extra quality that I do not have."

The next day his sister called out to him from a distance. Again he asked: "How did you know where I was standing?" The only answer he got was the sounds of her weeping. "While I had to feel around or listen to sounds to know what was happening, I realised they could see. Something I could not do."

For months he rebelled. He refused to eat, dress or play. In the mornings when his mother asked him to wash his face he would ask: "Why should I when I can't even see my face?"

And then there were the hours of loneliness at home while other children went to school and he was forced to stay back. "In the evenings they used to call me to play hide and seek. I used to be asked to blindfold them."

The pain never leaves. The blind learn to push it aside and try to live normally. "If we keep thinking about the impossible then we can't live at all."

OVER and over he must prove to the world, "I'm self-dependent. I'm not inferior because of my blindness." Making friends is difficult. He extends his hand searchingly to shake the hand of a new voice he has heard. He must learn to judge the person only by his grip and the tenor of his voice. A pleasant voice usually means a friendly person: "It doesn't matter to me whether a person is wearing a suit or a torn shirt. I judge people only by what they speak and their actions towards me. That gives me a true indication of their nature."

Not always. Like the time a polite voice offered to help him and Sanvari cross the and then snatched Sanvari's chain left them stranded in the middle of the road. Fortunately the chain she was wearing was made of a cheap metal. A bus driver seeing their plight stopped his vehicle and helped them to the other side. Every morning, resolute of step, he finds his way to the school nearby. He crosses the road by feel: "Nature and careless civil engineers have provided me with many clues to find my way."

A pot-hole on the road becomes a signpost indicating a left turn. The change from tarmac to concrete means that a flight of steps follows. A wall that blocks the whispering wind tells him that he has to turn right. He skilfully avoids oncoming traffic: "I'm not deaf, you know, just blind."

On a rainy morning last week he is desperate to reach school on time. He gets into a passing autorickshaw. The driver protests. Bhalla pushes the ferrule of the umbrella against the driver's back and tells him: "Take me where I want to go or I'll shoot you." The driver complies, laughing all the way.

At school Bhalla taps his way to the classroom and waits for the shuffle of students' feet and their voices to fill the room. During the lesson truant students start whispering or skip doing their class work. He hears the indiscipline and reprimands them severely.

"When I think someone is taking advantage of my blindness I lose control of myself and sometimes shout at the students. But afterwards I feel sad. They do not myself." He taught himself to sing picking up tunes from the radio, a constant companion when he was young.

In the evenings Bhalla, almost unnoticed, makes his way up to his house. The magic eye on his door is barely two feet above ground level—to suit the eye-level of his two children.

Sanvari gets the food ready for the children. She feels the heat of the flame and smells the food. Deftly she tosses a chapati on the tava. She presses the potatoes to see if they are boiled and then puts them into a frying pan.

Eight years in front of the stove have made her an expert cook. Her only regret: "I can't see how yellow the haldi has made the food."

Sanvari once wanted to learn how to make puris. But when she asked her neighbour she was told, "it will be too difficult for you. I'll make them and send it across." Sanvari was deeply hurt: "Why are people always trying to remind us that we are blind?"

Bhalla adds: "We are not something to be pitied. What we want is to be treated like normal human beings. We are capable of doing as much as anybody can, even though we may learn more slowly."

Every day they are confronted with new examples of society's lack of understanding. When he took his transistor in a bus recently to listen to cricket commentary, people laughed asking him what silly point or long off was.

LITTLE do people realise that we played cricket in school. That we have a special beeping ball that tells us from which direction it is coming. The only difference is that the playing captain tells us where he has placed his fielders. The only person sighted is the umpire. I was a leg spinner and took seven wickets once. And my highest score was 47."

Bhalla's happiest memories are of the blind school at Panipat. "At home people would tell me where the plates were, how to go to the toilet, where to wash up. Although they were being kind by their actions, they were constantly reminding me I was blind. But at school to be blind was normal. Because nobody else could see."

"One day on the dining table while searching for the curry dish I accidentally dropped it on the floor. And you know we laughed and laughed. We never felt bad about such things."

"My happiest moment was when I sat by a river near the school. The running water was like music. I could hear the birds singing and sugarcane stalks moving in the breeze.I was one with nature. It didn't tell me I was blind."

Still, life in the blind school was tough. Since there is only one institute in the country which prints textbooks in Braille—the Institute for the Visually Handicapped in Dehra Dun—these were always in short supply. The whole class had to share one book and that meant taking turns in studying.

Things have not changed much for Bhalla since then. He has enrolled himself as an external candidate for a bachelor of arts degree in history and political science. And even now he has to get the textbooks transcribed on tape. He studies at night and his niece, Sweetie, also blind, usually helps him.

Bhalla switches off the lights—they don't need them. And in the darkness, he switches on a cassette tape on which he has recorded various textbooks and starts listening. And while he dictates, Sweetie swiftly takes down notes in Braille—a series of dots punched on a page.

HE would like to import a Brailler—the equivalent of a typewriter—which would help him speed up his note-taking at least 10-fold. But the Government's inordinately long bureaucratic red-tape would take him years to cut through.

There are other things Bhalla would like the Government to do: like importing thermometers specially for the blind. When he falls sick, Sanvari has to make a trip to the neighbours and ask them to read his temperature.

Within Bhalla there is pain but little bitterness. Years of fighting discrimination have deadened any self-pity that he had. The hurt surfaces when he attends marriages. "I hear people having a lot of fun singing and dancing. But I feel aloof and sad. Many people chat with me but I always feel that they think me a burden."

For Sanvari Diwali is not joyous: "I can hear the crackers going off. But I can't see the diyas and the rockets lighting up the sky. That's when I really miss my eyesight."

Bhalla knows it is late at night because of the silence. The stillness is broken occasionally by a lone dog baying outside. He checks the time on his Braille watch—midnight. Time to sleep. He settles down next to Sanvari.

KUDAL COMMISSION

Chasing Chimeras

IT'S hearings are open to the public and yet hardly anybody turns up at the offices of the Kudal Commission. Out of 228 commissions appointed under the Commissions of Inquiry Act, it is the only one set up by a vote of Parliament but barely half-a-dozen Members of Parliament have deposed before it. Even senior ministers privately say it should be wound up but the Government continues to give it repeated extensions.

The Kudal Commission, headed by Purushottam Das Kudal, was set up in February 1982 to probe into the working of three Gandhian institutions—the Gandhi Smarak Nidhi, the Gandhi Peace Foundation (GPF) and the Sarva Seva Sangh—and the Association of Voluntary Agencies for Rural Development (AVARD). The main charges against them were that they had compromised national interests by receiving funds from tainted foreign sources and had taken part in political activities even though they are charitable institutions.

Denying the charges, the agencies—which have even staged a silent protest march to Parliament against the commission—retort that the commission is politically motivated. Says A.C. Sen, general secretary of AVARD: "The Government is using the Kudal Commission to conduct a witch-hunt against us because we backed Jayaprakash Narayan's pre-Emergency stir against Mrs Gandhi." The appointment of Justice Kudal—who was a member of the Congress Party till 1967—and of Daljit Sen Adel—a known CIA-baiter and critic of Jayaprakash Narayan—as the commission's counsel, they argue, betrays this design.

The agencies first saw red when the commission started recording preliminary evidence without involving them. Matters reached a breaking point when they found that evidence they had supplied was being used against them with the result that they got a stay order from the High Court absolving them of the responsibility of supplying documents to the commission. Home Minister Buta Singh denies the charge of political vendetta but the denial carries little weight because their link with JP is the only common characteristic among the four agencies.

In the absence of cooperation from the agencies—the Sarva Seva Sangh has boycotted it since 1984—the commission has had to requisition files from the Government to build up cases, which is not only extremely time-consuming but also lacking in supporting evidence. Expectedly therefore, the commission has little to show for its expense of Rs 1.2 crore and staff of 125, including one DIG and two SP's.

But the Home Ministry argues that the commission's continuance is necessary because many matters of national security are involved in the 330-odd cases that it is still investigating. Listing some of these cases—supply of aerial survey/photographs of areas in Hazaribagh district of Bihar to a West German Christian funding organisation, collection of biological data by the GPF from the hunger-belt of the country and transmitting the same to a foreign agency to facilitate research on biological war—Buta Singh says the organisations were involved in "anti-national activities". Justice Kudal and his staff also see their mission in similarly heroic terms: of peeling off, layer by layer, attempts by Justice Kudal—and the Home Ministry—argue that the commission is exposing the designs of CIA-backed foreign agencies so the commission's continuance is necessary in the national interest but voluntary agencies say the commission is politically motivated.

NGA-backed organisations to use the voluntary agencies to provide sensitive information on border areas.

However, this concern with national security is hardly reflected in the 118 cases concluded. The maximum number—47—relate to misutilisation or misappropriation of funds given, in many cases, not by foreign agencies but by government institutions.

About a dozen-odd cases pinpoint alleged acts of personal corruption by office-bearers. One of these cases pertains to Rs 10,000 allegedly embezzled by the GPF's Bhagalpur centre for the purchase of lanterns and petromax lamps—which is one of the nine cases registered by the CBI. Even the other eight cases with the CBI mostly involve cases of minor corruption: like the granting of a personal loan of Rs 45,000 to an AVARD office-bearer, or money-lending by employees of the Gandhi Memorial Museum, Madurai.

The only case supposedly involving interests of national security which has been completed pertains to a map of the Ganga-Brahmaputra basin given by noted journalist B.G. Verghese, then associated with the GPF, in his 1977 Coromandel lecture. The commission has accused him of committing a breach of security by publishing two maps without informing the Surveyor General of India. But Verghese contends that the maps were "of no larger scale than what is freely available in common school atlases and Survey of India wall maps".

Even the other map cases currently being investigated hardly prove any major wrong-doing. One of these refers to maps of Kohima and Changtangia blocks of Nagaland prepared by AVARD and the Nagaland Gandhi Ashram (NGA). The commission has accused AVARD of violating the Official Secrets Act, but AVARD's Sen argues that the maps were copied from census reports which are freely available. Says Sen: "We challenge the Government to file a case against us."

SIMILARLY, even where the commission has found the agencies guilty, the agencies say that either their defence has been unfairly dismissed by the commission or the commission has taken a hyper-technical view of a minor infringement.

Says an indignant Bunker Roy, adviser to the Planning Commission on voluntary agencies: "Why does Kudal have to be an investigator, judge, income-tax officer and spy catcher all in one?"

The most tragic victims of the Kudal Commission have been the 946 smaller agencies the commission identified as "closely-connected" to the four main ones. A notice from the commission can turn the bureaucracy against it, as in the case of the NGA, a sterling institution built by a Gandhian from Gujarat, Natwar Thakkar, who went there in the '50s when the Nagas were in revolt. Thakkar's good work has been vouched for by a host of senior government functionaries, including ex-governor L.P. Singh and Manmohan Singh, deputy chairman of the Planning Commission. But, after the notice, the ashram has stopped getting government funds.

Further, according to secret circulars issued by the Government, semi-government agencies such as the Central Social Welfare Board and the People's Action for Development India (PADI) have been directed not to have any dealings with agencies found guilty by the Kudal Commission in its first two reports. Admitted a senior PADI official: "The Kudal Commission has created a scare psychosis in the voluntary sector."

Even the four major agencies have been badly crippled by the commission. They have already spent over Rs 10 lakh in legal expenses. The hardest hit is AVARD: two-thirds of its 450-odd affiliates have stopped paying their subscriptions. Admits Sen: "The Kudal Commission has brought our activities to a virtual standstill."

The Government is under increasing pressure to deny any more extensions to the commission. Nine Padma Shree recipients, including Ela Bhatt, Mahashweta Devi and Chandi Prasad Bhatt, have jointly appealed to Rajiv Gandhi to wind it up. Uninvolved people working in voluntary agencies, like Bunker Roy, argue that even if these institutions are guilty of neglecting their charter and entering into the political field with JP, the continuance of the commission defeats the Government's intention of involving voluntary agencies in rural development.

Says Sasmita Srivastava, chairman of the Central Social Welfare Board: "We need to look to an era of cooperation in the future, not fight old battles of two political personalities."

The commission now has till January to come up with cases where national security has been compromised. If it does, it will have served some purpose. If, as is likely, it only ends up chasing shadows it will be difficult to describe it as anything but a witch-hunt.

DOORDARSHAN

Good-morning India

DOORDARSHAN is all set to be an early bird. In about two weeks' time, Doordarshan will be saying Good Morning India at 7 a.m. Visual: the orange glow of sunrise over a different city's skyline every morning. Sound: Vande Mataram. Breakfast television or in Doordarshan's stodgy phrase, "morning transmission"—is finally set to make it to India. The alarm has been set for October 12, but the mandarins of Doordarshan have not yet committed themselves. Producers, though, have been told to be ready by this date, and not to be caught napping.

The menu for the hour-long, nationwide breakfast is rather heavy and more starch than protein. And cultural indigestion cannot be ruled out. Forty-five seconds of Vande Mataram and the varying sunrise sequences will be followed by four minutes of Suprabhat, music which you can see as well as hear. The "invocation of the morning"—as Mandi House states in its circular to film makers on September 4—will "incorporate the essential spirit of the dawning of a new day in different parts of the country."

Three producers have already invocated the morning: Mike Pandey of Riverbank Studio, Sadhan Malik, a former director of Delhi Doordarshan Kendra, and Mudra Videotec. The morning raga (Carnatic or Hindustani) or bhajans will be interpreted by (among others) Amjad Ali Khan, Bhimsen Joshi and Hariprasad Chaurasia. These ragas will be accompanied by, as Mike Pandey says, "the chirping of birds, the waking up of flowers, and nature slowly coming alive". The raga can carry you to the Rohtang pass, as it does on the strains of Amjad's sarod with the smoke wafting slowly from the cottage in the foreground and the gurgling streams below, or to the many-storeyed temples of the south.

The appetisers are followed by the main dish: 10 minutes of the news in Hindi, not such an easy swallow for those outside the Hindi belt. If that brings back the yawns, the quarter of an hour of exercises and aerobics that are to follow will get you ticking again. Independent Television (ITV) will have people on their toes four times a week with exercises from the Heart Foundation. For those who want to be more than fit, there will be aerobics twice a week, conducted by NRI Veena Merchant. The director is Gulan Kripalani from Bombay. Aerobics without supervision can do strange things to the body, but ITV's Ashok Raina is confident about not pulling the wrong muscles: "These will be the warmup kind, not a la Jane Fonda." Not even a la our very own Rekha. On Sundays, Doordarshan itself will step in with yoga.

Next comes food for the mind. Mondays and Fridays have PTI television for 15 minutes. Monday morning has the economic magazine with a hard economic story, a business story and an international story. Fridays take you to the villages. Says Sashi Kumar, chief producer of PTI Television: "It will not be an exotic, quaint approach with sunrises and colourful villages, we want to study the process of rural development..."

How can there be breakfast without serials, and corny ones at that? The Doordarshan circular prescribes "wit, humour and satire" for 15 minutes a day. Delhi-based producer Vijay Sharma will do Film Nagar (Mandi House gossip has it that Sharma is trying to get Basu Chatterjee of Rajani fame to direct). Chalte Chalte is the other serial already on its way to Doordarshan. B.M. Shah, acting director of the National School of Drama, and Shobha Doctor (who started dinner television with Hum Log) are also slotted.

The chef's speciality, the in-house one that is, will include Doordarshan's staple fare. There is a category called Bharati which, as the circular goes, "is a series of programmes designed to project various historical, cultural and social perspectives of Indian life and values and individ[illegible] places of interest". In this list are "[illegible] and fauna of India, monuments of Ind[illegible] places of tourist interest, our herit[illegible] Hamare Vadya Yantra (musical instr[illegible] ments) and folk dances" to be recorded [illegible] "natural surroundings".

The menu will be peppered with pe[illegible] ple: A Face in the Crowd by S. Malik ("b[illegible] round persons who look very common [illegible] have achieved distinction in vari[illegible] fields..."). Times Television will do [illegible] personality a week. Political personali[illegible] are not taboo, but not exactly welcom[illegible] The anchormen will probably be celeb[illegible] ties as well. Says Gautam Adhikari, ch[illegible] executive of Times TV: "We would like t[illegible] interview to be in the form of [illegible] conversation...We might also have a st[illegible] dio audience asking questions."

There will be no sponsored pr[illegible] grammes, just three minutes of advert[illegible] ing spots divided into slots of one minu[illegible] each. Doordarshan's contract with th[illegible] producers ensures that all the rights [illegible] with it. Some of the producers are not t[illegible] happy with the price of purchase, whic[illegible] varies from Rs 20,000 per programme [illegible] about Rs 70,000. But breakfast is after a[illegible] a low-cost meal.

Will the early bird catch the worm[illegible] Most advertisers are in a wait-and-wat[illegible] mood. For the proverbial man in th[illegible] street, that one hour in the morning [illegible] already surcharged. Will the man of th[illegible] house look up from his newspapers? W[illegible] the lady of the house have the tim[illegible] between sending children to school a[illegible] husband to office?

Breakfast television might of cour[illegible] surprise everybody and become a habit [illegible] has in England and the United States. S[illegible] will morning become Doordarshan?

KERALA

Plugging Pulp

THREE pages of mush, four of sex, five of real life drama and crime, one of kid stuff, one lonely hearts col-, one 'the doctor replies'. Stir well and do you get? The Malayalam Molotov cocktail. Over the past few months, bookstands in Kerala have been hit by a magazine boom that has few parallels in the country. Relying heavily on this sure-shot cocktail, a plethora of Malayalam magazines—described as painkili (pulp)—are taking the state by storm.

One of these, Mangalam, is not only the largest selling weekly in the country with an audited circulation of an unbelievable 14,44,974, has already left the Malayala Manorama—long the unrivalled number one seller—trailing far behind at 1,39,159. Sunanda has just hit the 1.70 lakh mark with its 4th issue. In 1980, there were only six such magazines. Today, there are 15—and more in the pipeline—almost all of them published from Kottayam. Says A.S. Nair, who has been involved with three such magazines, Mangalam, Sakhi and Sunanda: "Painkili publications are the biggest industry in Kottayam."

The success of the painkili magazines is attributed to their serials that are avidly followed by a largely undistinguished audience of housewives, idle office-goers and semi-literate readers. From the titles—These Eyes, Wet Eyes; The Small Boat in the Ocean Waves and The Colour of Blood is Red—to the contents, the serials are either imitation Mills and Boon or Chase-like whodunits. For variety there is real life drama. Recently, when a housewife committed suicide, she left behind her tear-jerking autobiography for Mangalam. The magazine had a windfall as its readers lapped up the soppy episode of her martyred life. Then there are the occasional gimmicks like the mass marriages organised by Mangalam. Other magazines give away sewing machines and pressure cookers as prizes in various contests. Mangalam has now started building houses for its "poorest of the poor readers". No wonder then that a single copy of Mangalam is read by eight people—a readership amounting to almost half the state's total population.

There is a lot else that's common to all painkili publications. They are all low-priced, mostly black and white and carry little or no ads at all, thus exploding the myth of advertisement support.

Malayalam magazines: booming

Mangalam's owner-publisher Mangalapalli Chacko Varghese, who began as a packer in Kerala's oldest newspaper, Deepika, started the weekly in 1971, brought in A.S. Nair, then a proof-reader in the number two Manorajyam (circulation: 2,60,000) and the duo elbowed Malayala Manorama out of its top slot.

It was Nair again who, on leaving Mangalam in 1982, took over Sakhi, then an ailing porno magazine, and gave it a sex change. Early this year, he started Sunanda—an instant hit— thus proving the efficacy of the painkili prescription.

Inspired by the success of Varghese, Nair and others, many rich planters and financiers have diversified into pulp magazines. Though Varghese is reluctant to talk about his profits from Mangalam, he is obviously raking it in. The production cost of the magazine—priced at Re 1—is 70 paise per copy and it is sold to agents at 75 paise, bringing in 5 paise for Varghese on each copy of the over 14-lakh print order every week. This, when the magazine refuses ads except for the title pages. Says Varghese: "My revenue from ads is limited. It is only through mass circulation that we break even."

Predictably, the growing demand has thrown up a whole new generation of pulp writers. A painkili writer is paid between Rs 250 and Rs 400 for each weekly episode and if the serial becomes popular, it is snapped up by film producers. The lodges and hotels of Kottayam are overflowing with such writers, who churn out mush by the magazine-full. Among them is Jonson Pulikunnu, a government employee who is writing for seven different publications, and C. Joy, who was just another jobless youth till he found this golden goose.

But there are also growing rumbles of protest. Of late, there has been a vociferous campaign against painkili literature, spearheaded by the students wing of the Marxist party and the Kerala Sastra Sahitya Parishad (KSSP). Noted Malayalam critic Professor Krishnan Nair has charged that the growth of pulp literature has increased the number of suicides in the state. Varghese, however, attributes all this criticism to jealousy. "These press barons cannot stomach my success. The circulation of intellectual magazines in the state is not even one-tenth of the circulation of Mangalam."

This remains a fact. Inspired by the success of Mangalam, more and more magazines are joining the bandwagon with the dictum: the spicier the magazine, the bigger its success. And for as long as they keep supplying the spice, the readers will keep getting their weekly fix of fancy.

PUPUL JAYAKAR

"Culture is not entertainment"

Pupul Jayakar has been variously described as the high priestess of culture and grande old dame of letters. Last month she took over as the prime minister's adviser on heritage and cultural resources, stopping speculation about her being shunted from the main line of culture. She was in the news after reports about the damage to th priceless Didarganj Yakshi. In the splendour of her man urned house on Safdarjang Road, she spoke to Princip Correspondent MADHU JAIN about her new assignmen her life, and about culture. Excerpts from the intervie

RAGHU RAI

Q. The Didarganj Yakshi and you are in the news again. Would you like to comment on newspaper reports about the crack in the priceless Yakshi?

A. The Yakshi went to the National Gallery in Washington in April last year. It was packed by the National Museum. The man from the museum accompanied the Yakshi. He was there throughout. The Yakshi came back last July; and the man from the museum unpacked it. The first time I heard about anything going wrong was in the Times of India. No report was given to the Government. It was on display in the National Museum for the last nine months or so. I asked the Director-General of the Archaeological Survey if he had any information about this. He said he had no knowledge. Dr Sihare (of the National Museum) never called me; no letter was sent to my office.

Q. Aren't such masterpieces supposed to be certified when they are returned?

A. The National Museum took it over; this is usually done by the Archaeological Survey. The Yakshi has been out three or four times. The year before it went to Japan.

Q. The news of the damage to the Yakshi came almost along with your appointment as cultural adviser to the prime minister. Is there any connection?

A. You mean is it an attack on Mrs Jayakar? I don't want to come into this. But I would like to state that neither the Festival of India office here or the Festival of India office in Washington nor our embassy in the United States received any official intimation about the damage to the Yakshi.

Q. India has never had a cultural adviser to the prime minister before. How do you see your new job?

A. I will not be doing very different things from what I was already doing. They will send me more papers and I will initiate more things.

Q. Why the sudden need for a cultural adviser?

A. Probably the prime minister likes being supported by an adviser. Culture is ry important to him. He considers the breakdown of the fabric of society to have occurred because of a breakdown of the force of values. Culture is not entertainment, as it has become. Culture is a mind of the mind.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Q. How is Rajiv Gandhi different from Indira Gandhi as far as culture goes?

A. His mother was intensely interested and directly involved. We used to have long discussions about the outer manifestations of culture and the inner process culture.

Q. And the son?

A. The son has inherited this interest but does not have as much knowledge as his mother, but the concern is the same.

Q. How do festivals help? Are not roti, kapda and makaan what people are asking for?

A. Yes, but below this there are other things. India is asking the question; the world is deliberating on humanity vs material technology. But in India we may have of a strong current of interiority to explore the answer.

Q. Yes, but how have the festivals helped the ordinary Indian?

A. Nearly 1,000 villagers went abroad and earned money. Moreover 95 per cent of the money spent by India was spent here. We sent 1,000 artisans and I can't tell you with what dignity they behaved.

Q. But didn't many of these people who had never seen a town, let alone Paris and New York, have a problem of adjustment when they returned?

A. You know what the two bards sang at the Eiffel Tower after the inauguration of the tower: "Come my beloved, the festival is over. After all, it is fantasy. Let us go back to that which is ours."

Q. What is the role of culture in rural development?

A. Culture is the hinterland of the mind. If you permit the mind to become artificial, if it becomes concerned only with the material, it becomes very brittle. What sustains villages are the seasonal rituals which go with the cycles of life and traditions. There is so much feeling for the earth in India. The tree is worshipped. This might be looked upon as primitive but it is important in the ecological context. There are groves round the villages. Destroy the myth and the grove is also destroyed.

Q. To return to the subject of your new office: will you get a new office?

A. I never function like others. I never move. I function from my own milieu. And therefore to enter a different landscape of politics, its paraphernalia and all the hierarchies is not for me.

Q. You will be more directly involved with the Government. This means that the officials will have to move.

A. They don't have to move. Work has to be done, it is not important where you do it. I have a certain culture of work. I have my own discipline of work.

Q. Such as?

A. I believe in a very frugal staffing pattern. I have a tight time schedule. For some years my life has had one mainstream: the interior of myself.

> "I never function like others. I never move. I function from my own milieu. And therefore to enter a different landscape of politics, its paraphernalia and all the hierarchies is not for me."

Q. It is being said that you are not interested in the USSR festival because the proletariat is not your cup of tea.

A. For the last six months the newspapers have been saying a lot about me—that I am a czarina of culture, that I am authoritarian, that I waste a lot of money. Perhaps this is so because I don't go out very much. But I am not very interested in this kind of talk. If I am attacked, I don't speak out. All this is not true but I can't do anything about it. Can I go round saying that I am not authoritarian?

Q. It is also being said that you were lying low but have made a come-back.

A. It was the ending of the festival. What was I supposed to have been doing? I was busy doing a book and seeing that the festival was properly documented. I have spent my whole life working and I have always been lying low.

Q. And the question of not being interested in the proletariat.

A. I have been to the USSR three times. I have done a fashion show there. I am most interested in the Soviet Union. I have had five years of festivals, I am exhausted.

Q. Festivals are celebrations. Have we in India much to be happy about?

A. Let us talk about the birth of these festivals. When Mrs Gandhi became prime minister, she asked me to take over the chairmanship. We decided that rather than present an image of the country as a fragment, which leaves nothing behind, a festival would be better. It would be the same as a public relations exercise to change our image in a country. And in terms of public relations expenses this is peanut money. People abroad only hear about Indians being butchered and dowry burning or caste problems. But there is another side of India, a side which is intellectually alive, inwardly alive. It is not a question of India rejoicing over anything. The exercise was to make India a little more than a mark on the globe...India was in the limelight for 18 months. According to the Ministry of External Affairs, the media coverage of the festivals abroad in money terms was over $2 billion.

Q. You have said that you are on an inward journey. Your deep interest in Krishnamurty and philosophy are also well-known. But you also have a remarkable understanding of commerce. How do you reconcile the two traits?

A. I can do anything as long as it is not meant for myself. If I had to do business for myself I would make a mess of it.

Q. Does being a Gujarati have anything to do with your abilities? The Gujaratis have also mastered the art of making money and management.

A. Gujaratis are very precise when it comes to dealing with a problem. Be it business or art I can't make money for myself, but I could for the country. I understand what it is to create wealth, yes, possibly because I am a Gujarati.

Q. What are going to be your priorities as cultural adviser?

A. I believe in conservation. There are so many museums, libraries, archives which need a great deal of support, and we still keep on building new institutes. Photography needs to be treated more as an art. There ought to be closer links between education and culture.

Q. What is the role of culture for rural and urban unemployed youth?

A. Let me look as a Gujarati. We don't look widely to see the avenues of employment. Nobody wants to become a plumber, electrician, foreman. Ask anyone in a village, his ideal is to be a chaprasi.

Q. What kind of avenues of employment were you referring to?

A. Health foods for example. I have been talking about this for years. It is a multi-million dollar industry in the US. Every woman in a village here knows how to use a chakki and grind wheat or rice. Abroad wild rice costs $12 to $15 a pound. My ayah tells me that it grows wild in her village where they feed it to the cattle. There has to be some thinking outside the realm of convention.

ORDINANCES

In the Balance

THREE years ago, D.C. Wadhwa of Pune's Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics was the focus of nationwide attention: his book on the re-promulgation of ordinances in Bihar created a media sensation, lavish praise was heaped on it by eminent constitutional law expert H.M. Seervai and the issues it raised led to an opposition walk-out in the Rajya Sabha. But two years and eight months after the Supreme Court admitted his writ seeking a stop to the practice of re-promulgating ordinances, the highest court in the land oddly cannot find the time to hear the case.

Wadhwa's foray into what was for him an unknown field—law—was an accident. While studying agrarian legislation in Bihar he realised that certain ordinances had been in effect for years. Intrigued, Wadhwa began the investigation that took the lid off a major scandal.

While Article 213 of the Constitution empowers the governor to promulgate an ordinance if the state Assembly is not in session, it also says that the ordinance will lapse if it is not passed as an act within six weeks of the Assembly meeting. Since the Assembly has to meet within six months of its last session, in effect, the life of an ordinance is restricted to seven-and-a-half months. Indeed, the Constituent Assembly debates make it clear that the promulgation powers were expected to be used sparingly, only in an emergency.

Wadhwa found the situation in Bihar to be appallingly different. Ordinances were not put up for the scrutiny of the house at all, but were re-promulgated just before they were about to expire. The fact that the Assembly always met for less than six weeks was, of course, part of the plan.

So the Bihar Sugarcane (Regulation of Supply and Purchase) Ordinance, for instance, was in effect for more than 13 years instead of seven-and-a-half months. In all, 256 ordinances were thus misused between 1967 and 1981, and in 69 cases even the President's consent was obtained. As Wadhwa argued, the constant re-promulgation was a flagrant misuse of the governor's powers and a deliberate attempt to bypass the state Assembly, which alone has the power to make laws.

Wadhwa's book, Re-promulgation of ordinances: a fraud on the Constitution of India, was an eye-opener. And on January 16, 1984, he filed his writ in the Supreme Court. Replies were filed by the Bihar and Union governments in mid-1984, and the matter was listed as the eighth case to be heard by the court in August 1984. But after that, instead of going up in priority in the weekly list of cases to be heard, the Wadhwa case actually started sliding down: in end-September 1984, it was placed 41st! Worse, for several weeks in 1985, it did not even appear on the weekly list of the Supreme Court.

Wadhwa's writ petition against the re-promulgation of ordinances has been hanging fire in the Supreme Court for 32 months even as more states follow this practice.

HARI OM GULATI

On July 29, 1985, a bench consisting of Chief Justice P.N. Bhagwati and Justice A.N. Sen directed that the case be the first one to be taken up after the formation of the constitution bench. In spite of this, today 14 months later, the case is yet to be heard.

Meanwhile the re-promulgation disease is spreading. While Bihar has merrily continued, Uttar Pradesh joined the bandwagon, and re-promulgation took place five times in Gujarat last year. In Kerala, the practice has now become a regular feature: currently, there are about 30 ordinances re-promulgated continuously over the last few years.

The judicial situation itself remains contradictory. The Patna High Court in the 1970s, while condemning the practice, judged that action lay with the Assembly and not with itself to curb it. But in neighbouring Uttar Pradesh, the Lucknow bench of the high court on April 6, 1984, ruled against this practice, saying that the Patna High Court had "taken an unduly restricted view of the scope of judicial scrutiny in regard to the power of the governor". In Kerala, Speaker V.M. Sudheeran has bitterly criticised the Government for its ordinance raj. And in Andhra Pradesh, in early 1985, a constitutional crisis developed when the then governor S. D. Sharma refused to re-promulgate three ordinances. Clearly, there is enormous confusion which only the Supreme Court can clear. Ironically, in a 1982 judgement, the Supreme Court had sarcastically commented on the Bihar practice. Says Wadhwa: "I am learning a lot. I thought the whole issue would be settled within six months. But it is satisfying to be involved in getting such an important issue settled."

The case is particularly crucial because it could also decide how far the courts can intervene in questioning the 'satisfaction' of the President or a governor. For if the eventual judgement goes far enough, it could mean that the next time President's Rule is declared, that decision too could be challenged. The judgement, if and when it comes, could well alter the face of Indian politics.

Indira Gandhi Airport then and now: missing name

◆ It was the tie to break all ties. It left the crowds reeling, sent Allan Border into a sulk and made Kapil Dev want to run amok on Marina Beach. As the first Test against Australia came to a nail-biting end in Madras last fortnight, India captain Kapil Dev mumbled awestruck: "It has never happened before, it has never happened before..." It had—at another place, another time; but Kapil was probably in dispers then. It was at the Australia vs West Indies in Brisbane in 1960. But history is for the books. While Border sulked that he'd rather win than create history, the Haryana hurricane wanted to run screaming on Marina Beach till he got over it. Perhaps the only consolation was: "Cricket da bhi jawab nahin!"

PRADEEP MANDHANI

◆ The film industry has always been a Kala Dhanda of Goray Log, and the Khan-dons seem to be its living proof. Last fortnight, the proof took the shape of a glass of whiskey which shot out at a party from Sanjay Khan's hefty hand, cut a deep gash in Rishi Kapoor's cheek and very nearly mutilated his lollipop looks—and career—for good. The provocation: a compliment from Rishi to Sanjay on his Kala Dhanda..."It was an ugly incident. I won't like to meet him again," said the first victim of the Pathan passion. The second, Feroz Khan's wife Sundari, swore hell-fire and brimstone in Stardust at "his latest woman"—Jyotika Dhanrajgir, a former air hostess. "He likes to have a bitch on leash all the time and he has one now," Sundari spat. And Dhanrajgir sued—the magazine, editor, printing press and wife—demanding an apology, seizure of the issue and Rs 50 lakh in damages. Who's the victim now? Only God, or the Bombay High Court knows.

◆ Missing : Indira Gandhi's name from the facade of Indira Gandhi International Airport. One day last fortnight, it just vanished. It happened when Rajiv Gandhi went there to receive Zambian premier Kebby Musokotawane. The case of the missing name started a guessing game. Had the prime minister lost his cool over its shoddy state and ordered a face-lift? Or did he not want his mother's name on shabbiness? The official answer: Minister of State for Civil Aviation Jagdish Tytler had already ordered repairs of the cracked facade. But the guessing game is still on.

Lapierre: city of hope

Dominique Lapierre, the author of the international chart-buster on Calcutta, has just pledged half of the book's royalties to the city's have-nots. As part of an Action Aid package, Lapierre will send to some of the city's private clinics, rehabilitation homes and health care centres, an annual sum of Rs 40 lakh for the next few years. The pop historian-turned-humanitarian writer has already sent Rs 50 lakh since 1980 to a home for lepers' children. "During our two years of research in the slums of Calcutta, we never asked for anything. We were only given. This is only a reciprocation," says the writer. "Calcutta is a homage to life. And we'll always devote a share of our lives to this city. Now, is Calcutta dying?"

How Safe is the PM?

The attempt to assassinate the prime minister exposed the chinks in his security armour. More than anything, it showed up the security establishment as being overstrained, poorly motivated, badly organised and lacking in unified command.

P.T. Usha was the unquestioned queen of the track at the Asian Games and single-handedly saved India from ignominy after the country had sent a record 400-strong contingent to the games. Drastic steps are needed if India is to do better at Beijing in 1990.

SAVING GRACE

The Seoul Asiad has, beyond a doubt, overshadowed all previous Asiads ("Record Breaking Games", October 15). The organisation was stupendous and records were shattered with incredible ease. But the Indians performed very poorly. But for P.T. Usha, the Indian performance would have been reduced to absurdity.

Bangalore K. CHIDANAND KUMAR

■ Kudos for presenting us with a delightful pictorial fiesta of the 10th Asian Games, along with all the relevant details. While we are really sad that Indian sportsmen did not perform as expected, at least INDIA TODAY did.

Pune REKHA CHIMKOD

■ Hats off to P.T. Usha, the country's track star for snatching away four gold medals and one silver in the Asiad. Her name has become synonymous with India in Seoul. For sheer modesty and unpretentious style of play also it is impossible for anyone to beat her.

Ahmedabad D.V. CHANDRASHEKHAR

■ "The gold-hunt is over." "The performance of our team was much lower than the expectations of the players and the people." I do not agree with such unhealthy remarks being hurled at the Indian participants in the 10th Asian Games. If anyone is to be blamed, it is the innumerable government bodies responsible for politicising the sports arena and making prejudiced selections.

Patna Saheb JITENDER SINGH BHASIN

UNEQUAL RIGHTS

In a country where equal rights and opportunities have been ensured for all in the Constitution, the kind of favouritism seen in the Maruti allotments ("Favoured Few", October 15) is an open attack on democratic rights. If the judges, politicians and bureaucrats who are supposed to uphold the sanctity of law themselves violate it in order to maintain their own interests, can we ever think that the Government's much-vaunted efforts to root out corruption and favouritism will succeed?

New Delhi JAIDEEP MITTRA

NEEDLESS ANGUISH

The presence of my name in the list of judges of high courts ("Favoured Few", October 15) has caused me needless embarrassment and anguish. On April 23, 1983, I booked for allotment of a Maruti car in the normal course by making an advance deposit of Rs 10,000. My turn through drawing of lots is at number 02-A-02729 as per the intimation slip sent by the company.

I was surprised to receive a letter from the company dated July 24, 1986, intimating that as per my request (which was never made), a vehicle had been allotted to me out of the manufacturer's quota. Although I do not have an official car, I never requested the company for an out of turn allotment and never intended 'to jump the customer's queue' to accept the allotment. In fact I promptly wrote to the company declining to accept the favour of an out-of-turn allotment and I continue to wait for my turn in the ordinary course.

New Delhi S.A. HAKEEM

The list of names we used appears in Maruti Udyog's records. We regret the embarrassment caused to Mr Hakeem.

PETTY GAINS

Your editorial ("Dodging the Issue", October 15) is an eye-opener to those who are out to make narrow political gains from the Gorkhaland agitation. Our esteemed prime minister has displayed astonishing ignorance of the real issues for which this agitation has been started by the hitherto unknown Subhash Ghising. The short-term gain of embarrassing the Left Front Government has made Rajiv Gandhi oblivious to the long-term effect of pampering the Gorkha National Liberation Front. As the leader of our country, he should display statesmanship, not brinkmanship, as he has done so far.

HUMANE NEED

Your photo feature ("The World of a Blind Man", October 15) was captivating. In India, handicapped people are not only subjected to immense problems in life but are often hurt by the attitude of normal beings. It is an eye-opener that what the blind need is not sympathy but simply treatment as normal humans.

Bangalore — MIDALATA RANI

VESTED INTERESTS

B.K. Nehru's guest column ("The Politics of Reservation", October 15) rightly asserts that our reservation policies need to be restructured to be more effective. The fact is that after two generations of reservations a new Scheduled Caste and Scheduled Tribe elite has emerged. This "backward elite" has a vested interest in letting the real "backwards" remain backward.

Bangalore — K.K. BANERJEE

UNINTENDED PORTRAYAL

I was shocked to find a reference in your article to the effect that I am a lobbyist for certain hotel chains and the Tatas. ("The Hidden Persuaders", September 15). I find such description of a professional person as highly derogatory and defamatory. My association with the hotel industry has dated back to 1968 and I have since then specialised in the laws pertaining to the hotel and restaurant industry. I have been legal adviser to the Oberoi group of hotels and the Taj group of hotels. I have also been advising the Federation of Hotels and Restaurant Association of India. I have never tried to procure any favours from the Government for any of my clients including the hotel chains. Insofar as your reference to Tatas is concerned, I have no connection with them except that I am the legal adviser of the Indian Hotels Company (Taj group of hotels) which is one of the Tata companies.

Fair play demands that before any comments are made which may tend to give a poor impression about a person against whom the comments are made, the person concerned should be asked to give his side of the story.

It is an admitted and well-known position that I am an active Congress worker and I am proud of that. I believe that every intellectual should have political leanings and affiliations so that the right person should enter politics. However, my connections with the ruling party would not justify the remark that I am a lobbyist.

New Delhi — LALIT BHASIN

Our reference to Lalit Bhasin as a "lobbyist" who is politically active and "sought after" by the major hotel chains including the Tatas, was in no way intended to be a slur on him, his integrity or reputation. There is little doubt about the high professional regard in which he is held. We did not in any way attempt to condemn his political activism.

DELAYED TRIAL

Had the Pakistani authorities not bungled ("Pakistan's Bloody Blunder", September 30) perhaps the loss of precious lives could have been avoided. It is true that Pakistan has delayed the trial of past hijackers caught there. But how prompt are we in the matter of dispensation of justice? Are we still not dragging our feet in the Indira Gandhi case, although the murder took place almost two years ago?

Bombay — P.G. MENON

■ The delayed assurance by President Zia that the hijackers will be hanged 'if found guilty' is nothing but eyewash. Having been caught red-handed, where is the need to prove that the hijackers are guilty or not?

Bombay — C.V. UNNIKRISHANAN

IMPOLITIC MOVE

I fully agree with Darbara Singh that the passing of the All India Gurudwara Act will be a dangerous move in the present critical juncture ("Dangerous Proposal", September 30). The mixing of politics with religion in Punjab has already spoiled the sanctity of the holy takhts. In the larger interest of Hindu-Sikh unity, which was the main purpose of the Punjab accord, it will be suicidal to pass the All India Gurudwara Act for any smaller cause.

Patna Saheb — MAJOR BALBIR SINGH

STRONG DENIAL

With reference to your article ("Terrorists: The Political Nexus", September 30) I would like to specifically deny links with alleged terrorists. I never made any recommendation to the police or anybody in the administration about any suspect whatsoever.

New Delhi — BHAI SHAMINDER SINGH

TALL CLAIMS

Your meticulously written ONGC story ("The Oil Mirage", September 30) made it clear to me that the high production rates, indigenisation and huge profits that ONGC boasts of are just due to their good luck, or are a gift of god! They are instead responsible for making the country dependent on imported oil and technology.

Bombay — POONAM VARMA

■ Your article is totally misleading. It is a known fact that oil exploration is a chancy game whose end-results cannot be guaranteed. Instead of giving due credit to our geo-scientists for their relentless efforts which resulted in the discovery of various hydrocarbon bearing structures including Bombay High, which saved our country from financial doom at a time when global oil prices were at a peak, the article has tried to hurt them.

Our geo-scientists have established the presence of hydrocarbons in areas like Kutch, Saurashtra, Cauvery etc. even where multinationals have failed.

Bombay — NIRMAL KUMAR
secretary, Association of Scientific and Technical Officers, ONGC

CLEAR ACCOUNTING

With reference to your article ("Dressing Up the Figures", August 31) we have been following the sum of digits method of accounting from the inception of the business because it clearly reflects the income that has been accrued. Several banks and financial institutions are following a similar method of accounting. If this method is not followed it may be disputed by tax authorities on the ground that there is understatement of lease rentals.

Bombay — H.D. MEHTA
director, Mazda Industries and Leasing Ltd

MISTAKEN IDENTITY

With reference to your article ("Travel Fraud: Passport to Easy Money", July 31) the Union Bank of India is in no way concerned with the travel fraud and no official of our bank has ever been arrested on this issue. Moreover, we have no branch at Jan Path as stated in the said article.

New Delhi — Manager, Union Bank of India

It was another bank that was involved. The error is regretted. —Editor

POLL 5 RESULTS—ART & CULTURE

Divergent Views

IN the fifth opinion poll, INDIA TODAY invited its readers to nominate the person who, in their opinion, most deserved to get the Padma Vibhushan for achievements in art and culture, and to rank seven others in order of preference. Over 12,800 readers responded to the poll. For an independent assessment of the results, INDIA TODAY commissioned Dr V.L.Mote, a founder-professor of the Indian Institute of Management, Ahmedabad, who also holds a doctorate in statistical methods from the State University of North Carolina in the US. His analysis:

THE accent on rapid economic development in India has not meant a neglect of art and culture. This has happened probably because of the Indian view that material and spiritual development are complementary. The 12,800 people who enthusiastically responded to this poll prove this, if such proof were needed. As Dr S. Radhakrishnan pointed out: "True art withdraws our thoughts from the mere machinery of life and lifts our souls above the meanness of it."

Unlike some of the earlier polls, opinions diverged sharply in this one on the top achievers in art and culture, and consensus was at a premium. Perhaps this shows that culture is a subjective matter, and more prone to personal tastes than other areas of human endeavour. This is also a field where analysis and measurement are more difficult than in most other cases. Thus, the 'coefficient of concordance' on an all-India basis is only 0.17 in this poll, as against the one in the case of achievers in business, which was 0.47. In Ahmedabad, the coefficient in the present poll is only 0.09.

Nevertheless, Lata Mangeshkar's clear lead over the other seven achievers in the field of art and culture shows that the love of music transcends all barriers: language, age, sex and class. The lady is almost a national symbol, and has sung songs for every taste: film fans, the spiritually inclined and also those who simply want light entertainment. And, of course, the country has been listening to her since Independence. So even in Tamil Nadu, where she got her lowest score, Mangeshkar got a better rating than R.K.Narayan (for whom Tamil Nadu has proved a strong wicket).

M.F. Husain's coming second is a significant point, especially in the context of the fact that two film personalities (Raj Kapoor and Amitabh Bachchan) rank lower than him as a painter, and also lower than R.K.Narayan as a writer and Bhimsen Joshi as a musician. Husain certainly has appeal as a signboard painter who has impressed the world and made millions, and who is a walking icon, someone who wears his personality on his person—and his flowing white beard.

DESPITE Mangeshkar's close association with the world of Hindi cinema, INDIA TODAY's readers don't seem too enamoured of the celluloid world. Even a classicist like Joshi ranks higher than the film stars, though both of them are living legends. To this extent, this poll reflects an upbeat readership with intimations of culture.

Interestingly enough, R.K.Narayan (who comes in third) does not have a mass readership in India, although he is taught in some university courses. As for Pupul Jayakar and Mrinalini Sarabhai, they are perhaps not as well known because they are essentially organisers of culture.

Nevertheless, the yardsticks that participants have used are universally accepted ones. Does the work of the artiste produce

No more than four readers sent in entries that corresponded exactly with the final national score (compared to 90 all-correct entries in the last poll). To select the three winners, a panel of judges assessed the reasons they had given for ranking Lata Mangeshkar first.

First prize: Murali Vadakkemadhom

Vithalbhai Patel Road,
Mulund-W,
Bombay.

Assessment: "No other artiste has acquired such a diverse following as she has. Her lifelong stint with her vocal chords certainly requires to be acknowledged with the highest awards of the land. She has immortalised music. Shouldn't she be immortalised too?"

freedom? Does the artiste set free the artiste in the audience, and merge his or her consciousness in the subject?

Several participants in the poll made the point that Lata Mangeshkar's songs have helped cross all barriers of class, creed, colour and language. Others have pointed out that she has reached, touched and moved the hearts of so many citizens of India. And in the case of Narayan, one participant observes that without dramatising his characters, he creates stories of unassuming simplicity and purity. As for Bachchan, it is said that he has an amazing intensity and the power to breathe conviction into his role.

Interestingly enough, Bachchan does not seem to have scored very well among the women, who have ranked him last. Even among the young (students), he comes no better than fifth. As for the old (those over 60), they have a preference for Narayan, whom they rank just behind Mangeshkar.

SAMPLES of respondents' comments on the seven candidates other than Lata Mangeshkar give an indication of the reasons why they rate some artistes ahead of others in terms of their contribution to Indian art and culture.

M.F.HUSAIN

The true artist is one who can not only develop but also popularise his unique style. M.F. Husain has no competitor.
New Delhi — Vivek Ram

● This eccentric genius has become a legend in his own lifetime. His masterpieces should not be kept in the living-rooms of some super-rich people but should be preserved in museums for posterity.
Bombay — Prashant Gawandalkar

Chandigarh — Vikas Gupta

R.K. NARAYAN

Bombay — N.D. Dhondy

● Narayan through his writings has for once depicted India without any prejudices. Thus he has earned a real universal readership.

I can flee from the daily tear with the help of the musical 'mantras' composed by him.
Calcutta — Indra Santanu

● He is the topmost classical singer of India and because of his efforts the youth of today are going towards the classical music of India. The taste for western music is declining in our youth today.
Amritsar — Vishal Bhardwaj

● His selfless dedication towards the perfection of his art has contributed immensely to enhancing the rich heritage of our traditional music.

PUPUL JAYAKAR

Pupul Jayakar may not be an artist or musician, but she has done more to put Indian culture on the world map than any other single individual in the country.

CABINET RESHUFFLE

Indecision and Uncertainty

PRIME Minister Rajiv Gandhi may have notched up many plus points in his now nearly two years in office, but cabinet-making is certainly not one of them. He has already had two major and two minor reshuffles of his council of ministers since January last year, but at almost no stage in this period has he had a complete team. At virtually every step, there has been a promise of another reshuffle to relieve ministers burdened with more than one ministry, and to induct new blood. And for the last month, despite all the evidence of yet another shake-up being in the works, the prime minister has been unable either to make up his mind or go through with what he has decided is necessary.

The last major reshuffle was on May 12, and a sequel was on the cards at the end of Parliament's monsoon session in August. A month after that, the President was asked to return to Delhi from Calcutta so that he could swear in new ministers. And now, yet another month later, the promised reshuffle is yet to materialise. Even though there has been a flurry of activity in this area (at least some ministers have been sounded about new portfolios, the prime minister has undertaken reviews of the work done in the ministries, and much paperwork has also been done for reorganising some of them), the uncertainty continues. This can hardly be conducive to proper functioning, for ministers must perennially be on tenterhooks. It also speaks poorly of a prime minister who started out by promising a government that 'works faster'.

AJIT NINAN

Cabinet government cannot work effectively without a proper cabinet. And the need for a reshuffle has never been more evident than now. The experiment of having the same man run the external affairs and commerce ministries clearly has not worked: P. Shiv Shankar is patently overloaded, and commerce needs full-time attention after the last financial year saw a 50 per cent increase in the trade deficit. Similarly, P.V. Narasimha Rao should have his hands full with human resource development and giving effect to the new education policy; yet he was first given additional charge of home affairs, to be replaced later with health and family welfare. Such examples can be multiplied: N.D. Tiwari has been holding additional charge of petroleum ever since Chandrashekhar Singh's death in July, with Sushila Rohatgi also holding additional charge of petroleum as minister of state. Like commerce, petroleum too is not a subject to be treated in this cavalier fashion. For good measure, there is the case of Parliamentary Affairs Minister H.K.L. Bhagat looking after civil supplies as well (after earlier being in charge of tourism as an additional portfolio). But the biggest mess of all is in the Home Ministry, where the plethora of junior ministers and the chopping and changing of the functions of men like Arun Nehru and P. Chidambaram have left everyone confused.

If a reshuffle of the council of ministers is necessary to tidy up this messy picture and to enable attention to be focused where it is due, it is also urgently required because of the sense of drift that has unmistakably set in. Rajiv Gandhi's promise of a change and dramatic improvement in the functioning of government has all but faded, and his political initiatives (on Punjab, Assam and Mizoram, for instance) have not been matched by comparable action within the Government. Some of the ministries have been renamed, others reorganised, but to little apparent effect. Where initiative has been shown on the policy front (as with the new textile and education policy statements), there hasn't been enough follow-up action to register any noticeable change on the ground.

The experiment of giving young ministers direct charge of some ministries under the umbrella of senior cabinet ministers has worked well in some cases (railways), and should logically be followed up with a recognition of work well done. But this has been another casualty of the delayed reshuffle. Meanwhile, at the cabinet level itself, there are too few ministers with a sufficiently creditable record. Finance Minister V.P. Singh is one, but even his future has seemed uncertain in recent weeks. As for the passengers and outright failures in the council of ministers (Urban Development Minister Abdul Ghafoor being one example), Rajiv Gandhi seems to have more patience with them than does him credit.

With a third of his government's term over, the prime minister must ponder over the reasons for the increasing disillusionment that has set in after the high expectations that prevailed through most of 1985. The economy as a whole is functioning no better than before, chronic problems like housing get worse, and the Government has no coherent response to such threats as the resurgence of communalism on an altogether new scale. Indeed, the lack of momentum on several of these fronts has resulted in the total political situation deteriorating into a state of flux. The challenge that now faces Rajiv Gandhi is bigger and more complex than one of getting a proper cabinet into shape. But he cannot even begin to address some of the issues until the right men are in the right places. And, surely, he must make a determined effort now to separate the wheat from the chaff in his council of ministers, to drop the non-performers and reward those who have measured up to the responsibilities given to them. Without an effective and cohesive team, he stands little chance of regaining his earlier initiative, and of rekindling the hopes of change that had marked his first months in office.

Elephantine Debate

● When Energy Minister Vasant Sathe fired a mutli-megaton salvo against the performance of the public sector in the form of a series of newspaper articles, he sparked off what has now become a continuing controversy on basic economic policy within ministerial circles. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, while not coming down squarely on either side of the issue, nonetheless supports a vigorous debate on the country's white elephant. Among the units that the energy minister blasted was the country's nationalised coal industry, which continues to sink deeper and deeper into the red. And now it seems that Sathe is about to receive some more statistical back-up from the Parliamentary Committee on Public Undertakings which has been probing the coal scene since 1984 and is expected to submit its report shortly. A sneak preview reveals that the final report will be devastating. For example, Eastern Coalfields Ltd, Coal India's largest subsidiary, has suffered cumulative losses of more than Rs 600 crore, wiping out its entire paid-up capital. It has not raised productivity or installed any major coal handling plant since 1975, and half-a-dozen major development projects have been abandoned. The committee is also planning to sock it to the fertiliser and food corporations.

The Sonia Touch

● People familiar with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's "inner circle" know that Sonia Gandhi plays a low-key but influential role in the affairs of state. Rajiv is said to trust and admire her judgement, especially about the motivation and loyalty of advisers and politicians. She has played a vital role in the selection of several important candidates both for party tickets as well as for ministerial appointments. But this political side of Sonia remains well-concealed from public view. What is less well hidden is the fact that she also advises her husband on foreign policy and protocol. In fact, Sonia has now established herself as the person who will give the final go-ahead on what gifts will be presented to visiting dignitaries. In fact, senior officials from the Ministry of External Affairs often have to closet themselves with her before an impending state visit from a foreign plenipotentiary to mull over what would be the most suitable gift. Whether the visitor will receive a finely-woven Kashmiri carpet or a crudely-carved marble Taj Mahal—the choice is ultimately Sonia's.

Staying Power

● Over the last several months, before the declaration of President's rule, the Centre received steady complaints from a lobby of Kashmiri politicians about the "high-handedness" of Governor Jagmohan's rule. They griped that Jagmohan's precipitous actions were allegedly "destroying" the local economy and causing much distress to the common people. But Jagmohan has informed the Centre that local politicos were really upset at his vigorous pursuit of cases where the state's revenue had been blocked through judicial stay orders obtained by politicians who had been challenged by tax collectors. In order to give the Centre an idea of the magnitude of blocked revenue to the state, Jagmohan and his officials ordered concerned departments—cooperative, tourism, forest, transport, power development, housing, food and supplies, sales tax, and industries—to furnish details of the cases and amounts involved, including the loss of interest. About Rs 48 crore was blocked in 1,564 cases. The state's advocate general has repeatedly been moving the high court to conduct urgent hearings in many cases. And Jagmohan recently wrote to the President criticising the facility with which stay orders are given in revenue cases in the state. For his pains he has been accused by local politicians of contempt of court. And these politicians are also asking for the removal of tough, no-nonsense Advocate General Muzzaffar Baig.

Doomed Deadlines

● The operation of the government printing press at Mayapuri in Delhi is plagued with irksome delays and insufficiency. Among the victims of this mismanagement is the office of the Comptroller and Auditor General of India (CAG), the watch-dog unit which monitors the functioning of various government departments and briefs Parliament on their performance. All CAG reports are printed at Mayapuri and it often takes as much as a year before they finally come off the press. And by then the information has often become outdated. The last CAG reports sent to the press six months ago have not been printed yet. Suggestions that they be printed at a private press have been turned down on grounds of confidentiality. Also, the Posts Telegraph Department has been howling for years that its money orders take forever to print, and the Education Ministry has been waiting over a decade for the printing of Hindi and Sanskrit dictionaries.

THE MASTER'S VOICE

■ Believe it or not but the Hindi film industry's leading actor for close to a decade was once dismissed as not fit to be a news-reader on All India Radio. "I failed in the audition test for the post," Amitabh Bachchan admitted to an incredulous audience at the 11th annual function of the Radio and Television Practitioners' Association in Bombay. Even as the audience wondered how anyone could summarily reject the unquestionably attractive golden voice, the superstar added: "However, I insisted on earning through my voice and later did radio spots for a livelihood."

The earnings, he told them, were a meagre Rs 50 for a spot—a pittance compared to the lakhs he raked in as a superstar for every film he magnanimously agreed to act in—and were quickly spent on wild nights at local discotheques, boogeying till the wee wee hours of the morning to the Beatles and Paul Anka. But as the star told the august gathering, the strobe lights and the music in the discotheques slowly faded off into reel life. Overnight he was catapulted into super stardom, helped by a voice that could be recognised anytime anywhere. AIR must have often wondered how they goofed up.

MERRY-GO-ROUND

■ Nothing happens in a logical fashion any more. A sub-inspector of police, bent on doing justice to his uniform, rounded up a group of 28 miscreants disturbing a public meeting and marched them to the local jail in Shimoga. En route, our hero even let himself dream of the awards he would receive for exemplary service. Considerably elated, he strode into the jail superintendent's office and told him to put his captives in the clinker. The jail superintendent, for reasons best known to him, refused to oblige. Rattled, our hero persisted, and it was then that things started moving quickly.

A clash of departments must end in an altercation. And the sub-inspector, without support on enemy territory, came out the worse for it. Actually he didn't come out at all, as he was locked up for disturbing the jail's peace.

Only then did the rearguard move in. A phone call and the sub-inspector was released after being detained for two hours. Now it was the jail superintendent who found himself under arrest. And when reports last came in, he was out on bail. What curiouser turn this story will take is anybody's guess.

BOWLED OVER

■ Jails suddenly seem to be the scene of all the action. Last fortnight, two cricketing legends—Sunil Gavaskar and Mohinder Amarnath—decided to spend some time in the capital's Tihar Jail. No, they had not been booked by the long arm of the law; they were there to play an unconventional benefit match. The match organised by former Test cricketer Mansur Ali Khan Pataudi, was held in connection with a reformatory programme run for juvenile delinquents by a couple of jail residents serving a term for espionage.

The teams, except for the star players, were chosen from amongst the young prisoners. Clad in spotless white, the two senior cricketers, hit boundaries and bowled adeptly to the wild cheering of the other inmates who had assembled to witness the match. Thrilled to be in a situation which would be the envy of any hero-worshipping schoolboy, the youngsters batted and streaked after the ball like they had seen others do. The bowlers from the home team even clean-bowled one of the two non-residents four times in successive deliveries. The two were perhaps so overawed by the unscaleable walls and the forbidding sentry posts, that they let things slip.

MISSED MEAL

■ Variety, they say, is the spice of life. But a certain reputed hotel in Secunderabad decided to take this adage to heart and serve sambar garnished with a few full-grown cockroaches in its "vegetarian food only" restaurant. Unfortunately for them, four regular customers settling down to lunch did not appreciate the change.

Recoiling in horror, they trooped into the hotel manager's office and complained, but to no avail. So both rushed to the office of the health inspector. The worthy washed his hands off the matter by directing them to the food and drug controller.

While the foursome ran around in circles, the restaurant continued to ladle out generous helpings of non-vegetarian sambar. But minutes before the food inspector arrived from Hyderabad, a fresh batch was prepared and samples handed over to him. Relieved, the hotel owner said that the customers were trouble-mongers and "it was their mischief". For all that, however, the hotel has been booked: not for the sambar, but for keeping eatables uncovered and not washing utensils properly.

MODVAT

Modified Value Added Trade. A whole new value system created by MMTC. A unique export culture that will more than promote foreign trade—add a new dimension to India's economic prosperity. Enriching the quality of life itself.

MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant new vistas of growth to the small scale sector. Spearheading the export of non-canalised products, MMTC has helped industries to export aluminium conductors, stainless steel cutlery, handicrafts and brassware—all made from imported metals... the export potential unfolded by MMTC is unlimited.

MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant enlarged vision to manufacturers. MMTC has used Counter Trade to put the "export label" on an incredibly wide range of products—sandal soaps, photocopiers, tractors, naphtha, agro-marine products, soyameal, limestone, chemicals, computer software, rice bran extractions and several more.

MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant a sea change for the ports at Vizag, Madras. By helping in deepening and modernising the facilities in these ports, MMTC has increased their capacity many times over.

MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant new employment opportunities to people in economically underdeveloped regions. For example, the proposed deepening of Paradip port would also spur the growth of related facilities including the railway lines. Generating employment for an additional 30,000 people in the mining regions of Orissa and Bihar.

MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant a dazzling future for the diamond industry. Like the setting up of India's first diamond exchange—helping the importers, processors, craftsmen and exporters—to meet under one roof. Boosting export possibilities, preserving a traditional skill and creating employment opportunities.

MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant a new sense of pride and a promise of prosperity to the Indian farmer. MMTC has secured export orders for over 1,50,000 tonnes of wheat—for the first time, foodgrains are being exported to countries like Jordan and Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant a new lease of life to the Kudremukh iron ore project and the Andhra Pradesh Mining Development Corporation for whom it secured export orders through persistent efforts. Thus reviving a total investment of over Rs.700 crore and ensuring continued employment for about 3000 people in both these corporations. Examples of the new value system created by MMTC are endless.

Modified Value Added Trade. A new direction to industrial growth; a new perspective to economic and social prosperity, whose cascading effect is enriching the life of the common man. That's what MODVAT, MMTC style, has meant to the nation.

From essay on "Transition to the New Consciousness"

"This Earth, our mother, has nurtured consciouness from the slime of the primeval ocean billions of years ago, and sustained the human race for countless centuries. Will we repay our debt by converting her into a burnt-out cinder circling the sun into eternity?"

From essay on "Issues in the New Educational Policy"

"The creative reorientation of our Educational System, both its outer structure and its inner spirit, represents one of the most exciting challenges for the remainder of this decade. Indeed we should be able to provide an educational model not only for ourselves but for the entire developing world, which is desperately seeking a new synthesis between the traditional wisdom of the East and the technological progress of the West."

The Man:

From the "Preface" by Kishore Gandhi

"Karan Singh's perception of India extends beyond a geographical landscape to a kingdom of values which a Buddha, a Nanak, a Vivekananda, a Gandhi and a Sri Aurobindo were able to actualise. Such range and refinement is lacking on the contemporary intellectual landscape. He has merged himself completely in the spirit of India, and when he speaks of the India that matters, he is speaking of ageless and timeless insights which have kept the torch of human civilization creatively alive and the process of communication unblocked for several millennia. He believes that the passage to India is really the search for a lost language of wisdom, for a balance between life and soul, never made wholly real, but perhaps never more necessary than now. He firmly holds that India has a meaning and message for the fragmented human race, as she has always strived for humanity and not only for herself."

A selection of some of the finest writings of this great leader and thinker of modern India.

SECURITY

How safe is the P

IT was a day on which the entire country would be familiar with the prime minister's itinerary. A day on which Rajiv Gandhi should have been the most securely-guarded leader in the world. Had Karamjit Singh, the gunman, been armed with an automatic weapon or even a hand grenade instead of a crudely-manufactured katta—a sawed off .12 gauge shot-gun—Rajghat would have witnessed the greatest mass assassination of VIP's in terrorism's violent history. The symbolic sophistication of the time and place of the assassination attempt, and the penetration of the prime minister's elaborate security system by the would-be assassin, were all suggestive of a carefully conceived master plan. Yet the chosen weapon was the crudest imaginable, and didn't fit into the rest of the pattern.

The obvious question was immediately asked by intelligence officials investigating the assassination attempt: had Karamjit Singh's mission been deliberately planned in a manner that it would not succeed? But who would do that and why? Was Karamjit Singh a loner with a disturbed personal background, who simply did not know too much about weaponry, or had others put him up to a job with more complicated game plans in mind? Even as Rajiv Gandhi himself pointed at Pakistan, where people began asking about the assassination attempt24 hours before it occurred, intelligence officials drew alternative scenarios. "The people behind the attempt made their point quite effectively with a loud bang and no blood," one senior official said. "The consequences and the nation-wide retaliation that would have followed an assassination would have been a totally unacceptable risk for the brains behind this plot. It is quite clear that the terrorists, who are under tremendous pressure, are using selective tactics to demonstrate to their followers that the targets on their hit-list have not been forgotten."

The Rajghat incident, officials said, could not be viewed in isolation from the attempt made the very next day on the life of Punjab's Director-General of Police Julio Francis Ribeiro (see box). "Once again," an official said, "the plan was to have maximum impact. Look at where they chose to hit him—not in Chandigarh, not in Amritsar, but in the heart of the Punjab Armed Police compound. Both attempts were clearly aimed at demoralising the bureaucracy and shaking the confidence of the nation in the system." If this were the purpose of the exercise, there is no doubt that it met with ample success as the nation shook its head in disbelief at the grave security lapses at Rajghat, and in Jalandhar.

The curtain went up on the drama at 6.55 a.m. on October 2. Rajiv Gandhi had just arrived at Rajghat and was walking to the Gandhi Samadhi when a sharp sound

KARAMJIT SINGH

"A Quiet Boy"

KARAMJIT Singh, 25, comes from a broken home. His parents are estranged. He tried to make a life for himself by getting an engineering degree, but failed. He suffered another blow when a close friend was murdered during the November riots in Delhi, following Indira Gandhi's assassination. Karamjit and his Sikh friend had gone to a barber's shop to get their hair cut after the riots started; but the mob charged in and killed his friend.

His home town, Sunam, is a nondescript agricultural market town in southern Punjab. Its only claim to fame is that in 1940, Udham Singh, a youth from this town, shot dead Michael O'Dwyer, one-time governor of Punjab, in London, to avenge the Jallianwala Bagh massacre. Statues of Shaheed Udham Singh dot the entrances to the town, and several institutions are named after him.

In fact, not many people in Sunam know Karamjit. Even in the bazaar where his father Amar Singh, 45, runs a small watch and radio repair shop, he is not very well known. "He was a quiet boy who sometimes attended to the shop," recalls a mechanic at the Guru Nanak Engineering Works opposite the shop. "Amar Singh is an honest God-fearing type. But his relations with his wife are strained. He mostly stays back at the shop and eats something around here. The poor fellow loves this son the most," adds Gurcharan Singh, who runs a machine shop close by.

By other accounts, Karamjit had been disowned by his father, and he seems to have been very close to his mother, Dayal Kaur. His parents have had property disputes, and the mother has accused the father of infidelity. His elder brother has a small provisions store but is barely able to manage it because he is mentally retarded. The youngest brother is learning masonry. The mother and her three sons live across Padshahi Pahli Gurudwara, a simple but imposing structure.

Most neighbours are scared to talk to outsiders and only whisper scanty details. The police and CBI had recently raided the shop and the house. "We discovered nothing incriminating and the family has no background to show any terrorist links," local police officials say. "Karamjit was away in Delhi for the past three months. Poor Amar Singh would not know what he was doing there. Karamjit had told him that he had got a job there." Former schoolmates said Karamjit was intelligent and always well-behaved, but his poverty always interfered with his studies. Most of his townsfolk were astonished at the news that he tried to kill the prime minister.

Lal Singh and Amar Singh, arrested by the CBI from Sunam, are Karamjit's maternal uncles. Lal Singh owns a small farm and Amar Singh works as an operator with the Punjab Tubewell Corporation, a state government undertaking. The granthi who was picked up from a gurudwara in Chhehata, an Amritsar industrial suburb, was released by the police as he was found to have no connection with Karamjit. Anyone even casually mentioned by Karamjit during his interrogation is being detained for questioning.

Punjab police officials in Chandigarh have been sending warning signals to Delhi that unknown individuals upset by the events of the past two years are bigger threats than the organised groups of terrorists. But there is no way of identifying such individuals, or of keeping them under surveillance.

was heard. The prime minister's security guards tightened their ring around him in reflex action, but Rajiv kept walking. President Zail Singh came shortly afterwards. Meanwhile, the men of the Special Protection Group (SPG), who were around Rajiv, as well as the Delhi police wondered whether the sound had been that of a scooter engine backfiring. The bullet—a crudely manufactured one-inch diameter ball—had fallen into a flower-bed behind the prime minister. The flower-bed had been repeatedly watered as a security precaution in case a detonator was buried underneath, and the bullet landed in soft mud, leaving a faint trail.

One of the policemen present soon noticed this, and the first surmise was that it might have been caused by a malfunctioning detonator underneath. Trained labradors were immediately brought in and special detonator detectors were also pressed into service. Both drew a blank, but then the bullet itself was found. Even as the prayer service went on, the security guards and the policemen now had no doubt that someone had fired at Rajiv.

FULLY alert to the danger now, the security officials first assumed that since the area immediately around the samadhi had already been security-cleared, the shot must have come from either side or from the rear. Policemen fanned out, checking the hedges and every tree on either side of the entrance (planted over the years by various visiting dignitaries). When this drew a blank, they checked the buildings across the road. Again they found nothing. But the most obvious spot they failed to check was precisely where Karamjit Singh lay waiting for his next opportunity. And the security officials and policemen have no explanation for ignoring the creeper-covered canopy, an obvious hiding spot.

Having drawn a blank, Gautam Kaul, Delhi's additional commissioner of police (security), and SPG Deputy Director M.R. Reddy, huddled to debate whether the prime minister and other VIP's should be taken out of Rajghat from an alternative route. By one account, Reddy was keen that they do so, but Kaul said this meant a longer walk, that traffic arrangements at the other entrance may not be perfect, and that since the area had been fully checked again after the shot, they should stick to the initial route back. The possibility was also discussed that the initial shot may have been fired to decoy the prime minister into taking the alternative route, where other gunmen would be waiting.

It was finally decided that the VIP's would return along the route they had come. And when they did, shortly before 8 a.m., a second shot was heard. Guards ran towards the canopy and the samadhi, guns at the ready. The President and prime minister, meanwhile, were walking arm-in-arm to their waiting cars. Zail Singh heard the shot and asked Rajiv: "Yeh kahan se hamla ho raha hai (where is this attack coming from)?" The prime minister replied almost in jest: "This is the way they greeted me when I came. I suppose this is now their send-off." Rajiv escorted the President into his bullet-proof Mercedes, and then he and Sonia Gandhi turned to get into their own specially-fitted Ambassador when the third shot rang out. The shot went wide, hitting Brijender Singh Mowai, a Congress(I) MLA, and Ram Charan Lal, ex-additional district judge from Bayana in Rajasthan, who were some distance behind the prime minister. Rajiv snapped at Sonia to get into the car and he followed suit. Immediately after the second shot, the guards had formed a tight, almost impenetrable ring around the prime minister. But even at this stage they did not do what they should have done: push Rajiv into the car as quickly as possible.

But the guards (including plain-clothesmen) had seen the puff of smoke from the canopy and shots were immediately fired into it with their 9mm German Mauser pistols. Suddenly, a young, sallow-complexioned, clean-shaven man in green stood up on the roof of the 10-foot high canopy alongside the VIP walkway. His hands above his head, he shouted: "Main surrender karta hoon (I am surrendering)." The securitymen including Black Cat commandos from the National Security Guard (NSG), quickly surrounded the canopy. Home Minister Buta Singh and Delhi Lt-Governor H.L. Kapur frantically asked the guards to shoot the man, but Gautam Kaul screamed out: "Goli mat chalaiye, goli mat chalaiye (don't shoot, don't shoot)." Kaul wanted the man taken alive. As Karamjit Singh scrambled down from the creeper-covered canopy, police officers surged towards him and stripped him naked, looking for possible weapons on his body. Suddenly everybody was everywhere and everyone had assumed command. The SPG, the NSG and the Delhi police were suddenly into top gear—after the action was over—revealing, sadly, the rust in their apparently well-oiled machinery.

Security Adviser Saxena

If Rajiv and Zail Singh survived it was simply because Karamjit Singh had a poor weapon in his hands. A partially-spent, dented cartridge was found next to Karamjit's belongings on the canopy, including a large plastic sheet, roasted gram wrapped in a handkerchief, a large jerrycan of water, tablets of terramycin and pain-killers, a mosquito-repellant cream and a box of matches.

Karamjit had been camping on the canopy roof-top since September 25. He was sitting up there even when the security men came to comb the area the evening before. The dog squad sniffed suspiciously at the canopy, but the assailant was saved by a beehive that sent the policemen scurrying. The screening and combing operations—supposed to begin at least 24 hours before the scheduled function—were in effect started only around 4.00 p.m. the previous evening, which means that the security personnel entrusted with the search were left with only so many hours of daylight to scour the sprawling acres of Rajghat.

The security failure was all the more glaring because the Intelligence Bureau's Additional Director P.K. Mullick, had personally informed Gautam Kaul of an unusual tip-off from the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) about a possible assassination attempt. The secret information, obtained in Ludhiana, had been passed on by RAW Director Ranjan Roy, on September 27 to all groups—including the SPG—responsible for protecting the prime minister. It read: "According to an unverified report, an attempt would be made on the life of our prime minister when he goes to Rajghat on October 2, 1986, to lay a wreath on Gandhiji's samadhi. The would-be assassin, a clean-shaven Sikh, was victim of the Delhi riots. He is likely to approach the area in the guise of a mali (gardener) and would hide himself in the bushes nearby." Said a Delhi police official in defence: "These tip-offs from the Intelligence Bureau have come to be treated as routine warnings before every function the prime minister attends." He did admit, though, that there was no excuse for the exclusion from the search of the only possible hideout that could be used by a potential assassin, the canopy.

The SPG cannot shirk its share of the responsibility, either. Its members clearly failed to take action after the first shot was fired, and also failed to pay adequate heed to the RAW warning. Though the SPG's defence is that while the planning and the system could not be faulted, and it is the implementation that is to be blamed, there were certainly some failures of the system too. The VIP's would have to cover quite a distance on foot, from their cars to the main samadhi, and this area was left uncovered by metal detectors. Only one metal detector was positioned at the inside gate, and this served little useful purpose, as the turn of events eventually proved.

Soon after the incident, the prime minister summoned an emergency three-hour meeting at his official residence, 7 Race Course Road, and formed a crisis management committee. Its first action was to suspend Kaul and hand over the case to the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI). Meanwhile, the finger-pointing started. RAW officials were quick to point out that their super-sleuthing had helped to alert other agencies in advance. The NSG's commandos came under fire for their poor marksmanship. But they criticised the SPG for its inability to respond quickly. SPG officers blamed the Delhi police for not having adequately secured the area the previous evening (which is undeniable), and Delhi police officers responded by saying that their force had been made the convenient scapegoat. Rank and file policemen see the suspension of Kaul as a humiliating blow to their morale. And an assistant commissioner of police in Delhi tersely pointed out: "Nothing will serve the terrorists better than a demoralised police force in the capital."

BUT the very fact that so many fingers were being pointed in so many directions is an indication that there may be too many fingers in the VIP security pie, and conflicting chains of command to boot. In its basic structure, the security around the prime minister appears to be simple and effective. He is surrounded by three security rings. The inner ring, consisting of a handful of armed men including his two personal security officers Ravi Nath and Mahendra Singh, is part of the 800-member SPG—a force created by Minister of State for Defence Arun Singh and the former security chief Dr S. Subramaniam, in the aftermath of Mrs Indira Gandhi's assassination. The SPG is made up of deputationists from the police and paramilitary forces.

The middle ring draws its dungareed Black Cats from the 5,000-man NSG, set up recently as an anti-terrorist force. Its normal function is not VIP protection, but it has been deputed for this task because of terrorist threats to them. This ring stays about 15 feet away from the prime minister, and its job is to pursue fleeing assassins and secure an entire VIP area after an alert is sounded. The third, outermost ring is composed of the local armed police, which is responsible for securing and flushing out sensitive areas at least 24 hours in advance of the prime minister's visit and manning outposts as well as strategic street locations in jeeps and other vehicles. The SPG is also responsible for coordinating security measures in advance when the prime minister leaves Delhi for domestic as well as foreign tours.

But these three rings are inextricably interwoven with the country's national security and intelligence operations (see chart). "The problem is that the entire set-up is a mishmash," one senior intelligence official said. "There are conflicting loyalties, jealousies, and divided commands. The three rings are, in effect, separate both at the operational as well as the headquarters level."

After Mrs Gandhi's assassination, the Government had decided to revamp the earlier security system, which had been almost entirely handled by the Delhi police and, for a brief period after Rajiv became prime minister, by the Special Frontier Force (SFF). But the SFF was relieved of this duty after it was decided that its men were not really trained for long hours of staying alert with nothing happening. It was also found that some of the force's guns had gone off accidentally and that officers in the force had been jockeying shamelessly for power within the set-up. In one instance, an officer tried to set-

INQUIRIES

Post Mortem Begins

A number of inquiries have predictably been sparked off following the assassination attempt on the prime minister. A panel under Cabinet Secretary B.G. Deshmukh has been charged with identifying dereliction of duty, lapses in security by the different agencies involved and recommending remedial measures. The panel is expected to submit its report by October 31.

The Delhi police began its own internal review after announcing, on the very first day, the suspension of Additional Commissioner of Police Gautam Kaul and some of his deputies, including Sub-Inspector Balwant Singh, who was stationed just below the canopy where Karamjit Singh hid, but who had wandered off from the point when the shots were fired.

The Special Protection Group and the National Security Guard have both been directed to assess their own lapses in the incident and the Intelligence Bureau—reduced to a mere intelligence-feeding agency of late—has been asked to actively oversee and prepare spot reports on the security arrangements at all prime ministerial engagements in Delhi.

But the main inquiry into the incident has been handed over to the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI), in particular to the team that recently proved its acumen in investigating the Vaidya murder case. A week after they began investigations, the CBI sleuths are convinced that the murder was not a one-man plan. The CBI is expected to make a detailed report within the next few weeks.

tle scores with another by planting a hand grenade, but only managed to blow off his own arm. A court martial followed. Later, a crack army commando force was called in to do security duty. But suggestions that the security be handled exclusively by the army were rejected on the grounds that it would gain too much importance in an essentially civilian area, and because the intelligence community believed that VIP security as well as the fight against Sikh terrorism (in which civilian intelligence is more involved) should go hand in hand.

It was after all this chopping and changing that the final three-ring system (with the SPG, NSG and local police) was evolved. And certainly, the prime minister now lives and works in what are virtual fortresses. The road in front of his house is closed to traffic. His residence is equipped with the latest in communications equipment. The office as well as residence are surrounded by armed guards. Visitors are carefully frisked. And even ministers of state must leave their cars at the gate, enter through the formal reception area, and go through metal detectors. Cabinet ministers, who can bypass this area and enter directly, must

ATTEMPT ON RIBEIRO

Hitting Deep

SIX jeep-borne terrorists who struck at the heavily protected Punjab Armed Police (PAP) headquarters on the Sher Shah Suri Marg in Jalandhar Cantonment and nearly killed the country's super-cop Julio Francis Ribeiro, dealt another blow last fortnight to the country's bloated security system. "They thought they'd killed me. My wife thought I was dead. It was only waheguru who protected me. He must be more happy with me as I am fighting to protect innocent lives. They must have done something to annoy him," said Ribeiro, showing a graze on his left arm.

Ribeiro and his wife Melba had been strolling on the left lawn of the officers' mess, when an olive green jeep emblazoned with the word 'POLICE' halted near the mess gates. One terrorist in the uniform of a police officer told PAP guard Kulwant Singh that he wanted to inspect his weapon. Obligingly, Kulwant took out the magazine from his Sten gun. Within moments three others alighted from the jeep, scaled a mound and climbed onto the boundary wall from where they began spraying bullets. "I just heard a shot, ducked like a football goalkeeper and lay on the ground. My wife also took cover," Ribeiro recalls.

Within two minutes the terrorists, all in perfect police gear, fled. They abandoned the jeep and escaped through a gap in the complex's perimeter wall. Next they climbed the railway over-bridge nearby and jumped onto a truck that was already in motion and disappeared swiftly.

In the 15-minute drama, they left behind one CRPF constable Kuldip Raj, 26, dead and two PAP and two CRPF jawans wounded. Melba Ribeiro was hit in her calf. The entire campus was left dazed by the deftness with which the mission was carried out. Not a single shot was fired in return and no policeman gave chase to the terrorists even though there were scores of vehicles, jeeps, cars and trucks in ready order. Some 50 police gunmen had been guarding the four gates and several residences of officers in this top security complex.

There had been repeated warnings from both the state intelligence and the Intelligence Bureau that the terrorists would come after Ribeiro, either in army or police disguise. And yet, the security measures failed when exactly this kind of assault was made. The terrorists were heavily armed with a Thomson machine-gun, a Sten gun, two self-loading rifles and a .455 revolver. The jeep entered through gate number one on the Jalandhar-Phagwara side of the national highway, though some dispute this and point to gate number four on the Jalandhar-Amritsar side as the place of entry. "Through this gate we do not allow any vehicles except those of the DGP or IGP," said a burly Sikh guard on duty at gate number one.

A week-long intensive interrogation of the guards and other suspected PAP men and officers has not, so far, led to any conclusive solution of the mystery of also leave their cars and personal staff outside, from where they are driven to the prime minister's residential office in separate cars deployed by the SPG. Other visitors are issued laminated passes that are required to be shown at three separate locations. The spacious lawns are fitted with hidden voice recorders. And from a special room fitted with closed-circuit TV, SPG guards monitor the movements of all the visitors being filmed by hidden cameras. The security operation in the complex is directed and supervised by Devender Singh, an IPS officer from the Rajasthan cadre, who has replaced Subramaniam and whose office at 9 Race Course Road is next to Rajiv's residence.

But the prime minister also moves out and travels a great deal. And this is where the security system's cracks begin to appear, partly because of the divided loyalties and lack of a unified chain of command. For one thing, there is an enormous difference in the working conditions and privileges of those in the SPG and those in the Delhi police (who had been doing the SPG's work earlier). The SPG as an elite force has not been subjected to any of the budgetary restrictions normal in the Government: it has had the latest how the jeep entered the complex. The timing chosen by the terrorists was perfect and had to be based on inside information. The morning hours are usually a time of relaxation, with most officers playing golf and jawans busy in the routine morning drills.

The terrorists missed their prime target because they anticipated immediate retaliatory fire from within the complex, and so gave themselves less time than they needed. "They overestimated the police readiness and reaction. If they had risked a little more, they would not only have killed our valued chief but upset all the achievements of the past six months. We were just lucky," says a senior intelligence officer.

The complex should have been the best protected place in Punjab. Says Chief Minister Surjit Singh Barnala: "There has been a definite, serious security lapse. The guards were not trained, they were not cautious. Somebody inside knew the entire set-up. The terrorists knew which side they should go, even the passage through the barbed wire. Since our increased onslaught on the terrorists, they have been eager for actions that will give them publicity mileage."

Meanwhile, the terrorists have repeatedly been able to pierce through the security system. On September 30, they successfully penetrated the frequency of the police wireless system, jamming it for half an hour, first in Amritsar district and later cutting off the whole state. The policemen manning the wireless system heard: "Khalistan, Khalistan and Khalistan zindabad". Army and police experts have so far not been able to locate the equipment or even pinpoint its direction. One opinion is that the jamming must have been done from across the border, in Pakistan. But a high-level intelligence source points to an earlier jamming and disturbance in the frequency after the Muktsar killings, and says that the terrorists could be having enough powerful equipment to disturb the communication network right inside the country. This is the third time, since April, that the police has had to change its internal wireless frequencies and establish new codes.

Most police officers are now wary of using the wireless network. But as one officer confided: "Even in the telephone exchanges, the terrorists have their sympathisers and valuable information gets leaked." Added another: "Sympathisers have penetrated everywhere and I have no doubt that they helped in the attack on Ribeiro."

As yet, it is mostly guesswork that is involved in identifying the terrorists who tried to kill Ribeiro. Some police sources were quick to announce that former policemen Sukha Sipahi, alias General Labh Singh of the Khalistan Commando Force, and a former head constable, Sewa Singh, were involved and that the gang was led by Panthic Committee member Dhanna Singh, who had announced the battle for Khalistan. Other intelligence sources say that Tarsem Singh, the dreaded terrorist, is back from Canada and could have been part of the gang.

But the only real clue so far is the truck in which the terrorists escaped and later tried to burn after abandoning it in Kapurthala district. The owners, Rajinder Kaur and her husband Karaj Singh of Amritsar, have admitted that Wassan Singh, another member of the Panthic Committee, had summoned the truck to Chowk Mehta—headquarters of the Damdami Taksal—a day earlier. But the driver, a nephew of the couple who is also known to acknowledge his closeness to the late Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale, has been absconding.

The terrorists are keen to get Ribeiro because he has restored the sagging morale of the Punjab police, which is now taking the fight into the terrorists' camp. Ribeiro's new challenge will be to continue to boost the morale of his men, even in the face of such temporary, yet demoralising, set-backs.

weapons and gadgetry imported, its men get 50 per cent extra pay as a special allowance, they are guaranteed government housing in a capital where this is in short supply, they get handsome kitting allowances, and they are insured for lakhs of rupees (depending on rank). They have inevitably got the privilege of travelling abroad with the prime minister, and there is resentment against them in the other agencies because of what is seen as their overbearing attitude and arrogance. Subramaniam, the founder-chief of the SPG, seems to have been an especially unpopular man because of his abrasiveness, though no one questions his ability.

Tensions have arisen because the SPG's special conditions of service have not been given to the others. Typically, a constable in the security division of the Delhi police gets none of the extra pay and allowances, he works longer hours, and he belongs to a force that is often at the receiving end of the SPG's displeasure. One day last fortnight, these constables were asked to assemble before dawn (they had to find their own transport, unlike the SPG), given their weapons and taken to the airport, from where the prime minister was taking off by helicopter to inspect the NSG's headquarters in nearby Gurgaon. They were on duty till close to 10 a.m., after the prime minister returned, and had to assemble again in less than two hours to man the area around Ashok Hotel, where Rajiv was hosting a lunch for King Hussein of Jordan. They were there till after 3 p.m., and were called upon to be present yet again at another hotel, for a wedding reception that the prime minister was attending. They got back to their homes around 10 p.m., and were told to reassemble the next morning at 6 a.m. Said a police officer: "They were not given lunch packets while they guarded the hotel, they must have been hungry at various times in the day, and they saw the SPG men being obviously much better looked after."

The result has been bad blood between the two main forces responsible for the prime minister's security. Inevitably, coordination and the issue of who is in charge has been a persistent and touchy question. At another level, meanwhile, there are even more cooks with their fingers in the security broth. Under the Cabinet Secretariat come the director-general of security (DGS) and RAW. Under the DGS are the Special Services Bureau (SSB), responsible for programmes in border areas, and the Aviation Research Centre (ARC), a crack outfit charged with transporting security personnel—in particular the NSG—at a moment's notice to trouble-spots. Among the forces that the Home Ministry controls are the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF), the NSG, the Intelligence Bureau (IB) and the CBI, as well as the Border Security Force (BSF) and the Indo-Tibetan Border Police (ITBP).

Protected VIP's Nehru (top); and Bhagat: stretched security

In both subtle and obvious ways, all these groups are involved in VIP security and answer either to the Cabinet Secretariat or to Gary Saxena, the former RAW chief who, as security adviser to the prime minister, serves as a filter between all these agencies and Rajiv. The SPG depends on virtually all the other agencies for its recruits and their training. IB personnel are also members of SPG in order to keep a surveillance on recruits. The NSG is also trained by the army and depends on various paratrooper and infantry battalions for recruits, most of whom are under 35 years of age and after a period revert back to their parent organisations.

The NSG, an elite unit, reports both to its Home Ministry bosses as well as to the DGS because it depends on the ARC for logistical support. Even the men in the SPG continue to have special bonds with the paramilitary forces, each of which has its own bureaucratic hierarchy.

As one intelligence official put it: "Unified command may exist on paper, but in reality there are deep divisions. We really do not have any exclusively trained and raised internal security or intelligence operatives. Most of the agencies are made up of officials who have been trained as IPS officers." A former army intelligence officer added: "Just because a man wears black dungarees it does not mean he is a commando. One of the biggest mistakes people make is to refer to the people who protect the VIP's as commandos. The only specialised commandos in the country are in specially-trained army battalions. They have some interaction with the VIP security forces and even train them. But this training is haphazard and consists of a few crash courses. No real commando would ever mistake a gunshot for a scooter backfire. You've got to be in tune with the terrorists' psyche, and manning all the high points and vantage points should be second nature."

received their basic training either in the ITBP or BSF, with a few special courses near Gurgaon and the army's pistol firing range in Khanpur, near Delhi. Even a Home Ministry official observed: "ITBP personnel are primarily trained in manning observation posts on the border, in areas under army control. The BSF has similar duties along with anti-smuggling chores on the Pakistan border. During emergencies, because they are not fully trained, they are only given soft core sectors to defend under army command. And one can certainly not call the Delhi Armed Police commandos. So the question is, what is so special about the Special Protection Group?"

BUT whether it is the SPG or any of the other security agencies, life is not easy when you are trying to protect Rajiv Gandhi. The prime minister insists on driving his imported jeep at dangerously high speeds in Delhi and on his tours to places like the north-east and Andhra Pradesh. Recently, he drove his jeep so fast that one of the security cars behind him overturned in the effort to keep up with him on a curve. Earlier, an advance vehicle trying to keep a distance between itself and the jeep zipping along behind, hit a man on a scooter. As everyone braked, the car immediately behind Rajiv rammed into the rear of the jeep. The former SPG chief Subramaniam was a man given to plain speaking and had expressed his severe annoyance to Rajiv over some of these instances and his high-speed driving. Subramaniam was posted out to a diplomatic position in Bonn.

If all this makes life difficult for the securitymen, their resources are stretched to the full by the growing list of VIP's who have to be protected against terrorist attacks. The list in Delhi alone now totals 260, and apart from the President, vice-president and prime minister, includes ministers, politicians, defence officers, judges, civilian officers and journalists. And all this has to be done by some 2,000 men in the Delhi police security division, apart from some additional personal security guards drawn from other agencies. Each one of the men guarded has been given a list of do's and don'ts, including even special instructions on handling close relatives and personal staff. Among the VIP's who are protected by the Black Cats or a combination of securitymen are Congress(I) Vice-President Arjun Singh, Union Minister of State for Civil Aviation Jagdish Tytler, Buta Singh, Arun Nehru, Arun Singh, Amitabh Bachchan, Punjab Chief Minister S.S. Barnala and Parliamentary Affairs Minister H.K.L. Bhagat. President Zail Singh's inner ring of protection is provided by the Delhi police, which is answerable directly in this particular role to the military secretary to the President.

The nature and extent of security to be provided to an individual is determined by the Home Ministry and the Intelligence Bureau. VIP's are classified in three categories: maximum threat, medium threat and threat. NSG troopers are provided to people in the maximum threat category. The question about how safe these men really are seemed to have been answered at Rajghat by the 'scooter backfire' that was heard around the world. But Gautam Kaul insists that the incident should not be a cause for widespread pessimism: "They are absolutely safe from any threat from the known areas and people. Our intelligence agencies and security organisations are sufficiently equipped to perceive any threat and take preventive action. But no security system in the world is foolproof."

Nevertheless, the revamped, high-powered lavishly spending security system that has been in place for the last year was badly exposed with the Rajghat episode. With a committee having been appointed to go into the failures of both men and systems, yet another reorganisation can now be expected. Meanwhile, last fortnight more than 100 gun-toting securitymen along the capital's centrally located Sardar Patel Marg, a standard VIP route to and from the airport, were given high-powered battery-operated torches and categorical instructions to search all the trees in the vicinity every five minutes until a VIP who was expected shortly, had passed. The VIP happened to be none other than Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, who was returning from his three-day tour of Maharashtra and Andhra Pradesh.

Rajiv talking to Kaul within SPG "ring": flaws and failures

But these are essentially reactive measures—people becoming wiser after the event. And while there is no such thing as foolproof security, the major lesson of the Rajghat incident is that the VIP security system is overburdened, overstretched, poorly-coordinated, with no clear structure of accountability and responsibility. And it needs to be honed and re-fashioned in a way that will yield more security and less empire building.

CONGRESS(I) ELECTIONS

Promises, Promises

"Party elections will be completed by January 20, 1983."
—G.K. Moopanar, AICC(I) General Secretary, October 6, 1982

"We will definitely hold the organisational elections by September 1983." —G.K. Moopanar, March 9, 1983

"We have taken steps to complete the elections before the AICC(I) session in December, 1985." —Rajiv Gandhi, May 5, 1985

"Elections to be held by July 1986"
—CWC resolution at Bombay session, 1985

"Party's organisational poll to take place in October."
—R.L. Bhatia, AICC(I) General Secretary, July 8, 1986

"Organisational elections due in October 1986 have been put off by a few months." —G.K. Moopanar, September 28, 1986.

POLITICAL parties are notorious for breaking promises made to the electorate. But hardly does any party take its own members and office-bearers for a ride as often as the ruling Congress (I) has done. For the last four years its leadership, including the prime minister, has been assuring its 1.5 crore members that party elections are round the corner. Over a dozen circulars and telegrams have been sent out from the party's New Delhi headquarters to the state units fixing specific time schedules for the poll. But each time, the promised elections, like the smile of the proverbial Cheshire Cat, mysteriously vanish into thin air. Party Vice-President Arjun Singh has a bland explanation: "We are committed to hold the elections but we have not been able to meet the deadlines due to genuine difficulties. It is the biggest democratic political party in the world and we have a very tall order to deliver and we will do it soon."

Singh probably means what he says but has been unable to control the circumstances behind the postponement. The promised process has been hamstrung not by any administrative problems as by the fierce political battle for control of party posts which has been raging within the party. The latest postponement, the fifth in as many years, was caused by a factional war over the validity of the membership lists. While dissidents bent upon challenging the high command's candidates want every third member currently enrolled to be struck off the rolls on grounds of ineligibility, the ruling establishment is not willing to drop more than 10 per cent. Said a dissident leader from Uttar Pradesh: "If we allow the elections to be held on the basis of bogus membership then we are taking the risk of ending up with bogus leadership as well." He said that the dissidents had challenged the membership list because hundreds of thousands of bogus members had bribed or manipulated their way into it.

The thorny issue of membership has also become the convenient excuse for the high command to postpone elections. According to middle ranking party workers neither the central leadership nor the nominated state-level office-bearers are interested in elections, as seen in the half-hearted attempts made so far to resolve the membership dispute. The controversy first surfaced in April when party Working President Kamalapati Tripathi publicly aired the phony membership issue and demanded corrective measures. The AICC(I) immediately appointed over 400 district-level scrutiny committees for verifying memberships. These committees comprising members representing various factions in each district submitted their reports to their PCC(I) headquarters by the end of July. But in more than 70 districts in the Hindi belt of Uttar Pradesh,

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bihar, Madhya Pradesh, Haryana and Rajasthan, querulous party factions failed to reach a consensus. In Varanasi district, the Tripathi faction demanded the scrapping of the entire list of nine lakh members enrolled by their rivals. In other politically volatile districts like Allahabad, Sitapur, Lucknow, Ghaziabad and Gorakhpur the party was faced with the dilemma of cancelling the membership of almost 70 per cent of enrolled members. In Madhya Pradesh, similar battle lines were drawn between two factions, one led by Arjun Singh, and the other by former Union minister Vidya Charan Shukla. Both sides refused to surrender a single member to the benefit of the rival group. Initially Shukla suffered a temporary setback when the records of members enrolled by his supporters were burnt under mysterious circumstances. The question of bogus membership could have been solved more amicably, party insiders say, if the scrutiny panels and AICC(I) observers had shown greater impartiality. In Madhya Pradesh, for example, the Shukla faction accused AICC(I) observer Harish Rawat of packing scrutiny committees with Singh's men who rejected virtually all the objections raised by Shukla's supporters, approving "totally bogus" lists.

THE northern belt is politically most sensitive—whoever is able to capture it by election of sympathetic office-bearers will call the shots. The main reason for the high command's postponement of elections is its fear that its candidates will not be elected in sufficient numbers and it will thus lose control over the region. Unsure of whether the resolution of the bogus membership issue would be an advantage, the high command began dragging its feet. First, it took no follow-up action to ensure that the scrutiny committees completed their jobs in time. In addition, it failed to appoint any state-level scrutiny committees which were to be set up by July this year. Said Moopanar: "District committees have done their job. Now the PCC-level panels will submit their report to the AICC(I)." Added Singh: "I can only say that we have been able to finish the first stage of election process and soon the second stage will begin." Singh, however, was not willing to commit himself to any fixed date for elections.

The high command seems to fear that speedy elections might allow controversial politicians—Jagannath Mishra in Bihar, Tripathi in Uttar Pradesh, Jagannath Pahadia in Rajasthan, Bhajan Lal in Haryana, Madhavsinh Solanki in Gujarat and V.C. Shukla in Madhya Pradesh—to win decisively. Even more ominously, they could pose a challenge to the party leadership. Said a former chief minister of a northern state: "Rajiv is trapped in a circle from where he can't get out. Democratically elected people won't be subservient and if he cancels the election he will be accused of heading a party of nominated members."

The Congress(I) election fiasco, say Rajiv's critics, is squarely the outcome of the prime minister's inability to spare time for organisational matters. When he recruited Singh as the party's vice-president in January this year, Singh's immediate mission was to ensure that democratically elected party leaders with "clean images" would replace nominated office-bearers and that those whose loyalties to Rajiv were in doubt, were kept completely out of party offices.

BHAWAN SINGH

"We are committed to hold the elections but we have not been able to meet the deadline due to genuine difficulties.... We have a very tall order to deliver, we will do it soon."

ARJUN SINGH
vice-president, AICC(I)

Since the election machinery is controlled by the PCC(I) chiefs, Rajiv replaced the presidents of at least 12 states by personal loyalists. But as the election count-down began, the out-of-power factions, for their own political survival, instead of recruiting the dedicated new members prescribed by Rajiv, began to enrol hordes of proxy members who would vote for them. After the press started carrying reports on the swelling bogus members, the Prime Minister's Secretariat ordered an independent inquiry into the issue. Rajiv's aides concluded that if party elections were held on the basis of the existing enrolment, Congress(I) bosses with political bases of their own would take over the party structure and that the party organisation would become more powerful than the prime minister. Though the prime minister still favoured elections, threatened politicians virtually sabotaged the daily working of the AICC(I) headquarters which, instead of setting the stage for the party poll, has come close to becoming functionally paralysed. These same politicians then mooted the much-publicised proposal for holding the party's elections on the basis of a selective membership. This suggestion was deliberately leaked to selected journalists primarily to serve as a trial balloon to test the reaction of the party's rank and file. Curiously, this idea for "guided democracy" in the party became public soon after Tripathi's recent demand for elections and his threat to convene a meeting of the AICC(I) to finalise the new poll schedule.

While the party's top brass is involved in a slanging match over the elections Rajiv has not made any public statement recently. Even if he decides to fulfil the promise he made as the party's general secretary in 1982, it will still be impossible to hold the elections till the end of next year. To begin with, the AICC(I) has to appoint the state-level scrutiny committees which will take at least two months to verify the membership reports filed by the district-level committees. Once the final membership list is published, a notice of at least six weeks is mandatory. And for this a special AICC(I) session will have to be convened. But in view of Rajiv's tight schedule of impending foreign jaunts and the winter session of Parliament round the corner, none of these steps can be taken for the next three months. And after that the party will be under pressure to prepare itself for the coming assembly elections in the states of Haryana, Kerala, Tripura and West Bengal and the high command is unlikely to take the risk of vertical divisions within the party cropping up, as they well might when the organisational elections are underway. And so it appears, at least for the foreseeable future, that Rajiv will continue to function as the unelected president of the largest political party in the nation.

MAHILA CONGRESS

Nobody's Baby

THE functioning of the All India Mahila Congress (AIMC)—the women's arm of the All India Congress (I) Committee which is now supposed to enjoy a status equal to that of other front organisations like the Youth Congress—has been badly hit by demoralisation of workers, lack of adequate funds, and political infighting between its chairperson Begum Abida Ahmed, and its convenor, Minister of Youth Affairs, Sports and Women's Welfare Margaret Alva.

Mid-1984 was a high-point for the organisation when it held a successful convention in Bangalore attended by both Mrs Gandhi and Rajiv and 30,000 delegates. Said one who attended: "Rajiv really seemed to care about our organisation then. He promised the moon. But since then, everything went downhill. Rajiv doesn't even come to our meetings any more. And from day-to-day the Mahila Congress has to beg for funds."

What bothers party workers is not just the treatment of their organisation as a second class outfit, but also a split leadership which sometimes paralyses the work. On paper, Begum Abida, as chairperson, is head of AIMC. But in practice, Alva, as convenor, continues to exercise considerable authority. Since Alva became minister, party sources say, she has not even visited the AIMC's dilapidated barrack-like headquarters at New Delhi's 1, Talkatora Road. But backers of Alva say her presence there is unnecessary because she can attend to the same work from elsewhere.

Alva, according to AIMC sources, keeps a tight grip over certain affairs of the organisation much to the discomfiture of Begum Abida, the MP from Bareilly and wife of the late president Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed. Alva, for example, still countersigns cheques and travel vouchers of the AIMC. During one recent occasion she refused to approve the air fare charged by Begum Abida for an official trip to Assam on the suspicion that it was a junket. The bill was finally paid by the AICC(I). In addition, party sources say, Alva patronises a small group of AIMC state convenors who, on their visits to Delhi, closet themselves with the minister at her residence or office rather than meet with AIMC workers and officials at 1, Talkatora Road. And Alva, according to inside reports, has at least once appointed an official to AIMC's legal cell—from outside the organisation—without consulting Begum Abida.

The clash between the two women, sources say, was predictable. Begum Abida was Mrs Gandhi's choice as head of AIMC. But Rajiv favoured Alva. When the latter's name was first suggested for a senior post in AIMC, several party members raised objections on the ground that Alva had earlier deserted the Congress(I) and joined the Devraj Urs group, critical of Mrs Gandhi. But under a consensus, the post of convenor was specially created for Alva. The fur began to fly during the Bangalore convention. Alva belongs to the city and took aggressive charge of the convention and virtually excluded Begum Abida from important decisions. As one senior delegate put it: "It was clearly Margaret's show and she thoroughly impressed Rajiv as the real go-getter. Begum Sahiba was neglected during the framing of important resolutions. And she was not even given a car for her travel in the city. It was only later that Jaffar Sharif, the PCC(I) president, provided her with conveyance."

But Begum Abida was deeply hurt, sources say, at the way she was treated by Rajiv himself during the party's centenary celebrations in Bombay a year ago. Without warning, Rajiv asked all of the AICC(I) front organisations to prepare written plans for what they proposed to do in 1986. Begum Abida jotted down a few points which were handed to Rajiv. But the prime minister gave the memo to Rajendra Kumari Bajpai, an Uttar Pradesh MP, and asked her to get Alva's signature of approval on it. Alva could not be found. And later, Rajiv made a small statement that it appeared to him that the Mahila Congress had no concrete programme. According to reliable sources, Begum Abida sent Rajiv a letter of resignation which has still not been accepted and she continues to head the organisation in a state of limbo.

A new organisational constitution, adopted at the Bangalore convention and approved by the party's parliamentary board which abolishes the post of convenor and includes, instead, positions for a president, a general secretary and four zonal secretaries, has still not been implemented despite repeated reminders to party Vice-President, Arjun Singh. AIMC has no formalised budgetary allocation, and not a single vehicle. Most state convenors are without offices and pay their own way when they travel for conferences. And following a new membership drive launched last year about half the membership forms distributed haven't so far been returned. "This is supposed to be the key organisation responsible for bringing women into politics and raising their social awareness," lamented one senior member. "But when we compare our position with that of other organisations we have to conclude that we are treated like a step-child."

Party workers are bothered not just by the second class treatment of the Mahila Congress, but also a split leadership which paralyses work. On paper Begum Abida as chairperson is head, but in practice, Alva as convenor continues to exercise considerable authority.

JAMMU & KASHMIR

Rapid Reforms

THE recent spurt of mayhem and violence in Jammu and Kashmir was not entirely unexpected. For more than seven months, politicians—devalued under Governor's Rule—and vested interests who had held free rein in the state, had been reeling under the onslaught of Governor Jagmohan's rapid-fire reforms aimed at the judiciary, the bureaucracy, and institutionalised patronage. Seeing in the recently-declared President's Rule in the state, a new opportunity for militant opposition, the formerly stricken struck back with a time-tested method of gaining mob sympathy—an appeal to communal passions on grounds of preserving the Kashmiri identity. An initial call for a campaign against the "markazi sarkar" (Central Government), issued by fundamentalist parties as well as by elements of the National Conference, failed to arouse the expected mass support. So the leaders resorted to hit-and-run tactics to signal their militant presence.

For starters, saboteurs burned the old Mahjoor Bridge in Srinagar early one morning. Later, a few houses belonging to the minority community were set ablaze in places like Sopore, known for their communal harmony. Notwithstanding the noise made by the media over the incidents, Jagmohan declared: "The state Government is determined to isolate those who don't want peace in the valley. And the fight against these people will continue till they either surrender or reform themselves." The reference, partly, was to the recent detention of some rabid fundamentalist leaders in the valley under the Public Safety Act. Added a senior government official of the state: "Only corrupt elements who have lost their clout are encouraging violence so that poor people lose their business during the tourist season."

The selection of places and causes for inciting violence, sources in Kashmir said, was designed to have the maximum impact on the media. In reality, the cases of violence in the state were isolated. But they were blown out of proportion by a section of the press in Delhi. Predictably, the Central Government pressed the panic button. Jagmohan was summoned by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi for a detailed explanation of the situation. According to sources in the Prime Minister's Secretariat, Jagmohan and his advisors convinced Rajiv, with documentary evidence, that the reports of violence were quite exaggerated. Jagmohan also made it clear that the violence was the handiwork of disgruntled politicians who had made common cause with the local timber and liquor mafias. He pointed out that his efforts had drawn volatile opposition from communal elements, who had profited politically and economically from the status quo. It is not difficult to gauge, from the following handful of examples out of the 37 major legislative amendments made by him, why Jagmohan's initiatives have provoked such bitter opposition from entrenched power groups.

The state had its own civil service cadres manned by officials of known communal as well as anti-national sympathies. All-India services like the IAS, IPS and the Indian Forest Service were virtually excluded from the state bureaucracy, which hired and promoted from within. Under the new orders, officers from the all-India services are being increasingly inducted into key positions. In addition, the allotment of commercial land and plots, formerly in the hands of local politicians and bureaucrats who looked after their friends and relatives, has been thrown open to public auction conducted by impartial tribunals. Appointments and promotions in local government posts, formerly in the hands of ministers, are now performed by statutory service selection boards under a new merit system of examinations. Government doctors have been prohibited from private practice, and, for the first time under the Advocate Act of 1961, lawyers from outside the state are being allowed to practise at the state bar. Wildlife laws have been made more stringent to prevent poaching and several cases have been registered against powerful interests involved in the illegal felling of timber, the smuggling of pine resin and the illicit bottling of liquor.

> "The Government is determined to isolate those who don't want peace. And the fight will continue till they surrender or reform."

> governor, Jammu and Kashmir

Perhaps the most sensitive reform under Jagmohan was the extension of the merit system to engineering colleges which, under a powerful system of patronage in which mostly friends and relatives of the powerful could get admission, hitherto excluded not only the minorities but also the sons and daughters of middle class and poorer Muslim families. The governor's office had received widespread reports that this de facto quota system was enforced through the manipulation of marks at the interviews which followed the entrance examination. Under the new legislation, an independent board now conducts the interviews, which are tape-recorded. Politicians and civil servants whose children stood to gain exclusively from the old admissions rackets backed a protest movement which dubbed the admissions reforms "anti-Muslim", thereby trying to taint them with a communal brush. But a call for a statewide bandh on the subject managed to elicit only a limited response.

The state's politicians have been spreading the belief that Jagmohan's reforms are violative of Article 370 of the Constitution, which gives Kashmir its special status in the Indian Union. But Jagmohan's simple and reasoned response to this has been: "Article 370 does not say anywhere that the rich will be protected to the disadvantage of the poor." Perhaps one reason that the bandh calls, even in the name of communalism, have had a limited response is that some of Jagmohan's reforms have begun to produce results the state hasn't seen in decades. More than 1,000 new schools have been opened in villages throughout the state where none existed. Two women's colleges have started in places as far away as Ladakh and Kargil. The Dal Lake, which was dying of pollution, has been cleared of 5,000 tonnes of weed. And the state's 20 point programme, which had hit rock-bottom before Governor's Rule, has exceeded targets in many areas. State government officials now like to boast that the new projects have been implemented without the state's having to ask for any new finances from the Centre.

Jagmohan has now made it abundantly clear to the Centre that a large part of the violent disruptions in the state is but a new manifestation of the resistance he has been facing from vested interests all along. Following his hour-long meeting with Jagmohan in Delhi, the prime minister directed him to put down violence with a firm hand and assured him full Central support in dealing with the situation. Jagmohan was also told to take leading politicians into confidence before embarking upon any major administrative offensive.

Even though the Centre believes that the situation in the state is under control, it is not willing to take the risk of continuing President's Rule for too long. The Congress(I) high command believes that once the state is handed over to local politicians, they will no longer be able to mobilise Kashmiri wrath against Rajiv and his party. But the main question being asked by ordinary Kashmiris today is: with the return of popular rule to the state, will matters revert to politics as usual or will the new government do something to fulfil the rising local expectations, fuelled by what some term as Jagmohan's undemocratic raj? Whether these are valid fears or mere gut feelings, only time will tell.

YOUTH CONGRESS(I)/SEVA DAL

Open Discord

RELATIONS between the Youth Congress(I) and the Seva Dal, the two front organisations of the party being used by Rajiv Gandhi for training talent within the Congress(I), have never been cordial. But the simmering differences between Anand Sharma and Tariq Anwar, heads of the YC(I) and Seva Dal respectively, came into the open last fortnight when charges were traded in a manner that clearly revealed their mutual hostility. Said Anwar, who led YC(I) before Sharma: "I am not in competition with Anand, so I do not understand why he is so opposed to me." Retorted Sharma: "I am not opposed to Tariq; I only feel bad about anti-Youth Congress stories being planted in the media by those who have had their stint here and are jittery with our success."

The immediate provocation for the charges was a memorandum submitted to party President Rajiv Gandhi by 25 Bihar MLA's. The memorandum, apparently masterminded by Shyam Sunder Singh Dheeraj, Bihar YC(I) chief, levelled charges of corruption against Anwar. Anwar responded by shooting off a letter to Rajiv, asking for a thorough probe into the charges.

Shortly afterwards, it became apparent that the Anwar group was taking the fight into the rival camp when some Anwar-supporters in the Delhi Pradesh Youth Congress(I) submitted a memo against Sharma accusing him of reducing the organisation to inactivity. Said an Anwar supporter: "If Sharma wants to do negative politics, we want to show him that we can play dirty too."

Anwar's group alleges that Sharma is using Dheeraj to run down Anwar in his home state. Sharma's ire, says Anwar, is directly related to the growing importance of the Seva Dal. Says Anwar: "Earlier, the Seva Dal was a defunct organisation. Now it is being given equal importance by the party president. Naturally, those who are not confident of their own position are feeling insecure."

Sharma denied that he had any hand in the Dheeraj-inspired memorandum, saying: "This is a purely Bihar affair; I have not taken any sides." On the contrary, said sources close to Sharma, the new thrust Sharma had given to the YC(I), which was attracting a "more respectable" set, had made Anwar jealous. Added Sharma: "Rajivji's bid to revive inactive bodies like the Seva Dal is being deliberately misinterpreted as getting preferential treatment from him. This just shows their own insecurity."

To a great extent, Rajiv himself is to blame for this discord. Earlier, the YC(I) was the only front organisation orchestrating youth activities. Now, the Seva Dal has also been given an overlapping role; as, for instance, in training young MP's. Realising the unhappiness this was causing, Rajiv has now asked party Vice-President Arjun Singh to demarcate the activities of the party's front organisations on the basis of age.

TAMIL NADU

Empty Benches

AFTER Delhi's lawyers, it was the turn of Tamil Nadu's advocates to boycott the courts last fortnight. Incensed by what they claimed was a deliberate design by the state Government to leave judicial vacancies unfilled and subsequently pack them with nominees drawn from the state secretariat, all 20,000 lawyers of the state stayed away from the courts for 12 days. The simmering resentment among lawyers spilled over when the state Government showed no signs of complying with a Supreme Court directive in August that judicial vacancies should be filled up by this month.

Although the boycott was subsequently called off after an assurance from Chief Justice M.N. Chandurkar of the Madras High Court, it is clear that Tamil Nadu's lawyers are determined to fight the state Government on a sensitive issue. Said R. Gandhi, president of the Bar Federation of Tamil Nadu and Pondicherry: "The common man will lose faith in the judiciary if this trend of allowing judicial posts to remain unfilled continues."

The list of vacancies in Tamil Nadu's courts is truly staggering. Out of 25 sanctioned posts of high court judges, there has been an average of five vacancies over the last five years. The high court has one of the highest percentage of vacancies in the country. Of 60 district court judges, nine posts have yet to be filled. And four posts of district judges have yet to be sanctioned for four new districts created recently. Similarly, vacancies exist for eight sub-judges, 120 district munsiffs and 195 posts of judicial first and second class magistrates.

The blame for this sorry state of affairs, according to the lawyers, rests with the state Government. Appointments below district judges are entirely the state Government's responsibility, and are supposed to be done through the state public service commission. Even for district judges, it is the state Government which has to take the initiative. Instead, it has been adopting dilatory tactics. The Madras High Court had recommended the names of five sub-judges for promotion as district judges, but the state Government has been delaying the matter by asking the high court for the personal files of all the sub-judges. Even for the high court, the Government has recommended only two names against the five vacancies.

To add insult to injury, charged the lawyers, the state Government has been trying to pack the subordinate judiciary with secretariat staff. Of the 144 posts of judicial second class magistrates, 133 have been filled by temporary magistrates drawn from the secretariat and the remaining 11 are vacant. Similarly, of the 58 posts of judicial first class magistrates, 37 are manned by temporary secretariat hands, 14 are vacant and only seven have permanent appointees. Laments a high court judge: "Earlier there was a system whereby one-third of the posts of district judges were filled up by practising lawyers. Now, this convention has been given a go-by."

Worse, say the lawyers, the Government is now trying to introduce this deplorable practice in the high court also. One of the two names that the state Government has recommended to the Centre for appointment to the high court is of the state Law Secretary S. Vadivelu. Fumes Gandhi: "This move is highly improper because Vadivelu does not have the prescribed period of experience in the bar." The Vadivelu proposal, it is learnt, is the Government's counter to Chief Justice Chandurkar's recommendation that a senior advocate, G. Subramaniam, be elevated to the bench.

But the state Government says its hands are clean. Law Minister C. Ponnaiyan argued that "both in the promotion of sub-judges and in the screening of temporary magistrates for regularisation of service, it is for the Madras High Court to take the next step". However, Justice Chandurkar said: "It is not fair of the law minister to blame the high court for the delay. But this wrangle cannot continue and I intend to put a stop to this."

Till that is done, however, litigants continue to suffer, especially with regard to habeas corpus petitions which can only be heard by a division bench of the high court. There are some 500 such petitions waiting to be heard in Tamil Nadu; often these come up for hearing after the detenus have already completed their jail terms.

Though the advocates agreed to lift the boycott on October 15 when Justice Chandurkar promised that he would look into the matter, the Government's actions have already sown the seeds of mistrust between the executive and the judiciary.

PUNJAB

Red Targets

COMMUNISTS, particularly those belonging to the Communist Party of India (CPI), are reaping a bitter harvest of death for their strident public campaign against terrorism. With the killing last fortnight of Darshan Singh Canadian, 68, former secretary of the state unit of the CPI, and Naxalite leader Baldev Singh Maan, 17 communist leaders have been killed by terrorists in the last two years. Of these, 15 belonged to the CPI and two to the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist). But the killings have only made the communists more determined. Perhaps nobody symbolised this more heroically than Canadian's widow, Balbir Kaur, who shouted even as her husband's body was being prepared for the pyre: "We are neither Hindus nor Sikhs but Indians. Down with terrorism. Long live India."

Canadian knew he was a marked man. Barely a week before he was shot, he had told INDIA TODAY: "People are our best protection. Death cannot deter us." And just the previous day, Canadian had told large gatherings in Tarn Taran and Raiya: "We shall never run away. We shall fight these cowards who love neither Sikhism nor India." Himself a scholar of Sikhism and Indian philosophy, Canadian would always convincingly quote from the Sikh gurus to prove that the terrorists did not even understand Sikhism. The next day terrorists gunned him down as he was cycling to his village Langeri and left a message on a slip of paper next to his body, saying: "We are silencing this voice opposed to Khalistan. It is a lesson for others."

In a spontaneous response, hundreds of his admirers rushed to block the traffic on the Chandigarh-Pathankot Road and did not let the police, whom they accused of laxity in chasing the killers, touch the body for six hours. His funeral the next day was attended by 20,000 people. Said a Chandigarh-based news photographer who has seen much blood and gore in the last few years: "I have not seen such genuine love for any political leader."

The communists, whom the late Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale always referred to as the "arch enemies of the panth," have been publicly opposing the politics of violence ever since the extremist problem surfaced in Punjab. Veteran trade union couple Satya Pal Dang and Vimla Dang, Marxist leader Dalip Singh Tapiala and left-wing dramatist Gursharan Singh have, for the last three years, held innumerable public rallies and meetings in which they have openly lashed out at terrorists. "We cannot be cowed down by the bullets of these cowards and must live and struggle among the people," say the Dangs, who live in tension-ridden Amritsar.

The killing of communist leaders by terrorists has only made the Left parties more determined to oppose terrorism.

Widow Balbir Kaur raising slogans at Canadian's funeral

The terrorists have responded by systematically annihilating—and often cruelly so—the more effective among the communists. Their targets have been either the forceful orators among the leftists—like Canadian—or those who provided crucial information against the terrorists to the police. Former CPI legislator Arjun Singh Mastana had raised armed resistance squads in several villages. In March, the terrorists lured him out by staging the beating up of a 'peasant' by some 'policemen'—and then shot him in cold blood. But perhaps the most cruel was the killing of Subhas Chandra Bose-associate and CPI leader Parswarath Nath, 65, his brother, Babu Ram, 75, and sister-in-law Bibi Guro, 77, who were all shot dead in their small provision store in Buanangali village in Amritsar district.

Following Canadian's killing, the communist parties have stepped up the holding of joint rallies and public meetings even in the worst terrorist-infested areas of Fatehgarh Churian and Dera Baba Nanak. But there is some disagreement among them on whether they should launch an armed counter-offensive. State CPI secretary Avtar Singh Malhotra says: "Let the state do its job and we do ours"; but many in the CPI argue for the harder option. The Marxist-Leninists have already announced that they will repay blood with blood. Warns Naxalite leader Darshan Singh Khatkar: "We cannot watch our comrades getting mowed down like fodder."

The communists are also keen on addressing joint public meetings with other political parties but are wary of the Akali Dal. Says Malhotra: "Badal and his followers are siding with the terrorists and Barnala always shies away from commitments." Another CPI leader, Joginder Bhasin, points out that though Barnala had announced that self-defence squads would be formed six months ago, the plan remains on paper. Says Bhasin: "We had suggested that committed political cadres opposed to terrorism should be supplied with good arms and ammunition and we had even provided several lists to the Government but Barnala has just sat on them." To all this, Barnala has a terse reply: "We are considering all these steps. We cannot afford to lose leaders like Canadian." But clearly, a well-defined political offensive against the terrorists is still very far away. Till then, the communists, among the political parties, will continue to bear the brunt of the terrorists' wrath.

KARNATAKA

Publicity Ploys

Karnataka Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde can be depended upon to be dramatic and unpredictable. With elections to the state's local bodies round the corner, the image-conscious Hegde is all set to unveil two unique publicity ploys calculated to impress the voters and to gauge their attitudes to his government. The first, is an opinion poll on the Government's performance, to be conducted by the Bangalore University. And the second is a series of 20 films showing the Government's developmental efforts in the districts.

The opinion poll was first suggested six months ago by the Jana Samparka Samithi (committee on contact with the people), a five-member official panel headed by Hegde which functions as the expert body on public relations for the Government. But the proposal crystallised only last fortnight, the delay being caused by the inability of the state's Information and Publicity Department to decide on which agency to use for the job. After approaching various professional pollsters and going into the costs involved, S. Krishnamurthy, the department's director and the samithi's secretary, came up with the solution. Krishnamurthy, an IPS officer who was once Bangalore University's registrar, decided that the university could do the job at the lowest possible cost: Rs 1.5 lakh.

But till late last fortnight, officials of the university, which has never undertaken such an exercise before, were racking their brains on how to go about their task. Said a university spokesman: "We will talk to statisticians and find out how to conduct an opinion poll in a scientific manner." The university's Journalism Department, which has been entrusted with the job, is also undecided on whether it should conduct the poll by itself or involve two more universities. And Vice-Chancellor D. Shankaranarayan refused to comment on the poll, calling it a "research project".

Nevertheless, the indications are that the university will appoint 19 field investigators (one for each district, excluding Bangalore) who will go around the villages and gather responses for their list of around 30 questions. The questionnaire will be given to a few thousand select people, "representing a cross-section" of the state's 38-million population. The field investigators will ask respondents if they have benefited from the Government's various welfare programmes; if not, why, and whether they have any suggestions on the present schemes or for the introduction of new ones. Vehemently denying that the exercise is an opinion poll on Hegde's image, a senior official said: "We are concentrating on the Government's programmes and nothing else."

Though Krishnamurthy denies that the poll is politically motivated, there is little doubt that Hegde is anxious to know its results before the elections to the zilla parishads and mandal panchayats, planned to be held next month. Said state Janata Party chief M. Chandrashekhar: "Perhaps the chief minister's idea is to gauge the people's mood before the zilla parishad elections."

Hegde's Government was also busy last fortnight finalising 19 documentaries, one on each district (again, excluding Bangalore urban district), eulogising the Government's welfare schemes. The 10-minute documentaries being produced at a total cost of Rs 22.8 lakh will be shown in the state's 1,210 cinema halls. These district-wise documentaries will be topped by a state-wide documentary (cost: Rs 2.4 lakh) to be directed by well-known actor-director Shankar Nag, a staunch Janata sympathiser, and will not only be shown in the cinema halls but also be submitted, somewhat optimistically, to Doordarshan as well.

That's not all. Hegde is even considering a Rs 6-crore plan to produce video films of his government's activities and to show them to the rural masses in 300 roving jeeps equipped with projectors. While this particular project is unlikely to materialise before the local body polls are held, the chief minister continues with his flurry of glossy publications on all and sundry issues. There have been about 20 so far, at an estimated cost of about Rs 50 lakh. The latest is a booklet entitled Judiciary Today, a strongly-worded critique of the Centre's policy on the appointment of judges.

Predictably, Hegde's publicity drive has drawn flak from his political opponents. Says Congress(I) leader M. Veerappa Moily: "All this is a colossal waste of public money. The idea of the opinion poll proves that Hegde is unsure of his performance." Janata leaders counter with the argument that while books reach the elite, films are necessary to reach the masses. And the expenditure on them is insignificant. Says Revenue Minister S.R. Bommai: "Publicity is not the Centre's monopoly. The whole lot of books and documentaries we produce in a year might cost what a minute of publicity for Rajiv Gandhi on Doordarshan would cost." Still, the conclusion seems inescapable that Hegde's opinion poll is a pre-election assessment being paid for by the state.

The Bank of England made no effort to extend to the provinces in the 18th Century. This led to the rise of private country banks.

With the spread of banking concept, many private country banks mushroomed. They were small enterprises who were allowed to issue their own notes of credit. Since banking is business in public money and trust, Governmental control on these private banks was introduced gradually in the areas of monitoring liquidity and credit.

In India, the commercial banking system underwent a series of changes with governmental control. It started with nationalisation of Imperial Bank in 1955, control over credit limit in 1965, direction to channelise credit to hither to neglected priority sectors in 1968 and nationalisation of major private banks in 1969 and 1980. Guidelines on branch expansion took the number of offices of banks to 6600 in 1966 to 27000 in 1977. Today there are over 51,000 branch offices. The expansion is more in rural and unbanked areas.

Today, Banking Industry is the epicentre of a nation's economy, touching varying needs of all people.

Vysya Bank, though in the private sector, has kept in view the national needs and priorities. Pursuing its founding principles, the Bank has always had the common man's welfare as the nucleus of its policies. Its deposit schemes are suited for his needs; its expansion has been mainly in rural areas; its credit flow has been to a large extent in the priority region.

This has enabled the Bank to grow with stability and success to the distinctive position it enjoys today.

With its philosophy to innovate, adopt and excel; with its trail blazing records and achievements, Vysya Bank's future is bright, full of better prospects for growth.

Vysya Bank— from a glorious past towards a brighter future.

Come, let us grow together.

KARNATAKA

Quick Fix

IF you can't lick them, join them. Clearly, Karnataka's Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde is the latest convert to this age-old dictum. Cornered by the caste-based agitation that had snowballed after the publication of the report of the Venkataswamy Commission on backward classes, and confronted by the crisis in his Janata Party over the same issue, Hegde finally chose the easy way out. He took those parts of the Venkataswamy report and the earlier Havanur Commission report which suited him, made a few additions and finally decided that under the new formula 92 per cent of the state's population would be deemed backward. Commented an amused Janata Party MLA: "Going by this, Karnataka must be the most backward state in the country."

Hegde hastily clarified that the fact that 92 per cent of the population was eligible for reservations did not mean that all of them were backward, since only those with annual incomes less than Rs 10,000 could take advantage of the reservations. "We all know that 92 per cent of the people are certainly not backward," he said somewhat sheepishly. But the ludicrousness of the situation was not lost on Law Minister A. Lakshmisagar, who opposed the move during the cabinet meeting last fortnight when the decision was taken. Asked which castes were not being given the backward tag, Lakshmisagar chuckled: "Well, not many."

Except for the Brahmins and a handful of other communities, all others have been embraced in the new reservation policy. But even those belonging to these castes are eligible for 5 per cent reservations as a backward special group (BSG), who are only covered by the occupation-cum-income criterion. Claimed an exultant senior minister: "Actually, we have covered 100 per cent of the population under reservations."

Most of the pressure that forced Hegde to capitulate was brought by the Vokkaligas, who were excluded from the list of the backwards by Venkataswamy, and the Lingayats, who were not included by the Havanur Commission. With 101 of the ruling party's 136 MLA's belonging to these two communities, it was always on the cards that Hegde would buy peace with both of them. And eventually, he included both the communities in the new formula, even ignoring a six-page note submitted by a senior minister arguing that there should be less emphasis on caste and more on occupation and income. Admitted a senior minister: "It was impossible for Hegde to deny backward status to any of these communities."

But for the Brahmins and some other communities, all others are included in the new reservation policy now covering 92 per cent of the population.

Photographs by MUSHTAQ AHMED

Hegde also could not afford to ignore the other backward communities, in view of the impending elections to the local bodies. So the new formula takes in its sweep 221 other communities, comprising 46 per cent of the population. This, coupled with the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (18 per cent of the population) and the Vokkaligas and Lingayats (28 per cent), take the total under the reservations umbrella to 92 per cent. The percentage of reserved jobs and seats in educational institutions has been retained at 68 per cent, against 45 per cent recommended by Venkataswamy.

Asked to comment on the new policy, T. Venkataswamy, a former secretary of the state legislature said laconically: "It is the sweet will of the Government." But most leaders of the two dominant communities are clearly pleased. Said K.S. Rame Gowda, the Vokkaliga chairman of the Central Agitation Committee against the Venkataswamy Commission report: "Now there will be a cordial atmosphere in the state." Former chief minister R. Gundu Rao, who had launched a satyagraha against the report, admitted: "I am very happy." But the state's Congress(I) leaders, who were caught unawares by the sweep of reservations, argued that the inclusion of a large number of castes would deny benefits to the really backward people. Said state party President Oscar Fernandes: "This is a highly retrograde step."

The new reservation formula will be in force for three years, after which the policy will be reviewed on the basis of the report of yet another commission which is to be set up—the third to go into this vexatious issue in the last 14 years. Hegde had earlier ruled out the possibility of a fresh commission, saying that the Cabinet itself would take a decision. The change in the Government's stand suggests that there is no unanimity among his colleagues on the new formula. Admitted Hegde: "I cannot claim that this is the most scientific formula."

One problem that Hegde could face is in finding someone to head such a commission. Says Venkataswamy: "No sane person will accept the job." But only the naive would take a wager on Venkataswamy's claim. Given Hegde's record, most people think he will find a way out.

MADHYA PRADESH

Return to Dacoity

LIKE nature, the Chambal valley abhors a vacuum. After a brief lull following the surrenders of the gangs of Malkhan Singh and Ramesh Sikarwar, the menace of dacoity is again witnessing a resurgence in the area. The two listed gangs of Bhind and Morena districts, dormant till six months ago, are again active. Acknowledging the renewed threat, the Madhya Pradesh police last month doubled the prize money on the heads of the two gangs' chiefs and despatched two more companies of the Special Armed Force to track down the gangs. Said state police chief B.K. Mukherjee: "The growing menace has compelled us to launch a special operation to track them."

Police operations in a Chambal village

But much has changed in the nature of the dacoit gangs since the days of the last dasyu samrat (king of the dacoits) Malkhan Singh. They are smaller—between five and 10 people—and hence

CHAMBAL OUTLAWS

Winning Move

HOW Chambal's outlaws win the support of the poor in the area was amply demonstrated recently by bandit Vidya Gadariya, with a reward of Rs 10,000 on his head. Gadariya rescued Rampyari, 40, of Bichi village in Shivpuri district, from flesh traders, had her taken to the nearest police station and wrote a letter to the police asking them to provide her with security. Ironically, the police had earlier tried to rescue her but failed.

Rampyari and her family members are naturally effusive in their expressions of gratitude to the bandit chief. Says Ayodhi Bai, her aged mother: "For us, he was like an incarnation of god." And Rampyari remembers: "He gave a good thrashing to my tormentors and while parting, gave me a blanket and 20 rupees." She proudly displays the new plastic chappals she bought with them.

After her husband's death seven years ago, Rampyari started living with her brother-in-law, a common practice in her Gujar community. The brother-in-law, now in jail, allegedly sold her last year for Rs 25,000 to Laxman Gujar of Dongri village. "I was kidnapped and taken forcibly to his village and kept there against my will," says Rampyari.

Rampyari

In August a police party on a complaint filed by her brother tried to rescue her. But Shivpuri Police Superintendent B. Handa admitted that the policemen were attacked by Laxman's relatives and friends, and outnumbered, had to flee for their lives.

But an unnerved Laxman decided to sell her. He set off with two friends through the Shivpuri forests to find a customer. They ran into the Vidya Gadariya gang on the second day, and Rampyari told him her tale of woe. He summarily dealt with Laxman and his friends and handed her over to a shepherd with instructions to take her to the nearest police station. "I was shaking with fear but the bearded bandit told me that I was a sister to him," she recalls.

Back in Bichi and reunited with her three children, Rampyari wants police help to reclaim her late husband's property. After all, it is not every time that a bandit chief will come to her rescue.

more mobile. But they are no longer politically influential since, unlike bigger gangs, they cannot influence the vote in their area. They also do not have as good firearms. Said a senior police officer: "Ever since terrorist activities have picked up in Punjab, the Chambal dacoits are not getting a sufficient supply of arms."

However, they are no less deadly. Raghuraj Singh Sikarwar, whose seven-member gang has committed nine murders in the last one year, has created a reign of terror in Morena district. He has earned the distinction of being the first to have his gang listed without having committed a single kidnapping or dacoity: he specialises in murders and extorting protection money.

Still, the most significant change is the induction of women into the gangs. After Phoolan, all gangs have begun keeping at least one girl. Says Chambal Deputy Inspector General (DIG) D.K. Jugran: "Women dacoits are the in thing now."

Chambal now has two new women dacoits apart from Kusuma Nain (she is believed to be in the ravines but has been lying low). Ramkatari, 35, who the police say is a good-looking washerwoman from Purawas village in Morena district, left her husband last month to join the unlisted Bengali gang. She believes her husband has wronged her, and is after his life.

The other newcomer Ganga Devi, 27, dark-complexioned and khaki-attired, became the fifth member of the Vidya Gadariya gang two months ago. Her husband, from Bhind district, allegedly sold her to Gujars who were trying to resell her when Vidya snatched her and made her his keep. Ganga, with Vidya's help, reportedly beat the Gujars up.

Badri Dhakad: no protection

But the police's real worries are the Sikarwar and Gadariya gangs. In July, Sikarwar's gang, as hired assassins, gunned down five persons in Mewada village. And he cut off the nose and ears of Badri Dhakad of Hatipura village when the man told him he was too poor to pay Rs 50,000 as protection money. Recalls a shaken Dhakad: "Sikarwar also told me that he would not spare a single dhakad (a backward community) in the area."

Sikarwar is a hunted man today. The police believe he was badly wounded in an encounter in Morena district in September—his second in the month—and may never be the same again. Interestingly, among the objects abandoned by the gang after the last encounter were love letters written to Sikarwar by an old girl-friend.

The bearded Gadariya, 25, who ties his long hair like a Sikh, has been active for the last two-and-a-half years. His gang has committed four kidnappings and a couple of murders. The police say he has survived so far because of the support he gets from his community of shepherds. He has already had two encounters with the police and although one of his gang members was killed and four have been arrested, he escaped on both occasions.

Gadariya and Sikarwar bear no comparison with the major dacoits of earlier times, but there is no guarantee that they will not become as deadly. Predicts Gwalior DIG A.N. Pathak: "Within a couple of years, a new crop of big dacoits will be ready." If that happens, old Chambal hands will surely say that the Chambal valley is living up to its reputation.

PHOOLAN DEVI

Trial Trouble

BANDIT queen Phoolan Devi, 24, continues to attract media attention. Last month, Phoolan made news when it was revealed that the Madhya Pradesh Government had issued an order that she would not be removed from the Gwalior Central Jail in "the public interest" because of a "likelihood of disturbance of public order" if she was.

A visibly-embarrassed Madhya Pradesh Home Secretary Vinay Shankar refused to divulge the reasons for the order, but it is obviously to prevent her being taken to Uttar Pradesh for trial in 74 cases of murder, dacoity and kidnapping. Since her surrender in February 1983, the Uttar Pradesh Government and courts have been asking for her to stand trial.

Madhya Pradesh's stock reply is that she will be sent after her cases there are over. Only three minor cases remain. Two have been dealt with. Phoolan did file an affidavit that she feared mental and physical torture in Uttar Pradesh as the administration was "hostile". She even moved the Supreme Court for transfer of her cases to Madhya Pradesh. "They can take only my dead body to Uttar Pradesh," she once told INDIA TODAY. But the petition was rejected and the Madhya Pradesh Government instructed to hand her over to Uttar Pradesh after her trial.

Phoolan Devi

Since the Madhya Pradesh authorities could not defy court summons from Uttar Pradesh, they seem to have resorted to a rarely-used provision of the Criminal Penal Code, Section 268, which empowers state governments to exclude certain persons from obeying judicial orders for appearing in court. It is also believed that the order is due to a commitment made to Phoolan by the Arjun Singh government that she would not be sent to Uttar Pradesh.

The order rules out the possibility of Phoolan ever standing trial in Uttar Pradesh. So far, Uttar Pradesh has not made an issue. But if it does, Phoolan will be even more in the news. For the moment, she is out of bounds for newsmen: after the order, the Madhya Pradesh Government has imposed a blanket ban on journalists meeting her.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Police Raj

THE image of the Andhra Pradesh police touched a new low last month when five persons died in police custody. The chain of gruesome tragedies, two of which were particularly horrifying, has sent shock-waves through the state as among the dead were those picked up for either petty offences or no offences at all. Though the resulting public furore compelled Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao to take the unprecedented step of ordering a judicial inquiry into each death, the sudden show of conscience was unconvincing. For, the state Government has in the past been lackadaisical in such cases, and the law is such that erring policemen are rarely brought to book.

The policemen's culpability was apparent in their own contradictory versions of the recent lock-up deaths. T. Muralidharan, a sailor with the Indian Navy, was handed over to the Vijayawada police after he was found wandering aimlessly and wanting to go to his mother. He was found dead the next day. The police first said that Muralidharan, a "mentally unsound man", had "collapsed when he was being taken to hospital". Later, they changed it to say that he had "committed suicide in the police lock-up".

Even more shocking was the case of the missing corpse. Devara Nagulu, Dasari Venkateswarlu and Kalluri Narayana—three petty thieves—were illegally confined by the police in Macherla, a small town in Guntur district. On September 15, the police announced that Devara Nagulu had died in custody. Suspecting foul play, the Andhra Pradesh Civil Liberties Committee (APCLC) decided to investigate the issue and its lawyer, Y. Venkatesarlu, moved the court to have the body exhumed. This was scheduled for September 24, but when the grave was dug up, the body inside was missing—only the mat in which the body had been wrapped was found.

Dogged investigation by the APCLC soon revealed that the dead man was not Nagulu—he was still in jail—but Dasari Venkateswarlu. The APCLC says that the police deliberately identified the dead man as Nagulu so that they could later produce him dramatically in court and show up the accusation of lock-up deaths as a false alarm.

The two episodes—the other three deaths were almost routine in comparison—led to protests and bandhs in Vijayawada and Macherla. The BJP sponsored a dharna in front of the secretariat in Hyderabad, and the Congress(I) accused the Telugu Desam of bringing about a "police raj". Sufficiently shaken by the public uproar, Rama Rao ordered judicial inquiries into all the deaths and the Director-General of Police, Clifford Saldanha, instructed the force to set free any detenu who may be detained illegally, and to give up "rough methods". In effect, the police chief admitted that many in his force were open to the charge of prosecution for torture and illegal confinement under Sections 330 and 348 of the Indian Penal Code.

Muralidharan: innocent victim

K. MARUTI

Though the furore compelled N.T. Rama Rao to take the unprecedented step of ordering a judicial inquiry into each death, the sudden show of conscience was unconvincing.

But policemen are rarely taken to court. Of the 59 deaths in custody since January 1984, the only case that has made it to the courts is of the alleged murder—by the police—of ENT specialist Rammohan Gupta in Vizianagram in June 1985. The trial in this case will begin now on October 27, thanks to the tactics of the 10 accused cops. The police were also indicted by two judicial commissions appointed by the Telugu Desam Government but Rama Rao is yet to act on them.

The only other way in which errant policemen can be brought to book is by initiation of private prosecution. Here also, the presentation of evidence becomes a problem because the only possible eyewitnesses, apart from the policemen themselves, are the other detainees. They, not surprisingly, ar reluctant to give evidence against the police for fear of reprisals. Admitting this problem, the retired chief justice of the Supreme Court, Y.V. Chandrachud, had pointed out in the course of a judgement against a Haryana officer last year how policemen band together to save their colleagues or even "pervert the truth" in such cases. The result, said Chandrachud, was that "persons on whom atrocities are perpetrated in the sanctum sanctorum of the police station are left without any evidence to prove who the offenders are".

The five judicial commissions notwithstanding, the policemen responsible for the latest rash of lock-up deaths in Andhra Pradesh will probably go scot-free unless, as the APCLC General Secretary K. Balagopal suggests, "the burden of proof, like in the cases of custodial rapes, is placed on the errant police". But till this happens, the police may well continue to get away with a transfer to another police station for the offence of murder.

DIWALI

Fiery Danger

WITHIN the coming fortnight Doordarshan will prominently feature actor Om Puri on a regular basis—not as a film star but as a man with a brief but serious message about the dangers posed by Diwali fireworks. In particular, Puri will warn viewers about conical anars (roman candles) which inflict a lethal toll of injuries during the two days of the festival. And Puri will be followed by Dr H. Keswani, secretary of the Burns Association of India, who will offer the advice that contrary to popular teaching, cold water—the colder the better—and not any ointment, is the best first aid after burns.

Says Keswani: "It is generally believed that water should never be poured on a burnt part because it produces blisters on the burnt skin. It surely does so. But a blister is a desirable indication of the depth of a burn. It is not the flame but the heat which damages the skin. Where the heat is allowed to stay in the skin for a long time, then it is well and truly cooked." A bucket of cold water, he advises, must be kept handy when playing with fireworks.

Doordarshan's media campaign for Diwali reflects for the first time the Government's response to consumer groups demanding new regulations on the manufacture of fireworks.

Doordarshan's media campaign during the Diwali season reflects for the first time the Government's response to a three-year-long campaign by consumer groups which have been petitioning state chief ministers as well as Central departments for new regulation on the manufacture and distribution of fireworks. The Government publicity campaign is also the result of the keen interest which has been taken by the Supreme Court in this issue. The court has accepted a writ petition filed by Professor Dinesh Mohan, a biomedical engineer in Delhi's Indian Institute of Technology (IIT), requesting not just tighter controls but an outright ban on the manufacture of conical anars which, the petition says, cause the maximum damage.

In response to the petition, the Supreme Court appointed a four-member expert committee to examine whether the conical anars, about 7.5 crore of which are sold during the annual Diwali season throughout the country, "should be banned in the larger interest of the consuming public". The committee has submitted an interim report to the court which, while not recommending a "complete ban" on the firework, suggests that the anar be made safer by increasing its size and thereby rendering it difficult to be held in the hand while being lit, placing prominent warning labels in different languages on fireworks, and the launching of a "vigorous campaign to educate the public by all means of media available". But the consumer groups which have been invited by the court to respond to the draft recommendations of the expert committee are not satisfied and have criticised its report in new arguments presented to the court.

Scarred by conical anar: lethal toll

According to studies conducted in several cities during Diwali by Professor Mohan, along with Sunil Kumar and K.P. Kothial also, of IIT Delhi, and Dr Mathew Verghese of Delhi's Maulana Azad Medical College, the two days in which the entire nation plays with fireworks turn into a frightening medical epidemic. According to projections made by them, burns occur in about two of every hundred households in the country, with hundreds of thousands of people, mostly teenagers, suffering serious injuries to their eyes and hands. The largest number of burns, almost 60 per cent, are caused by conical anars, followed by bombs and bangers, extracted powders, rockets, and phooljadis (sparklers).

The majority of the burn cases—many of them resulting in blindness—involve the conical paper-bound type anars which flare up early. The old fashioned anars with a baked earth container are involved in far fewer accidents. The expert committee's recommendations for more stringent standards, in terms of public education campaigns and improving the quality of the anar, will not solve the problem says the reply filed in the Supreme Court. The writ notes: "No quality control procedures in the world are hundred per cent efficient. As a matter of fact in India we can only assume low efficiency rates." The setting of new standards, the writ says, will "only give the manufacturers a license to keep producing a product that will burn and maim thousands of Indian citizens".

Educational campaigns against hazards, while certainly a help, the writ says, are no panacea especially when they concern teenagers "who are naturally inclined toward performing risky actions". For example, even though safety helmets have been proven to be effective in preventing head injuries, teenagers typically refuse to wear them while riding motorcycles and health warnings on cigarette packets have made no dent on teenage smoking.

While the fireworks safety debate is relatively new in India, many other countries, have over the last two decades taken strict measures to ensure safety. Canada, Japan, New Zealand, France, Italy as well as Eastern Bloc countries have not only banned hazardous fireworks but restricted their sale to only people over the age of 18 on the grounds that freedom to purchase explosive devices is not a fundamental right guaranteed by their constitutions. Nor does such a right exist in India.

Ten years from now, we may see a mask on your face instead of a smile.

Of late, we've forgotten what its like to breathe in fresh air.

The mists and fog we see are not those of nature.

They are all part of the unhealthy scenario created by pollution.

Creeping out of factory chimneys.

Blowing out of exhausts of vehicles.

Think about it.

Have you taken every possible step in not exposing workers to pollution risks?

Have you checked your vehicle exhaust?

This is the only way we can stop the fumes of pollution from blanking out our smiles.

End Pollution.

GORKHAS

Growing Violence

DARJEELING is burning. But Subhas Ghising, the man who ignited the Gorkhaland agitation in this pine-clad hill district of north Bengal, has moved into the shadows, his iron grip on the movement loosening for the first time since its eruption in April this year. Last fortnight, while incidents of murder, arson, inter-party clashes and panic swept the hill district, Ghising remained cloistered in his party office in Darjeeling town. "I am trying to keep the agitation on a low key," says Ghising. "I want to cool tempers." But instead of dousing passions, Ghising's retreat—which has coincided with a belated political offensive by the local units of the ruling Communist Party of India (Marxist)—has only allowed his supporters to resort to new levels of violence.

The agitation's leadership in the tea gardens and district towns appears to have passed into the hands of freely roaming bands of Ghising's party, the Gorkha National Liberation Front (GNLF). Even in the heart of Darjeeling town, District Commissioner G. Balagopal's personal bodyguard was divested of his service revolver. A few days later, a police jeep was stopped by GNLF supporters and set ablaze. The next day, three jawans of the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF) narrowly escaped when their jeep was attacked. Marxist MP Ananda Mohan Pathak was injured when GNLF supporters attacked the party office in Darjeeling town with stones and petrol bombs. Admits Ghising: "The decisions to retaliate or take any action will be taken by local convenors and committees at the lowest levels. This power has been given so that local units can take decisions in time. I can only advise."

Flush with this power, the party's second-line leaders are openly defiant of Ghising. On September 25, Ghising convened a party executive committee meeting where he advocated avoidance of a head-on collision with the CPI(M). Reacting to this, GNLF branch leader, K.N. Subba, angrily remarked: "I am tired of talks. Now it is time to fight the armed police and the CRPF." In several places, the GNLF is already resisting police action. In Patharjora, an old man was killed and several policemen injured when their attempt to pick up GNLF extremists was resisted by local GNLF supporters. One policeman later died in hospital. "We have to resist," says R.M. Darnal, GNLF branch leader at Panighata: "The police under the Marxist Government has become inhuman."

Whereas Ghising now talks like a moderate—"Since we want to remain in India why should we unnecessarily go in for confrontation and violence?"—GNLF supporters are more militant than ever before. Their new strategy is to impose blockades on Marxist strongholds in the tea gardens, preventing people from buying essential goods and children from going to school in Darjeeling town. Only those with small chits rubber stamped by the GNLF are allowed to draw rations and buy food from shops belonging to GNLF supporters. The police steps in when specific complaints reach them, but often the besieged settle matters themselves. Some Marxists broke out of such a blockade on Tukvar tea estate on October 3, armed with kukris and spears, killing one GNLF supporter and seriously injuring another. The police had to fire, killing one of them.

Progressively, it is the GNLF youth and the militant women's wing that is taking charge of the agitation. Intelligence sources claim that Ghising is under great pressure to include hard liners in the upper echelons of his party. Kuver Kharga, said to be a hard liner, was appointed vice-president a month ago and though Ghising denies it, it is reported that moves have been initiated to elevate other hard liners like Ganga Rao and S.B. Lama to the executive. Claims Ghising: "I know there are many people who want to kill in revenge, but I am keeping them out and politically and psychologically controlling the movement."

But for all that, the GNLF is now up against the CPI(M), which until last month did little in reaction to GNLF activity. Though Pathak denies that the CPI(M) has formally decided to strike back it is obvious the CPI(M) is going to fight fire with fire. Says local CPI(M) leader Bhim Yonzan: "All over the district, CPI(M) leaders are being harassed and forced to support the GNLF. But Marxists like me can never give up our faith in the ideology or the party, and the more we are pushed into a corner the more we will resist."

Following the burning of Pathak's home in Sonada, near Darjeeling, on September 7, Marxist supporters set ablaze several houses of GNLF supporters in Pechong Bazar, below Sonada. In the last month, GNLF and CPI(M) supporters have clashed almost daily in which six people have been killed in Darjeeling and Jalpaiguri districts.

Pathak: victim of GNLF attack

Ghising wanted to avoid a head-on collision with the CPI(M) but GNLF men have openly clashed with Marxist supporters. And now the CPI(M) has decided to fight fire with fire.

THE attitude of GNLF supporters has further hardened because of what they say is the partiality of the district administration towards the Marxists. Lawyers in Darjeeling point out that whereas over 500 GNLF supporters have been picked up by the police so far, only about 35 Marxist supporters have been arrested. The Darjeeling Bar Association, which has mostly Nepali members, sent a telegram to Rajiv Gandhi last month seeking immediate Central intervention to prevent "further deterioration of law and order caused by the partisan attitude of the local administration."

The lawyers' initiative is symptomatic of another phenomenon which poses a threat to Ghising's leadership: the increasing role of the educated people of Darjeeling in the Gorkhaland agitation. Its 'intellectuals' have formed a 'study group' and have become active. Led by Darjeeling Municipality Chairman Vijay Kumar Pradhan and Nepali Bhasha Samiti General Secretary Enos Das Pradhan, they shot off a memorandum last month to the Centre arguing that the "demand for Gorkhaland is a natural product of the democratic process in India".

Security forces on guard in Darjeeling

Understandably, this sudden move has anything but pleased Ghising. When some study group leaders approached him for positions in the GNLF executive, they were rebuffed in no uncertain terms. Says Ghising: "These people cannot lead movements; they are chicken-hearted cowards."

Despite his protestations, Ghising is increasingly becoming a prisoner of his own words. Today, he emphatically denies saying that "the Centre only understands the language of agitations," and says instead: "The Centre has promised negotiations and we should discuss our problems across the table." But hard liners use such statements—and his decision not to participate in bandhs—to support their contention that Ghising is going back on his commitment to pursue the demand for Gorkhaland.

For a while—especially when Home Minister Buta Singh invited him for talks—it seemed that the Centre would bail him out. But after Buta Singh's acquiescence to state Chief Minister Jyoti Basu's demand that no meeting should be held with Ghising without his concurrence, Ghising again seems to have been put in a corner. Basu's Government insists that the movement is anti-national and has to be fought. Should Basu succeed in severing Ghising's line with the Centre, the agitation and its leadership is bound to swing towards extremism.

As it is, beleaguered Darjeeling Superintendent of Police, R.P. Singh, is busy coping with panic calls and stray violence. Hamstrung by a force not equipped to operate effectively in the hills—as the state armed police comprises mostly plainsmen unused to the cold climate and food—and which is riddled with GNLF supporters, the police barely have the situation under control. "If the blockades continue to tighten, even worse violence than we have so far witnessed could break out," says a worried Singh.

Presently, the agitation is headed towards anything but resolution. The loosening hold of a now moderate Ghising, contradictory attitudes of the state Congress(I) and the Centre, Buta Singh's vacillation on meeting Ghising and the state Government's unyielding posture have created a witch's brew in Darjeeling. And the man who stands to lose the most is none other than Ghising who set the cauldron boiling.

PARKASH SINGH BADAL

"Ribeiro is creating terrorism"

THERE was a time when Parkash Singh Badal was considered among the most moderate of Akali politicians. Not any more. He has broken with Barnala, opposed the Punjab accord, attended meetings organised by outfits close to extremists and the funerals of people the police have killed as terrorists. Badal does not seem a moderate any longer, whether out of political conviction, or ambition to replace Barnala or out of fear of the extremists, who in the past have had him on their hit list.

Freelance journalist TAVLEEN SINGH interviewed Badal on behalf of INDIA TODAY last fortnight. The former Punjab chief minister often answered reluctantly, taking objection to some of the questions. But what he said, and did not say, were revealing. Excerpts:

> "The meeting where resolutions praising the killers of Longowal and Vaidya were passed wasn't ours. A guest speaker is not responsible for all the things that are being done there."

Q. How would you solve the Punjab problem?

A. First we have to sort out why this problem has been created. Because the Central Government and the then Congress(I) state government are responsible for all this.

Q. How?

A. Had they solved the problem earlier, this problem would not have existed now.

Q. You have always been considered a leader of the Hindus and Sikhs in Punjab. Do you still consider yourself as such?

A. My views are the same, but whether others like me depends on them. There are three reasons why some people call me a hard liner. One is that at the time of the accord, I was against it. Because I thought then that this accord will fail and the Central Government will not be sincere in solving the problem. Also there were more serious and important problems during this period. First was the release of military personnel, then the release of youth detained all over the country, and of course that the problem of the Punjab should be solved to the satisfaction of Punjabis.

Q. What were the other reasons?

A. The other thing is that I have condemned this commando action by Barnala (in the Golden Temple). I had warned him earlier during the sarbat khalsa that if he sent paramilitary forces into the Golden Temple our party will be finished, because this is a fundamental issue.

Q. What could he have done instead?

A. There was no problem there.

Q. There was a declaration of Khalistan....

A. Declaration doesn't mean....The only problem was that they wanted to arrest those persons, but when they were sure that they were not there and there were no arms inside....

Q. But they had challenged the Government, it was an act of treason.

A. But they weren't there, even the administration told them that.

Q. Why do you consider it such a serious matter that they should have gone into the Golden Temple?

A. It's very serious, you cannot imagine....

Q. Isn't it equally serious to spread hatred from the Golden Temple?

A. No this is not very serious....

Q. It's not equally serious.

A. No, whatever it is one can't go by only reasoning, it is a matter of feeling. People can sacrifice their whole families for this. It's an emotional thing. Earlier there was Bluestar, and look at the reaction. Sikhs can't digest this that a ruler, whoever he or she may be, should do this....

Q. Don't you think Bluestar was different?

A. This was as objectionable because this time there was no problem at all.

Q. If it was as objectionable why hasn't there been a massive reaction like after Bluestar?

A. There has been, there's been a split in the party.

Q. But the people haven't reacted.

A. They will. When the time comes you will see that nobody will vote for Barnala.

Q. You have been attending the funerals of some alleged terrorists, and you attended a meeting at the Golden Temple where resolutions were passed praising the killers of Sant Longowal and General Vaidya.

A. We went to attend the bhogs of those people who were innocent and killed in false encounters. Is it not my duty to go if someone innocent is killed in a false encounter?

Q. In the past year there have been over 500 innocent Hindus killed in Punjab, people who did not even have a gun in their hands. Have you gone to any of their funerals?

A. No I didn't go because the atmosphere was such....I tried to go to one or two places, but it wasn't safe.

Q. Did you write to them?

A. No. I'll ask you another question. Everybody expects us (Sikhs) to do everything but these 10 people killed in Gurdaspur recently. Has any party in India condemned this?

> "If we say we want autonomy, they say we are asking for Khalistan; if Jyoti Basu or the Andhra people say this they are very great nationalists."

Q. At one of the meetings you attended there was an open demand for a Sikh homeland.

A. What is there in saying Sikh homeland? Everybody says Punjab is the homeland of the Sikhs. Actually the situation is that anybody can say what they want except us. If we say we want autonomy, they say we are asking for Khalistan; if Jyoti Basu or the Andhra people say this they are very great nationalists.

Q. Nobody else is asking for a homeland for a specific religious community.

A. This is a very big subject which I can explain to you some other time. Our party is for the Anandpur Sahib resolution.

Q. What about the meeting where they passed resolutions praising the killers of Sant Longowal and General Vaidya?

A. It wasn't our meeting, we just attended it. A guest speaker is not responsible for all the things that are being done there.

Q. But do you support these resolutions?

A. It's their thing.

Q. Do you support the resolutions?

A. No, no, I've given the resolutions of my party. There are some points on which every Sikh party is saying the same thing, that there should be no killing of innocents, that there should be no security belt....

Q. But here you have a specific resolution saying these killers were heroes.

A. No, this is their separate meeting, I was not there at the time.

Q. Do you consider the resolutions a good thing?

A. No, why should I say anything?

Q. You have no objection to going to meetings where such resolutions are passed.

A. Look, there are certain points on which we have a common, joint programme. Supposing we fought for the farmers. The CPI or CPI(M) could have a joint front with us. But this does not mean we are following all the principles of the communist party.

Q. Who do you feel the youth of Punjab currently support?

A. They are with us, not with this Barnala. No Sikh is with Barnala.

Q. How would you solve the problems of Punjab?

A. The main problems have to be solved by the Centre. They should release military personnel (deserters detained after Bluestar), because a few hundred are still in jail and this agitates the minds of the people. The second thing is the detention of youngsters, then the killing of innocent youngsters in fake encounters. Then the various Punjab problems.

Q. The Centre's case is that when Barnala released about 2,000 people after becoming chief minister, immediately there was a rise in terrorism.

A. You read the statement Barnala made today, in which he says that none of the released detainees have participated in any acts of terrorism.

Q. But the police say something else.

A. Either the police is the head of the state or it's the chief minister.

Q. So you feel everybody should be released, even the people arrested from the Golden Temple after Operation Bluestar?

A. Yes there should be general amnesty. When one has to solve a problem then one has to take bold steps and not look at every little detail minutely. Why don't you look at it another way? Why don't you ask why nobody has been punished or arrested although 25,000 Sikhs have been killed (after the assassination of Indira Gandhi)?

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

Q. Do you feel that after a general amnesty there will be peace?

A. Yes, 90 per cent of the problem will be solved. In Mizoram, Laldenga has given general amnesty, so that even those people accused of killing military personnel have been freed.

Q. You have been talking about false encounters. But when you were chief minister you were accused of doing the same with the Naxalites.

A. One cannot say that there were a lot of false encounters then. This problem is different from that.

Q. In what way?

A. What should I say? Why are you asking me these questions?

Q. We want to know how you would have dealt with it.

A. You are asking me these questions just to put me in the wrong.

Q. When you are up against a man with a Sten gun, what do you do?

A. The question is, why did he come to have a Sten gun? Why have they become violent? Now look at these 10 boys they have killed in Gurdaspur. They say they were terrorists but in fact they were all innocent.

Q. Can your party guarantee that if the detenus are released the killings will not increase?

A. We can only suggest how to solve it, nobody can guarantee anything. They should also try and talk to the AISSF and the Damdami Taksal people.

Q. These are people who have had hit lists, with your name at the top. How can you talk to them?

A. I'm not saying I will talk to them. I'm saying the Government should.

Q. You feel that there cannot be a solution without talking to them.

A. I don't think so.

Q. Are you against the methods that Ribeiro is using?

A. Yes, definitely. He is creating terrorism. State terrorism is the worst type of terrorism.

Q. What about Siddhartha Shanker Ray? How do you see his role?

A. I don't want to comment.

Q. Do you see the situation deteriorating to the point that there would one day have to be Khalistan?

A. That I can't say. Nobody can say. After all, who could have predicted what has happened in these past four years? But there must be a political solution to these problems.

Q. Is a solution possible with Barnala in power?

A. It's up to the Centre, because the major problem is with the Centre.

Q. How do you see the immediate future?

A. It is not good.

Surprise Ending

LAST fortnight when Chavara Sarasan was traced and arrested by the Kerala police from Vensa in Karnataka, it created political tremors: his disappearance about five years ago had become a major issue during the 1982 Kerala Assembly elections. The allegation was that Sarasan, a factory worker, had been killed by the then finance minister Baby John for defecting from the Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP) to the Congress(I). Indeed, the 'Sarasan Disappearance Case' was used so successfully by his detractors in the election campaign against John that he barely managed to scrape through successfully.

John: vindicated

A visibly relieved John said last fortnight: "I have been exonerated. It is now proved that he was kidnapped by the Congress(I) and held captive with Gundu Rao's help." According to Sarasan himself, he was abducted from his house and threatened with certain death if he dared show his face again ever in the state. The speculation in Trivandrum is that this is Chief Minister K. Karunakaran's way of wooing the RSP strongman from the camp of the Opposition Left Democratic Front.

Stirring Passions

LAST time, it was Dom Moraes' book on Bombay that fed a Shiv Sena bonfire because the author had referred to Chhatrapati Shivaji as a Maratha rather than as a national leader. Last fortnight, it was Virginia Fass' The Forts of India that was the object of communal wrath after a prominent Bharatiya Janata Party corporator, Ram Das Nayak, happened to read it.

FPJ

Protestors burning Fass' book (inset): chauvinistic sentiments

There was an uproar in the Municipal Corporation, followed by a demonstration of BJP and Shiv Sena corporators during which a copy of the book, sponsored by Oberoi Hotels International, was burnt. The controversial paragraphs refer to Shivaji's caste—"Sudra", going by the text. Nayak has not only written to the chief secretary of Maharashtra asking for a ban on the book but threatened legal action against the Oberoi chain of hotels in the absence of a public apology.

The offending passage was not written by Fass, a well-known photographer who also has Palaces of India to her credit, but by an IAS officer, Vijay Sharma, and his wife Rita. Ironically, what has been forgotten, in the heat of the moment, is that apart from the magnificent photographs of Shivaji's forts, the book hails his creation of a Maratha nation by rising above caste differences.

Power Game

JAGANNATH Mishra, former Bihar chief minister and a restless soul ever since he lost the top job in the state three years ago, made his intention of pulling down the 18-month-old Bindeshwari Dubey Government more than evident on October 2. Mishra organised a "state-level convention of Congress(I) workers" which, he gleefully claimed, had attracted 50,000 workers, 70 legislators, 20 district party chiefs and two parliamentarians. And the message was that the Government must work or else the party would be finished. He also referred to moves to expel him from the party, and said that he was not about to oblige anyone.

KRISHNA MURARI KISHAN

Mishra at the October 2 convention: show of strength

Dubey and state party President Dumar Lal Baitha reportedly tried their best to stop Mishra, but to no avail. The former chief minister was also emboldened by his meeting with party General Secretary T. Anjaiah, which went off well, as did his 30-minute talk with party Vice-President Arjun Singh, in which he spoke his mind. Dubey's response to his opponent's aggression was unusual: on Gandhi Jayanti day, he flew to Ranchi instead of attending official functions at Patna.

Fall from Grace

THERE is never any knowing what M.G. Ramachandran will do next. Last fortnight, on the eve of the 15th birth anniversary of his All India Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam, the Tamil Nadu chief minister hurriedly summoned a meeting of his party's executive committee. Then came the announcement that MGR who is already president of the party, was also taking over as its general secretary from S. Raghavanandan. This must be some kind of a political first in itself. And this additional responsibility comes for a man who is already in frail health.

MGR: in control

But the eyes behind the dark glasses are really aiming to cut to size the faction led by Information Minister R.M. Veerappan, which had been in a buoyant mood after its leader's victory in a by-election from Tirunelveli. Raghavanandan had identified himself with Veerappan, particularly in opposing the imposition of Hindi and had sworn he and his wife would go to jail in protest if the need arose. It isn't the jail for him now; it is political wilderness.

TERAI SIKHS

Wild Goose Chase

THE 6.5 lakh Sikhs inhabiting the Terai region of Uttar Pradesh are up in arms over a door-to-door census of their community being conducted by the state police. The census followed a series of alarming reports from the state intelligence department that the area had become a hotbed of terrorist activity. But the head count and interrogations of suspects drew a blank, and as police officers themselves told Senior Correspondent DILIP AWASTHI, the reports were based on rumour and suspicion and were not founded on fact.

IN what has been billed as a pre-emptive counter-terrorist measure, the Uttar Pradesh Government has ordered the police to conduct a door-to-door census of some 6.5 lakh Sikhs who now inhabit a seven-district region in the Terai, involving house-to-house searches, questioning of the heads of families about the names, ages and addresses of relatives, as well as surveillance of pilgrims who visit the 300-odd gurudwaras in the area. The action has galvanised the mostly affluent Sikh farming community—comprising about 40 per cent of the region's population—into resistance through large organised meetings to protest what they refer to as their "second-class citizenship". Says Lakhminder Singh Dhillon, 55, publicity secretary of the Uttar Pradesh Sikh Pratinidhi Board: "Our backs are now against the wall. The Government has thrown the Sikhs at the mercy of the police and we are determined to fight this."

Map by B.K. SHARMA

The state Government's justification for this drastic head count, which threatens to alienate a hitherto peaceful Sikh community more eager to protect its prosperity than support demands for Khalistan in a far-off place, is based on 10 months of intelligence reports. The reports allege that the Terai is fast becoming a hotbed of terrorist activities like gun-running from across the Nepal border and illegal manufacture of lethal weapons. Filed by local intelligence units and the state Intelligence Bureau (IB), the

Census of Sikhs being carried out in Pilibhit: loud protests

A census based on intelligence reports linking the affluent 6.5 lakh Sikh farmers of the Terai with the Punjab extremists has sparked off charges from the community of second class treatment.

reports are a follow-up to Operation Shivalik, a massive police campaign launched in January 1985 to flush out terrorists possibly lying low in the Himalayan foothills. But by the police's own admission, the operation fizzled out and resulted in only one case under the Anti-terrorist Act. Still, intelligence reports continued to paint an alarming picture of terrorists holed up in posh and near inaccessible farm-houses in the Terai.

The Sikh community, it appears, has reason for complaint. When the police began to move into action on August 8, 1986, on the basis of the information in the reports, they found that much of it was either concocted or based on rumour. Raids on suspected terrorist hide-outs including 31 gurudwaras and 137 farm-houses—close to the Indo-Nepal border and touching the districts of Lakhimpur Kheri, Pilibhit and Naini Tal—produced no incriminating evidence.

IB reports had identified nearly 38 Sikhs arrested during Operation Shivalik as terrorists or criminals having links with terrorists. Police records, however, name only one Balraj Singh alias Balli arrested on August 16 in Bajpur as a known extremist and a member of the Jinda gang. Five other cases of local criminals suspected of having links with terrorists are still under verification. Says Naini Tal's Additional Police Superintendent N.R. Srivastava: "Only Balraj Singh fits into the terrorist category as he along with Nirmal Singh and Sukhdev Singh (arrested in connection with General Vaidya's murder) had looted the State Bank branch of Kashipur on July 21. We are trying to get Nirmal Singh and Sukhdev Singh to Naini Tal so that they can be confronted with Balraj Singh."

THE case of Sardar Mastan Singh is but one example of the dubious credibility of the alarmist state intelligence reports. He was detained on April 12 at his farm in the Singhavi police circle and interrogated about the whereabouts of one of his seven sons, truck driver Kala Singh, 28, who was not traceable. It later turned out to be a case of a runaway son and the police released Mastan Singh. But he is still listed in intelligence records as an extremist.

The Lakhimpur Kheri police also came up red-faced following an investigation of the Hemkund Transport Agency in Nepal, which was alleged to be smuggling foreign-made arms from Nepal to the Terai area through Lakhimpur Kheri, Pilibhit, and Naini Tal—and there on to Punjab. The reports claimed that the agency carried out the operation on buses, trucks, taxi-cars and jeeps which plied their way to Pallia, about 35 km inside the border. The owners were identified as Kuldeep Singh, Gurdeep Singh and Pritam Singh, all Sikhs now settled in Nepal.

But the police investigation revealed that the report was baseless. There is only one road link from Nepal to Lakhimpur district. India's last railhead, Gauri Phanta, touches the border of Dhangarhi in Nepal's Kailali district. There is only one road which links Dhangarhi to Gauri Phanta which has three barricades on the Indian side: customs, sales tax and police. According to the Pallia police, no commercial vehicles owned by Hemkund or any other transport agency are allowed beyond Gauri Phanta without crossing the three barricades. The second contradiction was that the transport agency, operating for over 30 years now, does not run taxis, cars or jeeps.

According to another intelligence report Sewa Singh, a notorious Punjab terrorist who was the bodyguard of dismissed Punjab SSP Simranjit Singh Mann, had a hide-out in Pallia and that he conducted a training camp for extremists in Hathia Soth area on the Pauri-Bijnor border. This report, in fact, was the prime factor behind the launching of Operation Shivalik. But a senior police officer in the area admits: "We did not find even a shred of evidence in this connection." Similarly, in Pilibhit which has a population of over 96,000 Sikhs, the police have recovered illicit but sophisticated firearms on a couple of occasions but have not been able to establish terrorist links of the arrested Sikhs. Intelligence records, however, indicate the arrest of nine suspected terrorists in this district in the past one year. "The only arrest we can qualify in this category is that of Sukhdeo Singh alias Sukha, the Uttar Pradesh treasurer of the All-India Sikh Students Federation." Brij Lal, SP, said.

The arrest of Raghuvir Singh, 50, a retired tank driver with the army's armoured corps and a maternal uncle of terrorist Harjinder Singh alias Jinda on September 25, is perhaps the only catch by the Pilibhit police so far in which another terrorist link may be established. Owner of a 150-acre farm in Madho Tanda, 5 km from the Nepal border, Raghuvir Singh was arrested for possessing a Pakistan-made self-loading rifle. The police dug out the rifle, buried near his house, following his interrogation.

INTERVIEWED in the police lock-up, Raghuvir claimed that Jinda had come to his farm-house in January 1985. "He stayed in my house for four or five days and was mona (clean-shaven). He had come to participate in the marriage of one of my sons and since then I have never heard from him or his family." But he emphatically denies knowing about Jinda's terrorist connections. He claims he purchased the rifle in 1973 in Rajasthan from a Punjabi Sikh along with 50 cartridges for Rs 5,000, but the police believe there may be more to it than this simple explanation. Raghuvir says that he buried the rifle due to increased police activity in the area and his known relationship with Jinda. Said Brij Lal: "We have arrested him for possessing an illicit weapon but you cannot call him a terrorist as there is no evidence to prove that he had indulged in any such activity." An affluent farmer, who owns a tractor, a jeep, and a jonga, Raghuvir has turned into a wreck in the police lock-up. "O te jinda hai, asee mare gai (He, Jinda, is very much alive, I am as good as dead)," he said with resignation.

Seizure of caches of arms in Ramnagar, Kashipur and Bajpur have been treated as cases connected with terrorism in intelligence records. But Srivastava says most of the cases involve not terrorists but rank and file Sikhs. Srivastava, Pilibhit SP Brij Lal and Lakhimpur Kheri SP Padman Singh believe that the region's Sikhs have been purchasing arms largely in anticipation of possible attacks on them or their properties by the majority community. But Sikhs living in this once densely-forested area, have traditionally kept arms and ammunition to meet the threat of wild animals and even bandits. "In the change of perspective now, especially after the Hindu-Sikh riots, the Sikhs have started further strengthening their arsenals and due to a blanket ban on issue of new licences in the state, they seem to have resorted to large-scale purchase of dangerous weapons like Sten guns or self-loading rifles or revolvers of prohibited calibre like the .455 mm," says Pushkar Sen, a senior IB official who is co-ordinating the intelligence operations. The police agree but do not have any idea about where these deadly weapons come from.

The investigations have only resulted in the arrest of Raghuvir Singh, uncle of terrorist Jinda, not on charges of terrorist activity but for concealing a Pakistani made rifle.

Raghuvir Singh's family; and (top) Raghuvir: questionable arrest

There is little doubt that the raids are angering the Sikhs. Says clean-shaven Keval Singh, president of the Rashtriya Qaumi Ekta Committee, owner of a cinema hall in Pallia and a posh farm-house in Sampurnanagar in Lakhimpur Kheri district: "We are no doubt being treated as the enemies of the country for which we have sacrificed so much." Adds farmer Darshan Singh, 65, also of Sampurnanagar: "When we fled from Lahore we felt we did not belong to that country but these days we are made to feel the same way in our very own country." But the granthi of Pallia Kalan Gurudwara in Kheri has no complaints against the police who searched his gurudwara several times recently. "We are facing all this because some persons amongst us have gone berserk. The police are doing what they are ordered to do," he says.

Police pressure has already produced a small exodus of Sikhs to the Punjab. As one prosperous farmer put it: "The farmers who have small plots of land are selling them off or are exchanging them with property of the Hindus who are coming from Punjab. As a result of this exodus, the cost of land has come down from Rs 25,000 per acre a couple of years ago to Rs 10,000 per acre. But people like me who have a big stake just cannot move out. We have to live or die here."

Police in Bareilly and Shahjahanpur agree that the growing feeling of insecurity is leading to a new quest for unity in the community. Officials fear that the recent census could create a new wave of militancy which might be effectively exploited by extremists. As a police official put it: "When you have got an elephant by the hind leg and he is trying to run away, it's best to let him run." But the silver lining in this situation has been the refreshing candour displayed by senior police officers who, while stressing the need to maintain constant vigilance against terrorism, have refused to succumb to the temptation of sensationalising the issue and have been willing to publicly criticise the credibility of their own government's intelligence information and reports.

Permit Problems

ENTRY visas for all Indians planning to visit Britain became compulsory from October 15, but confusion has prevailed at London's Heathrow Airport after the British Government announced on September 1 that visas would henceforth be needed for all visitors coming from India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Ghana and Nigeria. While some travellers have been arriving with entry permits, many others have been flying in with no permits at all. Harassed and overworked immigration officials claim there has been a "sudden upsurge" in the number of visitors coming from the five countries following the announcement, with some potential immigrants even trying to gain entry into the UK under the garb of tourists.

Heathrow Airport: restricted entry

The opposition Labour Party has, however, come down heavily on the new measure claiming that visas have nothing to do with immigration control but are a discriminatory restriction made on racial grounds. The party has promised to debate the entire issue and vote against it in Parliament. And the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, which is also unhappy with the decision, has branded as "monstrous" the fact that the decision was imposed so suddenly and without parliamentary debate. But the trenchant criticism that has been mounted against the visa decision by many ethnic and liberal groups in the country has left the ruling Conservative Party and the Iron Lady unfazed. Instead, an extreme right-wing ginger group, "The Monday Club", known for its radical views, has now called for sweeping visa controls to be extended to all new Commonwealth countries.

Musical Moments

FOR Asians in Britain the Asian Song Contest is the equivalent of the Eurovision contest, and with the best singers from the United Kingdom expected to compete, the excitement is obviously mounting for the ninth contest, which is to be held at Birmingham this fortnight. The winner of the contest is to receive a cash prize of £300, a gold disc from the Gramophone Company of India and, of course, the winner's trophy. Last year's winner was Najma Akhtar, of Pakistani origin, and the £1,500 that the event had raised were donated to a children's hospital in Birmingham. According to the organisers, "the star attractions" of the evening are to be Indian singer-cum-actress Salma Agha and her husband Javed Sheikh, a popular Pakistani actor.

Salma Agha

Asian music seems to be witnessing a boom in this country, if record sales are any indication. Amongst the most popular of the bands is Alaap—an eight-member group which sings Punjabi folk songs as well as Hindi film songs of the disco variety—which recently concluded sell-out concerts in Asian bastions in California, Vancouver and east Africa. For Diwali, posters in various London tube stations have already announced a "spectacular show", featuring Alaap in one of the "world's most beautiful discos in Watford". Alaap is also to be honoured with a triple gold disc for its impressive album sales by Multone (Polydor) records.

Ardent Indophile

TIM Pigott-Smith, familiar to Indian television viewers as Captain Ronald Merrick in Granada Television's The Jewel in the Crown, is the latest British celebrity to turn India-lover. Confesses Pigott-Smith: "I am under the spell of India. It opened me up. This very Indian union of the unaffected and the civilised will, I suspect, always elude and therefore always intrigue the English." Later this month, Pigott-Smith will also release his book Out of India, in which he has put together an anthology of pieces from various English and Indian writers. His choice includes some writings from the Rig Veda and the Mahabharata, some pieces by E.M. Forster, Rudyard Kipling, Rabindranath Tagore, Jawaharlal Nehru, Paul Scott, Eric Newby, Herman Hesse and Geoffrey Moorhouse, as well as some by Ved Mehta, R. Parthasarathy, Keki Daruwalla and Nissim Ezekiel.

Pigott-Smith's enchantment with India took yet another form when he recently performed a one-man show, The Bengal Lancer, based on Francis Yeats Brown's 1930s book.

Lost Hopes

FOLLOWING the visit of US Defence Secretary Caspar Weinberger to New Delhi and the issuance of a letter of intent to General Electric to supply its F 404 engine for India's light combat aircraft (LCA) project, it would seem that Rolls Royce's hopes of participating in the project with its RB 199 powerplant engine have ended. But Rolls Royce refuses to throw in the towel yet. A team from India's Aeronautical Development Agency, led by Project Director (Propulsion Systems), V. Gopalan recently visited the Rolls Royce plant. In a vigorous publicity drive, Rolls Royce has pointed out to the visiting Indians that the RB 199 engine is in service with Tornado aircraft in four countries and is also being considered in other LCA projects in Japan and Yugoslavia. Rolls Royce's links with Hindustan Aeronautics Limited at Bangalore stretch back many years, when it helped the latter to establish facilities that now produce the Orpheus, Dart and Adour engines as well as its Turbomeca Adours which are licence-built for India's Jaguar fighter-bombers. But all the past cooperation notwithstanding, Rolls Royce seems to have lost out on the LCA project.

Symbol of Growing Indian Confidence

Late forties.
A great civilisation took rebirth as a modern, vibrant nation. It was only during those days, GEEP (then Great Eastern Electroplaters Ltd.), under the pioneering leadership of Late Mr. M.R. Shervani, dedicated itself to the Indian people.

Inspired by the national will of self reliance, GEEP produced the first Indian torch with a total indigenous effort. Later, it added dry cells and miniature bulbs to its product line.

GEEP. Now a vast manufacturing and marketing conglomerate. A product of totally Indian effort. Driven by a philosophy of reliability and care. Care for its shareholders, employees, customers and the society in which it exists.

INDO-BRITISH TIES

Taking a Pounding

INDO-BRITISH relations have rarely been at such a low ebb. The list of current irritants is long and familiar. From India's side the main ones are British indulgence towards pro-Khalistan elements and its refusal to extradite known Sikh extremists—the proposed extradition treaty notwithstanding (see box). To this list has been added Britain's decision to make visa compulsory for Indian visitors. Whitehall, on its part, is upset with India's delay in allowing two British drug liaison officers to be stationed in the country. Moreover, Rajiv Gandhi, unlike the late Indira Gandhi, does not share the same personal rapport with Mrs Thatcher, partly because of the differences over South Africa.

Last month, a fresh shadow was cast over this bleak state of affairs with the election, based on the enthusiastic support of pro-Khalistan groups, of Mohinder Pal Singh Bedi as the chairman of the Anglo-Asian Conservative Society—the most influential body representing the Asian communities affiliated to the ruling Conservative Party. The election, which was supervised by Tory members of parliament, has also raised doubts about the Tory attitude towards known pro-Khalistan elements. Worried, the Indian High Commission expressed its concern to Whitehall.

Comprising wealthy Asian Tories drawn mostly from India and Pakistan, the society was formed 10 years ago by Narindar Saroop, an influential Lloyds broker and a die-hard Tory, as a "temporary bridge" between the Asian community and the ruling Tory party. The society's importance to the Tories is brought out most clearly in Thatcher's message to the society on its 10th anniversary. Gushed the Iron Lady: "This occasion gives me the opportunity to place on record my real sense of gratitude for all the outstanding work of the UK Anglo-Asian Conservative Society."

However, this year's take-over of the society by pro-Khalistan elements was on the cards. Last year, Saroop was re-elected president of the society only on the basis of their support. This manifested itself most dramatically when about 300 separatists belonging to organisations like the Babbar Khalsa, the Dal Khalsa and the International Sikh Youth Federation (ISYF), lustily raised pro-Khalistan slogans in the society's central office in Smith Square, Westminster.

This year, the pro-Khalistan factions showed that they had played their cards with finesse. For one year they supported Saroop and then, barely 48 hours before the election, put up Bedi, a child psychology teacher in Ealing, and a general secretary of the World Sikh Welfare Organisation. The support of Pakistani Tories was quickly arranged, and on the day of the election Bedi supporters were bussed in from Southall to the St James Court Hotel. While the press was firmly kept away and a posse of policemen looked on, many of Bedi's supporters openly canvassed for him—in violation of Tory central office rules.

The real nature of Bedi's support was brought out in Sandesh, a local Gurmukhi weekly. Sandesh alleged that Bedi and his supporters had gathered outside the Guru Granth Gurudwara in Southall and distributed membership cards without the permission of either the head priest or the management. More importantly, Sandesh reported that Sewa Singh Lali, a prominent member of the 'Khalistan National Council', had brought in a busload of supporters from Kent. It also said that one of Bedi's "close associates" was Bhai Gurmail Singh, chief of the Damdami Taksal, UK, whose name cropped up in the confessions of Manbir Singh, alleged perpetrator of the Muktsar killings, as an overseas contact who regularly sent large sums of money.

When INDIA TODAY contacted Bedi for his comments on Sandesh's charges, he declined to say anything. But Bedi's election has dismayed most long-time members of the society. Said a disgusted Saroop, who has disassociated himself from the society: "I now feel I have created a Frankenstein monster." Adds Sucha Singh Dhami, a respected Tory who had introduced Bedi to the society, that Bedi has neither the experience nor the clout to become its chief.

Bedi's election as chairman with the support of pro-Khalistan groups has raised doubts about the Tory attitude towards Khalistan elements.

The furore has also irked several young Asian Tories like Barinder Dhami who describes Bedi as a "controversial figure in the Asian community since the rise of fundamentalist Sikh movements in India" and accuses him of "using his band of Khalistani followers to frighten any potential opposition".

When asked for his comments on the allegations levelled against Bedi's election, Conservative Party Chairman Norman Tebbit said in a letter to INDIA TODAY: "I would not expect any organisation affiliated to the Conservative Party to become involved in the internal politics of other countries."

But the question remains: are the Tories consciously backing Britain's pro-Khalistan factions? Although there is no ironclad evidence, critics say that since Indians in Britain have traditionally supported the Labour Party, by cultivating the separatist Sikh minority the Tories are hoping to grab a new vote bank. The single most celebrated pro-Khalistan statement, which had sparked off a controversy, was by the party's candidate for the Ealing-Southall parliamentary by-election who had said: "...just as Sinn Fein, the political wing of the IRA is permitted to advocate the use of armed struggle to throw the British out of Ireland, so too the separatists (Khalistanis) are permitted to advocate the use of armed struggle to partition off the Punjab."

"I now feel I have created a Frankenstein monster."
NARINDAR SAROOP
Founder, Anglo-Asian Conservative Society

The large Indian community in Britain is increasingly convinced that the ruling party is soft on those preaching a separate Sikh state. While immigration from India and the rest of the subcontinent has been almost hermetically sealed, several people wanted in India have managed to gain entry into Britain. They include Bhai Gurmail Singh, Dal Khalsa's M.S. Bajaj and Inderjit Singh Reyat, a close associate of Babbar Khalsa International's Vancouver-based Talwinder Singh Parmar.

In its defence, the Conservative Party says that it is a truly democratic party. This is unquestionably true. But the Tories also have an extremist fringe which advocates the winding up of the Foreign Office, Britain's withdrawal from the United Nations and support for right-wing dictators world-wide. And pro-Khalistan factions are known to fraternise with "The Monday Group", comprising of these rabid right-wingers. Why the party should even think of courting a foreign separatist group which enjoys marginal influence within its own community remains a puzzle.

EXTRADITION TREATY

On the Cards

Both India and Britain are optimistic that a new treaty will be ready by the end of this year.

A BILATERAL extradition treaty between Britain and India is finally emerging. After arduous rounds of negotiations in New Delhi and London, differences remain on core issues but officials on both sides are optimistic that a new treaty will be ready after the third round of talks in New Delhi by the year-end.

This optimism is not misplaced. Contrary to British Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe's earlier opinion that the Fugitive Offenders Act (FOA)—which governs extradition between Britain and Commonwealth members—was an adequate measure, Britain's legal experts are now agreed that the FOA is substantially inadequate. India and Britain, it is agreed, need a bilateral treaty which not only embraces the provisions of the Suppression of Terrorism Act, which exists between Britain and other West European nations, but also includes such areas as funding of terrorism and incitement. Britain's anti-IRA extradition treaty with the United States, by which Irish terrorists will no longer be guaranteed a safe haven in the US, has also helped.

The key point of difference now concerns British-based accessories to a crime: whether someone in Britain who assists in a crime committed in India—by sending funds for instance—ought to be extradited and tried in India. The second contentious issue relates to the humanitarian safeguards clause, by which offenders living in Britain are protected for fear that they would not get a fair trial in their own countries. The Indians argue that the Indian judicial system can stand comparison with that of the freest nation in the world, but the British have refused to budge.

Other important issues on which broad agreement seems to have reached are on the question of extraditable crimes. Indians have put forward a list of specific crimes for which offenders can be extradited but the British prefer a system which embraces all offences that attract a sentence of 12 months or more in both countries. Britain seems to have agreed to extend the range of terrorist-related offences to which the controversial "political offence exception" will not be applicable.

Most important for India, Britain has conceded India's demand to apply the treaty with retrospective effect. Indians used the Anglo-US anti-IRA extradition treaty—which is with retrospective effect—as an example of this point. With just two major crimps to be ironed out, it seems reasonable to expect that a new treaty is around the corner. The crunch, however, will come when the treaty has to be ratified by the British parliament.

Suicidal Right

A mentally ill, 39-year-old Bombay police Constable, Maruti Shripati Dubal, who attempted to end his life last year, would never have guessed that he would create judicial history. But that is exactly what he did when two Bombay High Court judges, P.B. Sawant and B.G. Kolse-Patil, upheld Dubal's right to kill himself and struck down as unconstitutional Section 309 of the Indian Penal Code, which prescribes penalties for people who unsuccessfully attempt suicide.

The headline-hitting judgement last month had been preceded last year by another resounding verdict, handed down in the Delhi High Court by the then chief justice Rajindar Sachar, who quashed all cases in Delhi against people who had attempted suicide, but stopped short of striking down Section 309. Unless challenged, these two judgements will become the touchstone for deciding similar cases in other states.

It all started in April 1985, when the distraught Dubal, who became a hallucinating schizophrenic after suffering head injuries in a road accident, tried to immolate himself. To supplement her sick husband's income, Dubal's wife had been promised a hawker's licence, but bureaucratic procedures intervened and the licence was never issued. In desperation, Dubal marched into the office of the Bombay municipal commissioner, doused himself with kerosene but was overpowered before he could set himself alight.

Dubal himself does not remember the incident. He says: "My wife and four children were away and I was alone. The tension in my mind became unbearable. I don't know how it happened. I can remember what was happening before and after I went to the municipal commissioner's office, but about the incident itself I know only what other people have told me." His mental condition provided no protection and Dubal was prosecuted under Section 309.

Fortunately a criminal lawyer, Shrikant Bhat, took pity at Dubal's plight. "He was trembling and unable to articulate properly when he came to see me," says Bhat. The lawyer filed a writ petition before the high court challenging Section 309, which, he said, had remained unchanged since it was drafted in 1833. On September 25, the judges upheld Bhat's plea and quashed all similar cases being prosecuted in Maharashtra. The judges remarked: "Those who make the suicide attempt on account of mental disorders require psychiatric treatment and not confinement in prison cells, where their condition is bound to worsen.... Those who attempt suicide because of acute physical ailment, incurable disease, torture or a decrepit physical state induced by old age or disablement, need a nursing home and not prison to prevent them from making the attempt again. No deterrence is going to hold back those who want to die for a social or political cause...loss of interest in life or for self-deliverance."

"Suicide prosecutions no longer exist in any civilised society."
RAJINDAR SACHAR
former chief justice, Delhi High Court

The Bombay judgement enlarged on the judgement of Sachar and fellow-judge Malik Sharief-ud-din who had acquitted Sanjay Kumar Bhatia, a young Delhi boy who had attempted suicide: "The continuance of Section 309 is an anachronism unworthy of a humane society like ours. Instead of sending the young boy to a psychiatric clinic, (society) gleefully sends him to mingle with criminals.... Medical clinics (are needed) for such social misfits; but police and prison, never."

But Sachar was an angry man last fortnight because the Delhi police continued to file charges against fresh suicide cases. "Suicide prosecutions no longer exist in any civilised society." That view was echoed by Minoo Masani, president of the World Federation of the Right to Die Societies, who is happy that the "judicial conscience has moved ahead of the law. Parliament should now amend the law because, outside Maharashtra and Delhi, India still lives in the 19th century."

Masani's views are well known, but other responses indicated that a growing section of progressive opinion believes the law on this point is an ass. Thus, Dr Sarah Dastoor, director of the Samaritans in Bombay, and Vatsala Sivasubramaniam of Delhi's Sanjivini (both organisations that help disturbed people), welcomed the judgement as progressive. Suicide, they said, was a desperate cry for help and it was a shame to punish someone in this state.

Even the Chairman of the Law Commission, Justice D.A. Desai agreed. He asked: "Is the sanctity of life so value-packed that it can't be terminated by one's own effort, even though living life is death itself?" Desai, however, was in favour of strengthening provisions against abetment to suicide: "The Law Commission will say that abetment to suicide, making a person so miserable that he has no option left but to commit suicide, is murder."

Meanwhile, in Bombay, Dubal was taciturn about the legal excitement he had caused. "There is nothing to be gained by a police case for attempted suicide. Sirf nuksaan hi nuksaan hai. (It is loss all around.) What else can I say? It's for the big people to think about it." The big people—primarily the Supreme Court and the Central Government—were saying nothing. It seems unlikely that the Government will challenge the judgement, and the Supreme Court will come into the picture only if another high court takes a different view. Till then, the newly-established right to die by one's own hand remains intact in at least some parts of the country.

Three decades of devotion and dedication

1956-1986 LIC grows with the nation

In 1956, the newly-emerged Indian republic took a gigantic step towards its socialistic aspirations.

India's life insurance industry was nationalised. Though not without misgivings in some quarters. Would this 'monolithic' financial institution prove a mixed blessing?

Now, 30 years on, the Corporation's dedication and devotion are beyond doubt.

Through these years, LIC has been single-mindedly serving the policyholder. Helping improve the quality of life in the country. Impressively testifying that a large public sector body can act effectively and productively.

The Corporation's business has increased by leaps and bounds: from a negligible Rs. 336.37 crores at nationalisation, to over Rs. 7,088 crores in 1985-86.

With every valuation, bonuses to policyholders have steadily soared... a feat of prudent financial management.

Service to policyholders has constantly escalated in speed and efficiency. More so since decentralisation of servicing functions in branches, and the introduction of microprocessors in divisional offices and large branches.

The Corporation's investments in socially-oriented schemes have also surged from year to year – from a mere Rs. 8 crores in 1957 to Rs. 10,067.87 crores as on 31st March, 1986.

Pooling and mobilising the nation's investible funds, channelling them towards the most productive uses, financing the build-up of an industrial infrastructure, bringing the blessings of progress to the weaker elements of society through Group Insurance Schemes... these indeed are LIC's achievements in nation-building.

Life insurance today is no mere financial amenity. It is woven into the very fabric of India's economic and social life.

For 30 years, LIC has been fulfilling the promises that attended its birth. What better time than now to renew that commitment?

PFIZER'S PLANS

AFTER deciding to reduce its overseas share-holding from 60 per cent to 40 per cent, Pfizer has drawn up ambitious plans to expand its pharmaceutical business, but intends to try and stay a high-tech company without diversifying from its main lines of business. The company will be outside the restrictive net of the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act (FERA) once its foreign share-holding is reduced in the near future, and it intends to go in for the manufacture of the anti-rheumatic drug pyroxicam, doxycycline (reserved for non-FERA companies), tinidazole, and several others. Pfizer's FERA status had come in the way of getting some of these licences in the past, but licensing should not now be a hurdle. The problem, however, will be on the pricing front, since the Government's drug pricing policy is restrictive.

PROJECT DRUGS

IEL Ltd, the chemicals, fertiliser and explosives giant, has decided to diversify its operations, and has applied to the Government for permission to move into the relatively unfamiliar field of pharmaceuticals. The company has applied for an industrial licence to manufacture ethambutol and aminobutanol at a new factory to be located near Madras. The proposed investment of Rs 2.75 crore is expected to generate an additional turnover of no less than Rs 12.75 crore. Earlier, the company had tried to bag one of the giant gas-based fertiliser projects slated for completion in the Seventh Five-Year Plan, but had to back out for lack of resources.

CLOSING MOVES

WHILE the Government has categorically ruled out the sale of losing public sector companies to the private sector, the closure of others is still being debated in official circles. The proposal to close several units in the red had met with stiff opposition from the unions when it hit the headlines. The Government is now thinking of hiving off the unprofitable operations of losing firms and rehabilitating their workers elsewhere. Meanwhile, informed sources claim that at least one privatisation move failed to come off. Scooters India Ltd was put up on the auction block because it had accumulated losses of over Rs 50 crore, and both Escorts and Bajaj Auto held talks with the Government on buying it. But the Government backed out because the buyers wanted the company's bloated labour force to be retrenched first.

FARAKKA FACTOR

OFFICIALS of the National Thermal Power Corporation (NTPC) struggling to complete the Farakka super thermal power project have been stymied by factors beyond their control. Five years after they approached the Bihar Government to acquire the land for their merry-go-round railway line to bring coal from their captive mines, the land acquisition is still to be completed. Labour trouble has been chronic while productivity has been lower than at other sites. And now even foreign firms getting contracts for the plant have started providing for what has become known as the 'Farakka factor'. Ansaldo, the Italian firm supplying a boiler for the 500 MW unit, recently asked for 40 per cent more than comparative prices for the boiler at Korba and Singrauli. When puzzled officials of the NTPC sought the reason for this, the answer they got was the 'Farakka factor'.

FALLING RESERVES

AFTER a long spell of buoyancy, the country's foreign exchange reserves are on the downward slide again. The reserves have dropped by Rs 317 crore over the last year. The actual drop in terms of foreign currency is in fact much greater, because the reserves expressed in rupee terms are exaggerated as a result of the devaluation of the Indian currency over the last year. The reserves, which now stand at Rs 4,749 crore, are barely sufficient to pay for three months' imports: which is the danger level. If the reserves continue to drop and imports keep surging, the reserves will soon be well below the minimum acceptable requirements.

HOLDING OPERATION

THE Government may be keen on a merger of the two major airlines, Air-India and Indian Airlines. But an expert committee that was set up to look into the question has stopped short of recommending a merger, and has instead suggested that the Government first go in for a holding company that will act as an umbrella for both airlines. The committee felt that the two airlines have different cultures, and that an immediate merger would not serve any purpose in the absence of clear-cut plans by the airlines that would take advantage of combined operations. Some of the criticism on this point was directed at Air-India, whose representative on the expert panel took strong objection to some of the remarks that the committee wanted to make in its report. It now remains to be seen what the Government will do on the report. At least some members of the newly appointed airline boards are known to be arguing in favour of an immediate merger.

Burdened by Controls

HALF-WAY through the financial year, it is no longer possible to conceal the fact that 1986-87 is going to be a year of poor economic growth. The promise held out by abundant early rains has been belied by the prolonged dry spell in the north. By the time the monsoon revived at the end of September, much of the rain-fed paddy crop in Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and other parts of north India was beyond salvage. A 20 per cent devaluation of the rupee has neither stimulated exports nor discouraged imports, and industrial production, which had risen sharply in the second half of 1985-86, has slowed down again. Against 6.1 per cent in 1985-86, the industries covered by the Directorate-General of Technical Development—which account for the bulk of manufactured output—recorded a growth of just 4.9 per cent in April-June of 1986-87.

Of these discouraging trends, the slowdown in industrial growth is the most disturbing. Six weeks ago, the RBI drew attention to it, and a month ago Rajiv Gandhi met young industrialists to get their assessment of what was wrong. So far, however, no one in government seems to have any idea of the causes of industry's return to stagnation.

In its annual report the RBI has put the blame on bottle-necks in industrial infrastructure, particularly the sub-normal growth of power supply. Somewhat inconsistently, it has also put forward a "demand side" explanation, saying that the burst of new investment in 1985-86 which led to a roughly 50 per cent increase in investment authorisations, will take 18 months to translate into a rise in demand. The industrial growth rate should thus pick up towards the end of 1986. The second explanation is inconsistent with the first as it implies that slack demand, and not supply constraints, is the problem.

The RBI's explanation is reminiscent of those trotted out monotonously by the Government during the fourth plan (1969-74), and is born of the same reluctance to examine the causes of industrial malaise for fear of what they will find. The truth is that today, and for that matter throughout the '70s and '80s, the main cause of sluggish industrial growth is not to be found in supply bottle-necks but in dearth of demand; and this has been caused by the thicket of economic constraints that the Government has itself built.

In the last six years in particular, savage increases in administered prices of all industrial raw materials—notably steel, petrochemicals, non-ferrous metals and power—have conspired with steadily rising levels of indirect taxation (excise and sales tax) to push industrial costs up far more rapidly than personal incomes. There has resulted throughout Indian industry a move backwards, up the demand curve, to a point where producers do indeed maximise profits, but at a very high price and a very low turnover. At this point the demand curve is highly inelastic. The new taxes and further increases in input costs cause only a small fall in demand. Thus producers unhesitatingly raise prices to offset the rise in costs and taxes and the entire burden falls on the consumer.

> "The main cause for sluggish economic growth is not supply bottle-necks but dearth of demand due to the thicket of economic constraints the Government has itself built."

But at this point the nature of the market too has changed. Only those consumers are now left in it who have the power to increase their money incomes to offset the rise in prices that they face. As a result, they "pass back" the price increase in the form of higher wages, higher professional fees, or higher profit margins which further push up market prices. And the gap between this minuscule consumer elite and the rest of the population grows wider and wider.

The political threat implicit in this process is obvious, but does not concern us here. What does is that this minuscule market is an inelastic one. Just as increases in price or costs do not significantly reduce demand, the market simply does not have the capacity to absorb a sudden increase in supply without a marked fall in prices. This is what the regime of administered prices and high indirect taxes completely prevents.

Between 1981 and 1986, seven successive increases in steel prices put the market price of domestic steel at twice the level prevailing in the domestic markets of Europe and Japan. Relentless hikes in power tariffs by the state governments have pushed the average cost of electricity to aluminium producers to 54 paise per unit, against 23 or 24 paise abroad. And while the prices of all petrochemicals products have been falling throughout the world, the Government has been pushing these up in India.

In the same way, excise duties have been pushed up by the Central Government till they amount to 32 per cent of the value added in industry. Since the average incidence of import duties is only 18 per cent of value added, inevitably—as the Narasimhan Committee found when studying the problems of the capital goods industries—much of Indian industry is now enjoying a negative rate of production. This is partly why, despite the devaluation of the last 16 months, the flood of imports (notably of capital goods) continues unabated.

Several recent industry by industry studies have shown that production has fallen in precisely those capital goods industries where the rise in imports has been sharpest. The Government has tried to stem the flood by raising duties on several capital goods. But this has only pushed up the domestic cost of investment and production and further constricted the already narrow market. Lastly, competition—the only antidote to rising prices—has been choked by licensing and monopoly controls for the last four decades and government liberalisation measures in 1985 have been too half-hearted to change the basic monopolistic character of industry.

Nippon Denro Ispat delivers

Top quality galvanised sheets off the shelf -and onto roofs

October 5, 1985
Day One of the Nippon Denro Ispat success story.

And since then the pioneers have been in the fast lane of progress.

Producing and selling their entire licensed production of galvanised "Ispat" sheets.

All of 35,000 tonnes.

What made this happen? To put it simply, quality and customer service.

Ispat Sheets had to live up to every single quality attribute of imported sheets — till then the only viable alternative.

Now, the era of thin gauge galvanised sheets made in India had begun.

With "Ispat" Sheets from Nippon Denro Ispat. Tough. Light. Bright. Corrosion-resistant. Crack-free upon corrugation.

And, of course spangled.

Advanced technology of tomorrow, to deliver a high quality product today

Every single "Ispat" Sheet bears the distinctive "spangle" or "phool" which customers judge it by. The result of maintaining stringent production standards

Zinc and antimony of the highest purity are used for coating "Ispat" Sheets. The operation is performed at a precisely controlled temperature.

To ensure that nothing but the best leaves the Nippon Denro Ispat factory, every critical stage of production is constantly monitored — round the clock — by computers.

No wonder people all over India are buying every single "Ispat" Sheet. And asking for more.

Reason enough for the Company to set itself new goals for the future.

Challenges met. Commitments honoured.

That's precisely why the success story of Nippon Denro Ispat continues.

Now making "Ispat" galvanised sheets available off the shelf. Throughout India.

Nippon Denro Ispat, as leaders, value quality. As their customers do. As you do.

TWO-WHEELERS

Rough Riding

SUDDENLY two-wheelers are going through a rough ride. The market is still expanding, production is going up, and new capacity continues to get installed. But all the road signs point to a shake-out in the market.

Andhra Pradesh Scooters has had nearly 60 per cent of its customers cancelling their bookings, and production lines are working at less than half their capacity. Says S.D.M. Rao, the company's managing director: "The set-back has led to a cut in production. We have lowered our monthly target by 1,000 scooters." Ideal Jawa and Enfield India are faced with rapidly dwindling market shares. Lohia Machines has had about a quarter of its 22 lakh customers cancelling their bookings, forcing the company to introduce a new model. Kelvinator of India is phasing out its scooters because they have sold poorly, and is now placing its bets on mopeds instead. And Gujarat's Girnar Scooters was recently forced to appeal to the Industrial Development Bank of India (IDBI) for financial help, one of the several companies to do so.

From coast to coast, the two-wheeler market is in the throes of unprecedented turmoil. Waiting-lists are disappearing, the premia on vehicles have dropped, manufacturers are budgeting more for advertising and grimly fighting it out on the television screen. Thus, Enfield and TVS can give deliveries in a week. The premium on Bajaj scooters three years ago was as much as Rs 4,000, but is now down to less than Rs 1,000, and the waiting-list is down from eight years to nine months. And Andhra Pradesh Scooters is jacking up its spending on advertising fivefold, from Rs 30 lakh last year to Rs 160 lakh next year.

Three years ago, manufacturers were falling over one another to tie up foreign collaborations, racing to the Government for licences or quickly expanding their plants. The outcome of that burst of activity is only too visible today. The Government has licensed production capacities for over 3.6 million two-wheelers. And industry executives estimate that installed production capacity will be some 2.8 million vehicles in the next couple of years. With the demand for two-wheelers officially pegged at 1.8 million by 1990, surplus capacities are inevitable.

The industry, however, believes that trouble is yet a good way down the road. Last month, the Automobile Manufacturers' Association of India met in Bombay and confidently predicted that manufacturers would be able to hawk two million vehicles four years from now, two lakh more than the official estimate. Says Rahul Bajaj, chairman and managing director of Bajaj Auto: "The two-wheeler market is buoyant and booming. Look at our production figures. We are doing extremely well." Echoes Arun Firodia, managing director of Bajaj Tempo, which recently kicked off its Kinetic Honda scooters: "This talk of a slump is meaningless. What has happened is that the premium market has virtually disappeared. But the number of scooters sold is increasing every day."

Firodia is right. Production is actually on the upswing (see chart). The industry's barons, in fact, contend that the market will only balloon further because cities are rapidly growing and people do not want to trade off the freedom given by personalised transport for public transport. Hoji Wanake, who is on deputation from Honda to Kinetic Honda as joint managing director, argues that what India is seeing is part of a logical cycle which every country goes through. "In terms of numbers," he reasons, "the market is heading for a boom. One starts off as a pedestrian, graduates to a bus, then to a scooter and finally to a car. In Taiwan and Japan, they have reached the last stage. India is on the threshold of the third. All the signals read 'go' for us now."

THE signals may read 'go' for the big boys like Hero Honda, which still claim waiting-lists of up to eight lakh or more, but there is little doubt that the market is in the midst of a shake-out. As Hero Honda's Managing Director Raman Kant Munjal puts it: "A total restructuring of the market is going on." So the casualties could well be the smaller fry and the older companies.

Several of the moped and scooter firms launched by various state governments have called it a day already, while the three older motorcycle brands have lost ground to the Japanese onslaught. According to one industry analysis, Escorts, Enfield and Royal Jawa accounted for 86 per cent of the motorcycle market in the first half of last year, while the new-comers (Suzuki, Hero Honda and the Escorts Yamaha) had a market share of 13 per cent. This year, the positions have been dramatically reversed: the old models' market share is 44.5 per cent. The newer brands have cornered 55 per cent of the market—even though they are far more expensive than the older ones.

"It's not fair to compare totally dissimilar products," protests Escorts' Assistant Vice-President P.S. Batra. "Like should be compared with like. Within the Indian segment, we've been growing." That may be so, but competitors say that Escorts' 175 cc Rajdoot has been losing some of its potential buyers to the company's 100 cc Yamaha. Batra may be conceding the point when he candidly acknowledges the fact that "Escorts would have been hurt if we hadn't introduced the Yamaha a year ago."

The new motorcycles clearly have been a big hit. But if they are riding the crest of the sales wave, the new scooters and mopeds are not. But with a market share of well over 60 per cent, Bajaj continues to straddle the market like a colossus. "The new brands have a long way to go. Bajaj may be old in the market but it's a very sound scooter technically," says Munjal admiringly. Equally important, the new 100 cc scooters did not go down well with buyers. Explains Rakesh Jayal of Lohia Machines: "Everyone mistook the 100 cc engine displacement for horsepower. This was a psychological barrier."

On the moped front, the problem appears to have been price. At over Rs 7,000, many of the new mopeds were beyond the pockets of the lower middle class clientele. So manufacturers such as Shree Chamundi Mopeds are readying to launch cheaper models. Said Chamundi Chairman A.P. Mehta: "The cost of the vehicle will come down due to indigenisation of parts and will be more or less (on par) with the other two-wheelers."

Indeed, almost every two-wheeler company rocked by the competition is busy protecting its flanks and has plans to diversify. Andhra Pradesh Scooters has a 50 cc moped and a bigger scooter on its drawing-boards. And Enfield is moving into consumer electronics. Says an Enfield official: "The diversification into television sets and electronics is to make sure that Enfield doesn't rest on its two-wheeler oars."

Predicts the managing director of one of the older two-wheeler firms: "Fifty per cent of the two-wheeler companies will close down in the next 18 months. Only the fittest will survive." And Amit Chaturvedi, deputy general manager of Hero Honda, forecasts: "Not more than 12 companies will last till 1990." IDBI seems to partly share this pessimism. It has urged several losing two-wheeler concerns to merge or develop common ancillary suppliers. If they swallow the prescription, a slimmer industry may be in the offing sooner than expected.

NATIONAL SILICON FACILITY

Raising a Sandstorm

THE decision is taken to set up an expensive plant with foreign technology when local know-how is in the works. A controversy snowballs and the prime minister orders the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) to look into the matter. The agency cross-questions top drawer bureaucrats who would not normally be subjected to such an indignity. The CBI even asks for permission to search their homes, without success. In the end, it comes up with a headline-hitting report that indicts a pantheon of officials. And an embarrassed government asks the high-ranking functionaries for their version of events.

That improbable scenario has unfolded on a deal with an American company to produce a material vital to the country's electronics and solar energy programmes—silicon. The cabinet secretary has sought and obtained an explanation from most of the officials who figure in the CBI report: S.R. Vijaykar, secretary to the Department of Electronics (DOE), former DOE secretary P.P. Gupta who now heads the state-owned Computer Maintenance Corporation (CMC), S. Varadarajan, former director-general of the Council for Scientific and Industrial Research, DOE Joint Secretary N.W. Nerurkar, and Additional Secretary Ashok Parthasarathy of the Department of Science and Technology. While the officials themselves declined comment, an informed source said that "explanations were sought only on some issues relating to the language in the files." He also dismissed the CBI report, arguing that the agency "did not understand science".

Nonetheless, indictments of such senior bureaucrats have been rare in recent times. An official committee's decision over two years ago to sign up with Hemlock Semiconductors for the 200-tonne, Rs 92-crore National Silicon Facility (NSF) stirred a hornets' nest in the Government itself and among scientists. The issues involved: the project's high cost and the resort to foreign technology.

Critics argued that there was an indigenous, cheaper source for silicon. Building on the efforts of the Indian Institute of Science in Bangalore and the National Chemical Laboratory in Pune, the Tamil Nadu-based Mettur Chemical and Industrial Corporation put up a 25-tonne silicon plant for a mere Rs 4 crore. As the arguments heated up, various scientific wings of the Government took sides, the NSF project was virtually put in cold storage and the prime minister finally ordered an inquiry into the increasingly messy affair.

The CBI after questioning top drawer bureaucrats, came up with a headline-hitting report that indicts a pantheon of officials for blithely disregarding reports testifying to the quality of Mettur's silicon.

Vijaykar

Varadarajan

P.P. Gupta

The outcome of that investigation was submitted to the cabinet secretary some months ago. The 50-page document accuses the electronics secretary and his aides (Parthasarathy was a key Electronics Department functionary then) of blithely disregarding reports testifying to the quality of Mettur's silicon even as they aggressively pushed ahead with the Hemlock deal. As evidence, the report cites jottings on departmental files. Gupta and Varadarajan are let off more lightly—the first is held responsible because the deal went through when he headed the DOE (insiders say that Gupta had in fact been personally opposed to the Hemlock tie-up); the second is assailed for backing Hemlock in a report to the Government early last year. Varadarajan is believed to have concluded that while Mettur had done good work, the company would need much more time to scale up its processes to commercial levels.

If the CBI report is to be believed, obduracy and not corruption impelled the officials to act as they did. Says an investigating official: "They were on an ego trip and stuck to their positions." But undaunted by the latest salvo fired at it, the DOE has stuck to its guns. It recently turned down the report of an official four-member team that returned from Mettur convinced that the company's silicon qualified for the solar energy programme. Explained a DOE official: "The committee had a seven-day deadline. It did whatever it could in this period. We wanted to know what the average monthly production was but the committee went by what Mettur said. It didn't check the quality of the silicon but merely produced reports that the company had submitted in 1984. So we have told the Central Government that Mettur still faces problems."

Critics of the Hemlock deal were quick to counter that the department had rejected the recommendations of its own experts, two of whom were members of the latest committee. Said a critic: "First they claimed that Mettur did not have the capability, then that it had only a pilot plant, and then that the company was not producing enough. Now it is saying this."

If that signified anything last fortnight, it was that the NSF controversy was about to erupt again. Old charges are being dusted off the shelves and new ones are being aired. Certainly, the CBI report seems to lend support to some of the long-standing complaints that are aired about both the controversial project and the DOE itself. The Department of Non-Conventional Energy Sources (DNES), which is responsible for the solar energy programme and will therefore be the major user of silicon, has consistently argued that Hemlock's technology will become obsolete in the next few years because cheaper amorphous silicon techniques are round the corner both at home and abroad. In fact, seven laboratories in the country are right now developing precisely this.

In any event, NSF would be charging Rs 1,100 per kg of silicon, some Rs 100 to Rs 300 more than the international price of silicon, even though NSF is assured of cheap power. Mettur could have produced at half the price had it been given the same advantage. NSF's critics also contend that the bill for the project should not have exceeded Rs 25 crore, as a report by the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in the US shows. Finally, the NSF's 200-tonne production capacity is far too high because the demand for polysilicon by 1990 will not exceed 30 tonnes.

Tagged on to these are some fresh allegations. For one, the DOE failed to invite global tenders before it approached Hemlock, thereby closing the door on less expensive options (example: an East German offer was rejected). For another, key officials in the DOE rammed the Hemlock deal through government committees, brushing critical opinions under the carpet. And last year, the public sector Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd (BHEL) had sampled some of Mettur's silicon and testified to its quality. Mettur had also submitted to the DOE a report by the California-based Midac Corporation which said that "the material we have seen is fully the equal of any made by the large poly suppliers". Several government laboratories have also tested Mettur's silicon and given it good chits.

A DOE official conceded that global tenders were not invited for the project: "There may have been a procedural lapse. But there are only a handful of companies in the business worldwide and a committee had visited them and found the Hemlock offer the lowest." He also argued that the East German firm's offer came late and would in any case have cost the same as Hemlock's because the quotation excluded critical equipment. Said the official: "Statements have been made on the basis of what the East German company's agent said. We had detailed discussions with the company and found that the East German plant would cost the same as Hemlock's."

Referring to the charge of having ignored reports certifying the quality of Mettur's silicon, the official claimed that when basic decisions about the project were taken in 1982 Mettur did not produce any scientific evidence of its capability, and that the company has yet to submit satisfactory proof. "The crucial point was the end of 1982. The NSF project could have been stopped then. No one has ever investigated whether Mettur had any documentary proof. We also analysed the Midac report and other reports. All of them said that more samples from different batches were required to test the consistency of the product."

He may have a point. Mettur officials have privately said in the past that they had not fully taken the Government into confidence because they apprehended that their technology would be pilfered. A BHEL official also explained last fortnight that the public sector company had used Mettur's silicon to produce photovoltaic cells and found its quality satisfactory, but felt that the silicon sample was not large enough to pass a final judgement. BHEL therefore plans to place an order on Mettur for 100 kg of silicon.

But the DOE's current stance is somewhat more helpful to Mettur than it was back in 1982. It now contends that the Mettur and NSF projects have always been separate issues, and that Mettur can always manufacture and sell silicon regardless of the NSF venture. A DOE official went as far as to say that the department had in fact helped Mettur, which had faced power problems and so could not implement its licence for two years. The DOE recommended a two-year extension of its licence instead of the one year's extension that is normally granted. The department had also ensured that the silicon import requirements were arrived at after providing for what local companies like Mettur could supply.

The official also argued that Hemlock's costs could hardly be exorbitant when it was competing successfully in the world market, and that a 200-tonne plant cost almost the same as a 50-tonne plant.

Advocates of the NSF proposal are also quick to argue that if Hemlock's technology is likely to become obsolete in two years because of the development of amorphous silicon technology, so will Mettur's. But Mettur Director R.V. Ramani counters this with the assertion that his firm's technology converts energy more efficiently and that amorphous silicon degrades faster than polysilicon. Says Ramani: "At the most, amorphous silicon may replace some of the polysilicon as far as photovoltaic cells for the solar energy programme go. It cannot replace polysilicon in electronic uses."

Meanwhile, 35 per cent of Hemlock's $6.7 million fee for know-how and training personnel has already been handed over to the US company and another 35 per cent is due now. If the Government decides to back out of the deal, it may have to shell out at least this amount. Hanging on to Hemlock will of course prove more expensive. Whether it will also prove as harmful as the Socratic poison is what the Government will now have to decide.

—PALAKUNNATHU G.MATHAI and TANIA MIDHA with bureau reports

The Department of Electronics has once again rejected the report of an official four-member team that said Mettur's silicon qualified for the solar energy programme.

GOLD SMUGGLING

On the Rise

AFTER a brief lull, the smuggling of gold into India is again on the rise. In the first six months of 1986, Customs officials across the country seized almost twice as much gold as in the same period last year. Till June, 2,525 kg of smuggled gold valued at Rs 52 crore was seized, up from 1,306 kg worth Rs 27 crore last year. Said P.K. Kapoor, collector of customs at Bombay's Sahar airport: "The growing difference in the Indian and international prices of gold (now up to Rs 80,000 per kg) has become a big incentive for such smuggling."

If more gold is now being smuggled in, it is also being brought in for a different purpose. Traditionally, the flip side of gold being smuggled in was silver being smuggled out (since silver is priced higher abroad than in the country). But with the domestic and global prices of silver converging, its place has been taken by drugs. And Customs officials are clearly worried by the new nexus between gold and drugs smuggling.

Gold smugglers have also developed new, ingenious ways of bringing in the yellow metal. Traditionally, gold used to be concealed in chocolates, beaten into sheets and placed inside permissible goods, strapped tightly around women's thighs, and tucked cosily into corset belts.

But increasingly, the favoured route is the rectum. Recently, 36 bars of gold were recovered in Bombay from the posteriors of four men returning from Haj, and 39 bars from six men who had flown in from Hong Kong.

The use of the rectum is the hardest to detect for investigating officials. Still, there are the tell-tale signs. Said a Customs officer: "They put the gold bars in half an hour before landing. But by the time they reach the customs enclosure they are quite anxious to get out. They perspire as a result of the pressure, develop wrinkles below their eyes and are fidgety."

Customs officials say that their drive against smuggling has been greatly helped by the enhanced rewards scheme introduced for informers last year by the Government. An informer gets Rs 350 for each 10 gram of pure gold seized. The smuggling syndicates pay far less to a courier, who (if he gets caught) usually goes to jail for at least two to three years.

But if he turns informer he not only gets protection from the police, he can also continue to be a courier. He runs little risk of exposure, as his identity is known only to the seniormost officer, and the file on him bears no identifiable name or signature, only his thumb impression. Said a Customs officer: "So far not one informer has been exposed, and they continue to collect the reward, tax free."

But representatives of jewellers' associations feel that the anti-smuggling drive can never eliminate the menace of gold smuggling; for that the Gold Control Act—enacted in 1983—must be repealed. "Because of the ban on gold imports imposed by the Act, smugglers have come to occupy a predominant position," says Arvind Jhaveri, secretary of the Chamber of Jewellers and Gold Dealers Associations of India.

DHYAN SINGH

Officials displaying seized gold

Jhaveri estimates that Rs 2,800 crore worth of gold was smuggled into the country last year. If the Government allowed passengers to bring in small amounts of gold on payment of duty, he argues, hundreds of crores of revenue would be generated.

The Finance Ministry has set up a gold policy study group to review the Act. But until a more rational policy is evolved and implemented stringently for the import of gold, smugglers can be expected to employ all manner of ingenious methods to satisfy the Indian's unappeasable hunger for gold; and the cat and mouse game between the smugglers and the Customs officials will continue.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Saving Scheme

THEY call it the 'Gujarat model'. And for a troubled textile industry, it spells hope amidst gloom. For with the majority of the country's 880 textile mills in various stages of sickness, and even the 160 nationalised mills in no great shape, the industry's future is bleak unless it can find a solution that works. And the 'Gujarat model' may well be the answer.

The 'model' envisages nationalising already closed mills, picking out potentially viable units for resuscitation and permanently closing down the rest after paying compensation to surplus workers who opt for voluntary retirement. The machinery and land of the units that are to be scrapped will be sold, and the money used to modernise the viable ones.

The two-year-old scheme was the brain-child of Arvind Buch, former president of the Textile Labour Association (TLA) and H.K. Khan, former principal secretary in the state ministry of industry, mines and energy. Both argued it was pointless pumping in Rs 50 crore annually into the textile industry as aid and tax deferments. Said Khan: "We didn't want to reopen sick mills and then keep suffering losses for all time to come."

Rival trade union leaders argued that it was wrong of Buch as a labour leader to advocate voluntary retirement, but Buch argued back that if workers were not persuaded to leave, the industry as a whole would fail to survive. The TLA split and Buch was forced to retire as its chief.

But for all the flak, the scheme seems to have produced some results. The dozen closed mills have been nationalised, 12,000 workers have put in their resignations, and 10,222 workers who decided to stay on have been accommodated in the five reopened mills, which the Gujarat State Textile Corporation (GSTC) now plans to restructure. Altogether eight of the 12 mills involved have been founded to be viable. Some Rs 22 crore have been paid to retiring workers. If there is a problem, it has been in absorbing the workers who want to continue working: some 4,000 are still to be found new placements.

The total package plan envisaged spending Rs 87 crore, of which Rs 65 crore was to come from the Centre as a loan. The state Government is expected to raise Rs 70 crore by selling obsolete machinery and the land housing closed mills.

If the 'Gujarat model' seems to have been a success so far, it has had its failures too. Workers who have been rehabilitated have not changed their old attitudes to work, the GSTC has had its own bureaucratic problems, and stocks worth crores of rupees are still lying in the godowns of five reopened mills, which are now suffering cash losses. In other words, they are not yet on the road to viability. But GSTC Managing Director Niranjan Singh argued: "All change takes time." And Khan said: "We have been running the mills using the same machinery and the same hands, and we expected losses in the first three years. Only after that will we turn the corner." Added M.D. Rajpal, executive director of the Ahmedabad Textile Mills Association: "If implemented properly, this scheme is worth replicating."

He may well be right, provided the 'Gujarat model' finally proves itself. So far, it can at least claim that whereas two years ago 24,000 textile workers in the state were involuntarily out of work, now the figure is no more than 4,000.

HBJ PIPELINE

Tardy Progress

If ever a project needed to be completed on time, it was the Rs 1,700-crore Hazira-Bijaipur-Jagdishpur (HBJ) gas pipeline. For one thing, six fertiliser plants in Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh and Uttar Pradesh cannot get going unless the pipeline brings them natural gas from off the west coast. For another, the price of delay can be as much as Rs 30 lakh a day, going by the contract that has been signed between the Gas Authority of India Ltd (GAIL) and a consortium of companies led by the French Spie-Capag.

However, a project that took inordinately long to get under way in the first place is now progressing so slowly that it has in less than five months slipped two months behind the project schedule, with little signs as yet of making up for lost time.

Guna (Madhya Pradesh) should have started despatching coated pipes on September 1, but that the plant is still under construction and the "production test will be conducted in late October." A GAIL official said that test-coating should have been done as early as July.

Crucial pipe-laying equipment is not in position either. Of the 33 pipe-layers needed in the first three of the pipeline's five sections, not one was in position in September when Spie-Capag submitted its progress report. Dodsal, the Indian company in charge of the last two sections, had managed to move only 22 pipe-layers into position (of the 40 needed).

In its own report to the Ministry of Programme Implementation GAIL has pointed out that pipe-welding should have started in mid-August and early September for Dodsal's two sections. But work began on the first section only on September 25, and has yet to start on the second section. GAIL also says that the

Pipe-laying Sections	Required rate of progress kms/day	Length to be laid (kms)	Completion Date
HAZIRA to BHARUCH	0.95	91	10-1-87
BHARUCH to JHABUA	2.40	229	10-1-87
JHABUA to UJJAIN	1.15	160	17-1-87
UJJAIN to BIJAIPUR	1.20	160	25-1-87

The cost of this delay, going by the terms of the contract, will be as much as Rs 18 crore, and there could well be disputes over who is responsible for the delay, and who should pay the penalty. At least some of the penalty will have to be paid to Spie-Capag for keeping its equipment back beyond the deadline.

One factor causing the slow start may well have been the fact that GAIL itself was headless for three months immediately after the contract was awarded last May. Its Chairman and Managing Director, H.S. Cheema, was inexplicably removed, only to be rehabilitated last month as a member of the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC).

The delays have now been documented in detail in two separate reports recently submitted to the Government. A progress report submitted by Spie-Capag points out that the pipe-coating plant at "network finalisation is inordinately delayed".

As for the pipe-laying itself, the target for all five sections put together is 5.7 km every day. Work on the first three sections should, in fact, be completed by January 10 next year. But pipe-laying has barely begun, and GAIL still has only a joint secretary from the Petroleum Ministry at its helm. Said a senior GAIL manager: "GAIL has not been properly pursuing the contractors to ensure that they meet their deadlines. There has not been enough follow-up."

These deficiencies may be made up in the coming weeks and months. But morale in GAIL does not seem to be very high at the moment—some 60 people who had gone on deputation from ONGC and elsewhere to GAIL have now chosen to go back to their parent organisations.

TOY INDUSTRY

Coming of Age

DADDY's girl does not want a doll any longer. At least, her parents feel so. An early teddy or perhaps a cuddly companion who will blink and say "Mama" may pass muster, but once you have toddled out of your diapers and perambulator it is over to today's world of educational toys.

"Activity house: eight ways to have fun while learning," says the advertisement. The recommended age is one to five years. There's also the "funny bunny" meant for still younger kids, and being hawked as "a great way to learn about sight-and-sound interaction".

The Delhi-based Dinky Toys has been promoted by a group of professionals including some non-resident Indians. The newly-started company has entered into a collaboration with Bandai, whose turnover of $500 million makes it Japan's largest toy concern.

For an industry which has long been made up of scattered small units with minuscule market shares, the current clutch of foreign tie-ups may well be a signal that the days of largely outdated, unimaginative and unsafe toys may be coming to an end. Mayur Enterprises, a Calcutta-based newcomer to the field, has up in 1976 TAITMA, along with the Indian Standards Institution, has been monitoring the safety standards of Indian toys. "There are really very few checks here," Chinoy adds. "Metallic toys have sharp edges and paints used have toxic elements. You may not be giving your child a honed knife to play with, but he can still injure himself with a blunt one."

But the times are evidently changing. "People today want a good product at a reasonable price," says Blowplast Chairman Dilip Piramal (Leo Toys is a division of Blowplast). "The style of living has changed, thanks to the consumer boom. Though it is our cheaper toys which sell more, we have brands that retail at Rs 150 and are not gathering dust on shop shelves." Dinky's dealer price ranges from Rs 20 to Rs 100. But it expects to introduce battery operated and electronic toys soon

"The toy industry had to grow up some time."

Educational toys are not all that are new in toyland. An industry reserved for small-scale companies is now getting invaded by big brother outfits keen to get a piece of the action; professionals are entering the business, and so are some of the world's biggest names in toys, who are signing up collaboration deals with Indian partners. And with the promise of new, different, high-quality, safe toys also comes the rider: higher prices. For, the new entrants to the trade are concentrating on the top end of the market.

"It had to grow up some time," says Dinky Toys Chairman Harmeet Singh. a marketing and technology arrangement with a French company. Leo Toys, for five years the sole standard bearer of the organised sector in the industry, is trying to enter into a collaboration with Mattel, and a Madras-based entrepreneur is negotiating with the giant US toymaker, Hasbro.

"It is very, very necessary," insists Munira F. Chinoy, president of the All India Toy Manufacturers Association (TAITMA). "In the west they are very particular about safety standards. Here almost all our toys are unsafe." And TAITMA should know. Ever since it was set which will cost twice that amount. And the Mikabu brand, promoted by Mayur Enterprises, will also have some products at the top end of the market.

But the picture may not be quite as rosy as the new entrants seem to feel. Leo Toys, with an expected turnover of Rs 1 crore this year, has been in the business since 1981 and expects to break even only now. Says Piramal: "Our main cost is the mould which has to be imported and can come for anything between Rs 5 lakh and Rs 10 lakh. In the US they can make 10 lakh toys from one mould and sell that amount: here one-tenth that figure can prove a drag on the market. Obviously toys will cost more here."

The Managing Director of Mikabu, Amarnath Chakravorty, has no such fears. "The market is growing at 25 per cent per annum and is not yet overcrowded. Our products are expected to be sufficiently superior to existing toys available indigenously. We have actually checked out consumer rating between our products and market leader Leo. We see no problems in getting a Rs 5-crore turnover in the very first year." Dinky's Harmeet Singh, who did a stint with Leo Toys earlier, agrees: "We expect a profit in the very first year itself. We started manufacture in July and we hope to achieve a Rs-30 lakh monthly turnover very soon."

But Leo Toys may have had an additional problem in that it was the only manufacturer which was trying to put the industry on an organised footing. "We are spending Rs 50 lakh on advertising," says Piramal. "Only we advertise and everybody gains." What really rankles is that cheaper toys are available by the score, and some of the mini-units are alleged to be not above excise evasion. Until a sense of quality and safety consciousness is instilled in the consumers, which can only come about through extensive advertising, the more expensive brands are bound to suffer. But both Mikabu and Dinky plan considerable advertising budgets and there may be a change for the better very soon. Nevertheless, marketing the new toys may not be child's play.

Meanwhile, most of the manufacturers are hedging their bets by going in for what can be loosely termed unisex toys. Leo does not have any line exclusively for girls and only has a stray game toy or two meant for the fairer sex. Dinky, while it does have some plans of introducing dolls, has launched its initial range with what appears to be a male emphasis and Mikabu is little different. Although the best selling toys are usually guns, both Leo and Dinky are orienting their advertising to emphasise the educational aspect.

Chinoy has an explanation: "In yesterday's world, girls were expected to grow up to be basically housewives; today no parent would like her daughter to be a somebody." Piramal feels that the reason lies more in the fact that good quality dolls are just not available, and Singh contends that in the present competitive environment educational toys are a must. So goodbye babies and cabbage patch kids, enter the infant Euclids. In an age in which one has to give exams to enter kindergarten, is there any other option?

SUDHIR MULJI

The Rules of Business

HE comes from a family of great wealth (the Sheth family that runs Great Eastern Shipping), has married into a family of great wealth (the Irish beer-manufacturing Guinness family), and has been strongly and openly critical of the Rajiv Gandhi Government's economic policies. He has traces of an upper class British accent, is strongly right-wing in his views, which he pens for a couple of magazines, and is a visiting fellow of Nuffield College at Oxford. Also, he has for all practical purposes been a non-resident, having based himself in London for the last nine years to run the international arm of Great Eastern.

That's not the sort of background that normally gets a man into the hot seat in a giant public sector company often accused of shady deals. Nevertheless, Sudhir Mulji, 48, is now the chairman of the State Trading Corporation of India (turnover: Rs 2,523 crore). "Certainly, I didn't expect it," Mulji says, and he is chary of disclosing who suggested the appointment. He admits reluctantly that he met Rajiv ("the prime minister is wonderfully direct and straightforward, and very easy to relate to") before going through the round of interviews and meetings that finally got him his appointment. And—conscious of the contradictions in someone with his views being chairman of STC—he says quite simply that "if I was being asked, I couldn't refuse. Some of the members of the interview panel may have felt that I might not fit into the public sector, but they perhaps felt it was an experiment worth trying." His mother, he says, is "proud but unhappy": she doesn't see what there can be for him in getting caught up in New Delhi's byzantine world. And he himself wonders whether he is made for the public sector.

"I didn't set any pre-conditions," he says. "That wouldn't be playing the game." But now that he is there, he hopes to "try and change the conditions in which the business side of government is done." For a start, he wants to improve the low morale in STC. "I have said I will not tolerate anonymous notes: corruption is important, but morale is even more so. In any case, STC people are as honest as the general level of honesty in the country, and I don't see major loopholes. There are a lot of rumours about state trading that are unfair. STC can do a reasonable job. But having joined STC, I am biased in its favour."

His views on economic policy remain what they have been: he thinks the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act should be scrapped altogether ("people don't want to take their money out, they want to bring it in"), he doesn't see any real liberalisation having taken place in economic policy, and he maintains that "there are too many controls, and the natural talent of the Indian businessman hasn't been given free rein".

How can a rule-bound government-owned company do well in international trade? "I don't think you can do business by sticking to rules and regulations," he says. "You just have to ensure the national good. And both the Government and the public have to understand the nature of trading. One shouldn't be afraid of making mistakes. If you worry about that, it'll be impossible for the public sector to survive. You have to take decisions that might go wrong."

He doesn't think in terms of targets ("in any case, it's much too early for that"), just of how to get the next contract. And he loves business: "I consider nothing more honourable than being a businessman. It's very easy to be above reproach, but a businessman takes on challenges. Both business and politics are very difficult games, and you can't have a very simple moral rule for these kinds of things. There is always some good and some bad. Circumstances might make you do things that are morally reprehensible but are ultimately right. You may have to entertain lavishly in order to get business. So business is not a question of simple moral precepts, it really takes life as it is." It now remains to be seen whether STC, the bureaucracy and Parliament will take Mulji as he is.

SHAW WALLACE

The Final Battle

THE battle lines have been drawn for the final skirmishes in one of the fiercest corporate wars ever to be fought: for the control of Shaw Wallace and Company. Last fortnight both Kishore Rajaram Chhabria, the London-based non-resident Indian, and Senapur Panduranga Acharya, currently Shaw Wallace chairman, were busy lobbying with the Government and the financial institutions for support in the decisive battles that lay ahead. While Chhabria, a candidate for becoming Shaw Wallace chairman, camped in a plush suite in one of the capital's luxury hotels, Acharya was busy operating from the company's well-appointed guest-house in the capital. Both put forward their case on the basis of high principle (the rights of the largest block of shareholders vs the responsibility of a management to the company's total share ownership), but in truth it was simply a battle for power and control.

For Chhabria, this was his chance to capture the Rs 230-crore company, 38 per cent of whose shares he acquired almost two years ago when he and his brother, M.R. Chhabria, bought the holding company, R.G. Shaw. But since then, he has been stymied by Acharya, who has fought a determined battle to keep the Chhabrias out on the ground that they had teamed up illegally with Bangalore-based liquor giant Vijay Mallya to buy R.G. Shaw. Said Chhabria: "We simply want the management to pass into the hands of those who actually own the company, nothing else. Is this a crime?" Retorted a Shaw Wallace official: "When the question of the real ownership of the shares is in doubt, how can they lay claim to the company?"

The battle between Chhabria and Acharya entered its critical phase when the Supreme Court ordered the holding of Shaw Wallace's long-delayed annual meeting of shareholders, as well as two extraordinary general meetings (EGM's) that had been requisitioned months ago by Chhabria. The meetings are to be held in mid-November, and will discuss and vote on resolutions calling for the removal of Acharya and other Shaw Wallace directors, and for passing the annual accounts of the company plus the payment of dividends.

The Supreme Court decision had come at the end of a long legal battle in which over half-a-dozen cases were filed in different courts, apart from one before the Company Law Board. The board eventually lifted its ban on the Chhabrias exercising their shareholding power. But along the way, the Calcutta High Court had restrained the holding of the EGM that Chhabria wanted in order to remove Acharya. Also, the various economic intelligence arms of the Government had pounced on the Chhabrias and on Mallya, and arrested both of them for FERA violations. Among the charges: they had bought R.G. Shaw overseas without the approval of the RBI. Once Chhabria was arrested, Acharya had gone to the courts and got the EGM's postponed on a variety of grounds.

The latest judicial order now forces Acharya to hold the meeting of shareholders that Chhabria wants, and is a clear victory for the non-resident businessman. The court has even ordered that Acharya will not chair the shareholders' meetings. Instead, it has put together a panel of three retired judges to preside over the meetings.

If the issue of who controls Shaw Wallace is going to be decided purely on the basis of shareholder voting power, the dice is heavily loaded against Acharya and his supporters. Acharya himself owns less than 1 per cent of the company's shares, against Chhabria's 38 per cent. Over 27 per cent of the shares are owned by the financial institutions. And last fortnight Chhabria was able to raise his equity holding to over 44 per cent by forking out Rs 8 crore to acquire Shaw Wallace shares held by two families based in Madras and Calcutta.

During the last four months, the tireless Chhabria has knocked on almost every door in the Finance Ministry to plead his case. Throughout, Chhabria has accused Acharya of violating laws and milking the company for his personal benefit, charges that Acharya has vehemently denied. While the Finance Ministry has remained neutral on the contentious issues, it nevertheless ordered a probe into Chhabria's allegations of financial bungling. And a report submitted to the Central Board of Direct Taxes says that senior Shaw Wallace executives have floated parallel companies with the help of money drawn from the parent company. What these and various other charges will ultimately amount to is not known, and Acharya did not make himself available for comment. In the context of the imminent battle, these charges serve the purpose of making it difficult for the financial institutions to support Acharya. But since the Finance Ministry still holds the view that a good management should not be destabilised, which way the final voting will go remains the vital question.

Acharya, in any case, has not given up the battle as lost. He is pinning his hopes on the FERA case against Chhabria which, if it goes against the non-resident investor, could put an end to all his hopes of taking charge. And going by the comments of senior Shaw Wallace executives, Acharya still seems confident that the financial institutions will back him with their 27 per cent voting power. Nevertheless, the fact remains that Chhabria now controls 44 per cent of the total shareholding. And it will take a superhuman effort on Acharya's part to put enough votes together to stop Chhabria in his tracks, come November.

PAN MASALA

Soaring Sales

IT looks like lumpy powdered chocolate, leaves a mildly mint-like flavour on the tongue, and has a growing number of aficionados craving for more. And of course, it is one of the hottest-selling items in town. Touted as a substitute for the more messy pan, pan masala is chewing up sales records all over the country. And at least one brand occasionally commands black market rates.

The Kanpur-based Kothari Products had a turnover of Rs 31 lakh a decade ago; last year it was Rs 26 crore. The total market has grown equally exponentially and is now estimated at around Rs 100 crore. And yet, the orders come in too fast to be handled. Says Kothari Products Managing Director M.M. Kothari: "Forty per cent of our orders are pending. We cannot produce enough and have to allot dealers quotas." Adds R.N. Goela, managing partner of Swastik Fragrances (of Rajnigandha fame): "We haven't been able to catch up with the demand. Orders sometimes have to be kept pending for two to three months." Even smaller producers are flourishing—Hari Chand Shri Gopal kicked off its Mayur brand two years ago and ran into unexpected trouble as its factory could not keep pace with the demand. Says one partner K.P. Agrawal: "We could have sold Rs 10 crore worth of pan masala but couldn't supply enough last year. We have now expanded our plant more than tenfold." The sharply rising sales graphs clearly signal what should be obvious—that pan masalas are winning converts and influencing buyers like never before.

Things started changing in the '70s when Ashok and Company—the now-defunct industry daddy—set the ball rolling by introducing mass production techniques. Now manufacturers have harnessed convenient packaging and big budget advertising to hit the big time. Thus, a 100-gram tin is priced around Rs 20, but the market ballooned two years ago when manufacturers launched 4-gram sachets, pricing them at the more affordable Re 1. "By introducing pouches, we captured middle class buyers who didn't want to spend Rs 20," says Kothari.

The annual ad budgets range from Rs 30 lakh to a hefty Rs 1 crore, and firms have roped in film stars to endorse their wares on TV. "We're trying to associate our product with people of all age groups. We want to convey the message that using pan masala is a status symbol," says Goela. The gambit has paid off. Says a senior ad agency executive: "Advertising has changed public perceptions. Pan masala is not regarded as a down-market product any more."

Such strategies have sent corporate sales soaring. And the success stories are enticing outsiders. Last fortnight, health and beauty products company Dabur was bracing to take on industry heavies by launching a pan masala called Nawabi in mid-October. Dabur Marketing Controller S. Ramachandran expects a 20 per cent profit: "We'll step into any market where there's a monopoly or oligopoly. The question of our failing doesn't arise; we have a big distribution network."

Still, such calculations could go awry. Manufacturers claim that their profits are just 5 per cent, and that conglomerates like ITC had lent either marketing muscle or advice to pan masala ventures, only to come a cropper in a business that calls for immense personal supervision. One reason may be that success lies in the quality of ingredients used and in the blending of the various flavours—which are claimed to be family secrets.

Personal involvement does seem to be a key to success. "The big companies don't inspect the quality of the betel nuts they order the way I do. And like Coca-Cola, our concentrate is a secret. I myself prepare a concentrate comprising over 20 flavours once a week at night in our basement at home," said Kothari. But Ramachandran countered: "It's not the formula but the consistency that counts."

The next few months could, of course, determine that issue. Right now the mood in the industry is far from glum. "There's room for everyone," declares an industry watcher. He could be right. Some 100 small-timers are fighting successfully for niches in the market. And if the ad hype and hard sell are anything to go by, pan masalas will continue to have a lot of spice in them.

THE MARKETS

New Jolts

THERE is not going to be any great bounty flowing from the share markets this year. That much now seems inescapable. And the recovery that was on the cards has been nipped in the bud: by the financial institutions (which have suddenly decided to unload some of their holdings), by brokers themselves (one of them brought about a payments crisis in Bombay by over-extending himself in Modi Rubber) and by such unexpected events as the assassination attempt on Rajiv Gandhi.

So, while September saw The Economic Times share price index rise quite handsomely from 482 to 509.4, the first week of October saw the index slide back once again to 503.4. This is somewhat higher than the level a fortnight ago, but it is not even 1 per cent higher than the level of the index immediately after the post-budget crash, in March, and shows how weak the market undertone has been in the last six or seven months.

Perhaps the only factor that has prevented a wholesale slump is the occasional buying by the financial institutions, and even this has been intermittent and hesitant. Last fortnight, as a matter of fact, both the Unit Trust of India (UTI) and the Industrial Development Bank of India (IDBI) decided to turn sellers. UTI unloaded Tata Steel and Tata Tea on the Calcutta Stock Exchange, and the IDBI got rid of some of its holdings in Gujarat Fertiliser.

In the prevailing mood (which wasn't helped by the payments crisis and the closing of the market for a day), even higher dividend announcements by several companies didn't bolster the sentiment. Thus, firms like Bajaj Electricals, Modern Suitings, Chemicals and Plastics and Bakelite Hylam hiked their dividend, as did Richardson Hindustan. But even when the general mood is depressed, there are always some scrips that manage to do well, and among these were Atlas Copco, Asian Paints, the flourishing Bajaj Auto, Bata India and National Organic.

Meanwhile, some of the leading companies that want to go to the market to raise funds find that clearances are slow in coming from the controller of capital issues in New Delhi. Among the firms now waiting for the green signal are such corporate stars as Tata Steel, Indian Rayon, Hindustan Aluminium and Reliance Industries. Attractive public issues by these companies should at least serve to lace the current uncertain mood with some optimism about good investment prospects. But as things stand, the current financial year may not see as much fresh capital being raised from the market as might have been expected at one stage. In a year with so many other disappointments, this is one that could have been avoided.

THE TECHNOLOGY SKYSCRAPER: ONCE YOU'VE REACHED THE TOP, THERE'S NO COMING DOWN.

It's a rigid caste system out here. And people at the top mix only with their peers.

Hinditron's new manufacturing venture is a case in point.

TEKHIND 2235 OSCILLOSCOPES. WITH TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE FROM TEKTRONIX, U.S.A.

To win the technical assistance of Tektronix and Fluke, Hinditron had to prove themselves at the highest level of technology.

Tektronix, world number one in oscilloscopes and display devices. And Fluke, ditto in digital multimeters.

What convinced them to stake their giant reputations with Hinditron?

There's no charity in the tough world of high-tech.

So, Hinditron's credentials had to be more than just impressive – they had to be impeccable.

As representatives for Tektronix and Fluke for over two decades, Hinditron have acquired in-depth expertise in high-tech electronics.

Hinditron know all there is to know about the products, their scope, and about customer needs. And have an excellent set-up for marketing and field service.

Over the years, people in the know have come to recognise Hinditron as a premier supplier of state-of-the-art products and services.

The spectrum ranges from communication equipment and process control instrumentation to analytical instruments and test and measuring instruments.

Plus of course, computers – marketing and field services, software development and export, training in information technology. As well as data centre management.

The software development cell needs to be singled out for special mention. It solves complex problems for major clients in nine countries – including the U.S.A., England and West Germany.

So when Hinditron chose to go into manufacture, it had to be at the highest level. Or not at all.

A new factory at Bangalore stands testimony to Hinditron's intentions. Guaranteed to turn out products of the highest pedigree.

With three very big reputations to live up to, was there ever a choice?

The indicators hold no surprises. Almost everything is on track except the Industrial Production and Manufacturing indices which are somewhat below trend. Demand continues to be strong. The use of petroleum products is up almost 15%. Increased use of fertiliser augurs well for farm production in a bad monsoon year.

All data are seasonally adjusted. The current trends are computed on the basis of six-month (weekly data) or two-year (monthly data) figures. Quarters in the text refer to the calendar year quarters.

Prices have been essentially stable the last few months. Price-wise, 1986 promises to be the best year since the inflation rate of 2.48 in 1982.

Not since the first quarter of 1974 has the decline been as sharp as the −7.8% (annual rate) recorded in the most recent quarter.

Stock-market health and indicators like power use suggest that the second quarter decline might have been temporary.

Money supply continues its expansionary pace. Though September has shown some acceleration, there are no signs of overheating.

Though the trend growth rate has dropped in the last month, bank credit in real terms has an expansionary stance.

Clear signals of a 'bottom formation' are present. The bear phase since March may be finally ending.

Power generation is back on its healthy trend after the large dip in June; the improvement in July was sustained in August.

The rally has been mild compared to the one in international markets. Domestic gold prices are up only 6%; internationally, they are up 25%.

Grand Designs

DOORDARSHAN, like Rip Van Winkle, has suddenly woken up to the need to catch up with the times. The Ministry of Information and Broadcasting has grand designs on its drawing-boards for a 'revitalised' television set-up. Helicopters, state of the art studios, many more electronic news-gathering (ENG) vans, computerised lighting and a lot else to update the frayed hardware. And to take care of the equally fraying human factor, a total outsider will be inducted as director of news, and other journalists taken on contract. For good measure, there will also be six new posts of additional or deputy directors-general.

This package has not yet got the Government's green signal, though it should soon be coming. Approved already, however, are two huge professional studios to be built at a cost of about Rs 35 crore in the dining hall and sports complex of New Delhi's Asiad Village. These studios will include rehearsal rooms and stages where dances and ballets can be performed and viewed by invited audiences (canned laughter and applause are finally here). Doordarshan will also rid itself of its outdated low-band equipment, which is unacceptable internationally. Already a dozen studios, costing roughly Rs 1 crore each, are being built in Mandi House, where Doordarshan's new headquarters and Delhi Kendra are coming up.

Doordarshan's electronic tentacles are spreading too. Regional television is gradually becoming a reality. Earlier this year, Bombay's coverage was extended to all of Maharashtra. The Madras station will be able to cover the whole of Tamil Nadu later this month, and Hyderabad will transmit across Andhra Pradesh in November. Doordarshan's second channels in Delhi and Bombay have thus far been damp squibs—the one kilowatt signals being too weak. They will be updated to 10 kilowatts next year. Calcutta and Madras will get their second channels by September next year as well.

HARI OM GULATI

Doordarshan proposes to acquire fancy new hardware, recruit fresh talent and brighten up its news presentation, but the changes may not go far enough.

Doordarshan's new headquarters

To brighten up the news presentation, experiments are already being carried out for the national hook-up. Newscasters might soon read out the news with a live news-room as a backdrop. To make the news less of "radio with pictures" (as it is constantly referred to), Doordarshan might introduce square windows which show frozen footage that comes alive and expands to fill the screen as the news-reader fades out. The Sivakasi-calendar colours—fluorescent orange and electric blues—might happily prove victims of the proposed change. Teleprompters, rejected earlier by the news-readers because they thought these made them appear too wooden, might return. So news-readers will have to come in early for rehearsals.

Doordarshan certainly needs a change of form; but what it needs even more is a change of heart. Change has got to be more than electronic-deep. What good are all the fancy ENG vans and the rest of sci-fi hardware when cameramen do not have telephones at home? They can't be summoned if there is a late news development. Says a former Doordarshan producer: "Only the bureaucrats have telephones. If you do not reach the cameraman, you don't reach the audience ....Unfortunately the same set of rules govern the Income Tax Department as well as radio and Doordarshan." The 10-to-5 mentality is not conducive for the reflexes essential to a news organisation, nor are second Saturdays and the myriad holidays. Complains another producer: "The litmus test of a TV station is the get-out time. Doordarshan takes anywhere from two to four hours to reach a news site. After all, fires don't give notices or press handouts."

What Doordarshan is really geared to cover, according to yet another producer, is the prime minister's doings and sayings and airport arrivals and departures. "When it comes to the prime minister's visit everybody responds in fear....Everything else is pushed aside, even as important an event as the Shah Bano case....The more the prime minister talks about the need for media to underplay him, the more the bosses accord coverage to him. They believe he is not satisfied and wants more."

Those at the ground level in the TV set-up fear that the planning is being done from the top, with an approach that does not show familiarity with the problems on the ground floor. The problem is not one of creating new posts, but having the right people in the right places. A news team as such is non-existent. Transfers and appointments from assistant station director upwards are outside Doordarshan's control because the ministry must decide. And those below assistant station director too are beyond its control, because here it is All India Radio that decides! Even the tiniest decisions, such as the choice of cricket commentator or the placement of a commercial, sometimes go up to the ministry. And now, the reorganisation, revamping, modernisation and brightening up depend on the ministry's imprimatur too.

SHANANDA

Acting Editor

MOVIE star, stage actress, film maker and now editor, 40-year-old Aparna Sen still retains the Midas touch. Her latest venture, the Bengali women's magazine, Shananda, published by Calcutta's Ananda Bazar Patrika group, has arrived on the local media scene with as much of a bang as her films. The first issue of the fortnightly appeared in July-end with 70,000 copies and vanished from the stands within days. The next issue with 85,000 copies also sold out. Today, advertisers and distributors are convinced that Shananda has already captured a niche in the Bengali media world, assuring the one-time glamour girl another successful debut.

But switching roles after making the super-hit movie Paroma, which shocked and titillated Bengal's straight-laced middle class, is proving to be quite a jump even for Sen. "I did not realise what editing a magazine entails," she admits. It is not all fun, as she had initially presumed when Aveek Sarkar, the managing editor of the Ananda Bazar group, offered her the job. "Since I have lent my name to the magazine and the responsibility of the final product is on me, I realised I have to stand by it," she says. And this is proving to be a lot of hard work.

"She is by no means a sleeping editor," testifies Shananda's Chief Reporter Sankarlal Bhattacharya. Though the deal with Ananda Bazar envisaged only a part-time role for Sen, in practice all the major decisions are being taken by her. Says Bhattacharya: "We give her the ideas and she suggests how articles should be handled and personally goes through the more important ones."

Sen, who is currently also playing the lead in Sharalipi—a commercial stage production running to full houses since June last year—thus finds herself directing the magazine's affairs from an air-conditioned cubby-hole in the Ananda Bazar office for three days every week. "All my life, I have been in films that require working only in concentrated bursts, but magazine work is continuous. It's really tough to consistently maintain standards," she says, with a trace of fatigue.

Her critics, who are many, are quick to point out that lack of imagination and effort is already beginning to show in the magazine's contents. "Shananda is beginning to look just like another film magazine and not a woman's reading," remarks an advertiser. There is some truth in the criticism. The last few covers have been dominated by film personalities, focusing on their private lives and styles. Even the section on interior decoration is unwittingly aimed not so much at the average housewife but at the kind of flamboyant homes associated with filmdom.

SATYAKI GHOSH

Aparna Sen at the Shananda office

"It's difficult to guess what readers want, and I have to keep on experimenting, trusting my gut feeling," admits Sen. But she is emphatic in denying that Shananda is geared to the very upper class or to women with particular tastes. "The magazine would have become heavy reading if it were left entirely to me," she explains, "but I have to ensure that it appeals to broader tastes." As examples, she cites the cover story on the "Santoshi Mata" phenomenon, as also articles on whether housewives should be paid, on child labour and drugs.

Guessing what Bengali women readers want should not be too difficult for Shananda's editor, considering that she has epitomised the glamorous Bengali woman on the Tollygunje screen for more than a decade. And in making Paroma, Sen demonstrated that she is tuned in to Bengali middle class sentiments. The success of Paroma testified that the archetype of the average Bengali woman as the paan-chewing, docile matinee show-addict is obsolete. Thus even Shananda, says Sen, "is aimed at the aware woman, a woman who is aware of herself as a citizen".

But the movie maker-turned-editor had better keep guessing right. For staying in place will depend on how she tackles the latest threat—another new Bengali women's magazine launched last month by the Allahabad-based Mitra Prakashan. This monthly, Manorama, has had as successful a launch as Shananda's and is expected to cross the one-lakh circulation mark within a few months of publication, considering that its first issue sold over 80,000 copies. Aimed at the middle class and even the lower middle class reader, Manorama may find a larger market than the more exclusive Shananda.

Advertisers, however, remain optimistic. "If Shananda can stick to its image of an upper bracket women's magazine, its future is assured," says Sushen Shaha, media director of Hindustan Thompson Associates. What remains uncertain is Aparna Sen's long-term involvement in the magazine. Her first love remains cinema and already the germ of an idea for a fresh movie—on the theme of sati—is brewing in her mind. "Next year, no matter what happens, I am going to start work on my film," she says. At that time Sen may end up as editor only in name, with the actual running of the magazine left to the core Shananda staff that she is putting together. But hopefully by then, editing would have become another triumphant notch on her career graph.

The Communal Devil

SOME years ago, while studying the phenomenon of possession by spirits in rural north India, I was struck by a curious fact. In a large number of cases, the bhuta or evil spirit possessing Hindu men and women, who went for help to village exorcists or to well-known healing temples and shrines, turned out to be a Muslim. When, during the healing ritual, the patient went into a trance and the spirit started expressing its wishes, these wishes invariably turned out to be those which would have been horrifying to the patient's conscious self. In one case, the Muslim spirit possessing an elderly Brahmin priest vigorously insisted on eating kababs. The five women surrounding the man who had engaged the bhuta in conversation were distinctly disheartened that he had turned out to be a Sayyad and one of them lamented: "These Mussulmans! They have ruined our dharma but they are so strong they can withstand our gods." In another case, the bhuta inhabiting a young married woman not only expressed derogatory sentiments towards her 'lord and master', but also openly stated its intentions of bringing the mother-in-law to a violent and preferably bloody end.

Possession by a Muslim bhuta, then, seemed to reflect the afflicted person's desperate efforts to convince himself and others that his hunger for forbidden foods and uncontrollable rage toward those who should be loved and respected, as well as all other imagined transgressions, sins of the heart, belonged to the Muslim destroyer of taboos and were farthest away from his 'good' Hindu self. In that Muslim bhutas were universally considered to be the strongest, the vilest, the most malignant and the most stubborn of the evil spirits, the Muslim seemed to symbolise the alien and the demonic in the unconscious part of the Hindu mind.

Recent events in Punjab, I am afraid, are a prelude to creating yet another major demon in the Hindu psyche of north India. At least in the metropolis where I live, the Sikh as a symbol of violence and unbridled aggression has already begun to enter the average middle class Hindu dream—or nightmare, to be more precise.

Demonic spirits take birth during that part of our childhood when the child, made conscious of good and bad, right and wrong, divine and evil, begins to divide himself into two parts, one that is the judge and the other that is being judged. The unacceptable, condemned parts of the self are expelled outside and attached to various other beings—animal and human, as well as to whole castes and communities. This early split within our nature, which gives us a future licence to view and treat others as if they were no better than the worst in ourselves, is normally completed by the time the child is six to seven years old. As the child grows up into an adult, he further elaborates and fleshes out his private demonology, providing the Muslim demon, and lately the Sikh one, with their purana. The purana of the Muslim demon, for instance, has nothing to do with Sufi saints, the prophet's sayings or the more profound sentiments of Islam. Instead, its stories are of rape and pillage by the legions of Ghazni and Timur as well as other more local accounts of Muslim mayhem. Similarly, the emerging Sikh demon has tales of Bhindranwale's dark malevolence and the lore of murderous terrorists rather than verses from the Gurbani. Although the existence of the demonic puranas is rarely acknowledged publicly, they have as much a home in the Hindu imagination as those of Hindu gods.

The fact is that we need our demons as much as our divinities, the sewer as much as the puja-room. If the gods recompense our devotion by making us feel morally upright and good, the demons too increase our feeling of well-being by becoming the containers for our evil, draining away our unavoidable wishes to overcome social conditioning and transgress deeply-held taboos. It is here that we must look for the psychological roots of communalism and its continuing tenacity in all communities—Hindu, Muslim or Sikh—though the latter two are not the subject of this essay. For instance, we do know that Muslims see Hindu devis and devatas as a numerous, powerful and threatening host of supernatural beings which can be warded off by such sorcery as the driving in of nails at all corners of a room. Best of all, one can protect oneself from the Hindu bhuta by being a pious Muslim and by constant proclamations of faith. This, it seems, expresses one of the primary fears of the Indian Muslim—of somehow lapsing from the faith and being reabsorbed by the insidious Hindu society surrounding him wherever he happens to be in the country.

> "If the gods make us feel morally upright, the demons too increase our feeling of well-being by becoming the containers for our evil. It is here that we must look for the roots of communalism and its tenacity in all communities—Hindu, Muslim or Sikh."

Well-meaning educative efforts in the class-rooms or in national integration seminars to bridge the communal divide are for the most part too late and perhaps too little in that they are misdirected. They never frankly address the collective—and mostly subconscious—fears and wishes of the various communities. Demons are neither amenable to 'correct' interpretation of religious texts nor to humanistic pleas for change into good and loving beings. All we can do is to accept their existence but reduce their power by confronting our fantasy of the Muslim and Sikh with the realities of ordinary, everyday Muslim and Sikh lives. What is required in educational strategies is not as much the conveying of information but of insight, a form of knowledge arising out of strong emotional experience and enhancement of empathy.

If our communal demons appeared only in individual dreams and in the possession trance of mental illnesses, we would have little cause for collective concern. Unfortunately, there is one social setting where, under certain conditions, they (communal demons) can vio-tly take over our personalities in ups essentially incorporating and ex- essing our religious identity. As part of a wd and in the press of bodies in a kirtan-ging toli, a satsang, a sangat or any her religious congregation, the sensual unding through all bodily avenues on dissolves our sense of individuality d merges us into a single homogeneous ss of flesh.

At first there may be a sense of unease as the body, the container of our individuality and the demarcator our boundaries in space, is sharply nched away from its habitual way of eriencing others. For as we grow up, touch of others, once so berately courted and re- nded to with delight, in- asingly becomes a prob- Coming from a loved touch is deliciously wel- med; with strangers, on the er hand, there is an invol- tary shrinking of the body, r touch taking on the macing air of invasion by other.

But once the fear of touch ppears in the fierce press ther bodies and the indi- ual lets himself become a t of the crowd's density, original apprehension is nsformed into an expan- ness that stretches to in- de the others. Distances differences—of class, sta- age, caste hierarchy— ppear in an exhilarating ing (temporary to be sure) t individual boundaries can indeed be nscended and were perhaps illusory in first place. Of course, touch is only one e sensual stimuli that hammers at the e of individual identity. Other excita- s, channelled through vision, hearing smell, are also very much involved. In tion, there are exchanges of body , muscle tension and body rhythms h take place in a crowd. In short, the d's assault on the sense of individual- s invitation to transcend one's indi- al boundaries and its offer of a free- from personal doubts and anxieties is nigh irresistible.

The problem is that this transcen- e of individuality, perhaps the core of religious quest, not only opens us to influx of the divine but also heightens receptivity to the demonic. The surge ing devotion also washes away the ces against the emergence of archaic hates. Without the rituals which make tradition palpable and without the permanent visibility of religious leaders, whose presence is marked by conspicuous external insignia, religious crowds can easily turn into marauding mobs. Transcending individuality by merging into a group can generate heroic self-sacrifice but also unimaginable brutality. To get out of one's skin in a devotional assembly is at the same time also to have less regard for saving it in a mob.

Religion and community, we are told, are the basis of our civilisation, and perhaps nothing much can be done to prevent the expression of our religious identity through various forms of group action. The values of sceptical individualism are neither intellectually fashionable nor are they attuned to social and cultural realities in the Indian context. As a result, these values cannot be propagated and fostered as a counterweight to religious communal identities.

What can be done is not to actively intervene in the country's cultural life in search of national integration. Thus we need to ensure that any official propagation of culture does not inadvertently increase the self-idealisation of the Hindus, whose traditions constitute an overwhelming part of Indian culture. Such a self-glorification easily becomes defensive and exclusive where, out of pride and defensiveness, existing knowledge is derided, insights denied and possible alternatives ignored. Any pointing out of the so-called deficiencies of western and Islamic civilisations can at best be cautionary. Such comparisons with the Hindu ethos need to be reflected upon in all humility and not become a source of misplaced self-congratulation—the perennial temptation and bane of Hindu intellectual endeavour.

As Hindus, merely a numerical majority for a long time, now become culturally more and more dominant in the nation's life, they have a special responsibility to avoid going the fundamentalist way, not out of altruism but from self-interest. We know that the belief of the dominant party in a relationship often becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy, involuntarily changing the very consciousness of the weaker partner. Children thought to be intelligent by their teacher, even when this belief has no basis in fact, do indeed become more intelligent; rats, erroneously believed by the experimenter to be bright, learn faster than those labelled as dull. The Hindu image of themselves and other communities is apt to be incorporated in the self-image of non-Hindu minorities. Even when consciously accepted, the denigrating part of the image is likely to be a source of intense unconscious rage in other communities. This rage is stored up over a period of time, till it explodes in all its violent manifestations whenever historical circumstances sanction such eruptions. As Hindus, perhaps unwittingly, seek to establish their cultural traditions as the corner-stone of a national Indian identity, the country seems fated to go through a long spell wherein our various collective bhuta are unleashed.

BIHAR

Ban Battle

AT the All India Institute of Medical Sciences in New Delhi after his gall-bladder operation in August, Bihar Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey had told his aides casually: "Look, I am going back and now I will use some bitter pills to cure the ills of Bihar." Last fortnight he prescribed his first bitter pill—he banned private practice by government doctors.

But it was a pill that proved more bitter than expected, provoking a strong reaction. Bihar Congress(I) Medical Cell General Secretary Baidyanath Mishra lashed out at the Government decision: "It is like administering the wrong medicine to a patient." Added Bihar Health Service Association (BHSA) General Secretary Gopal Prasad Sinha: "This is a gimmick to divert public attention. No one will benefit—neither the doctors, nor the public nor the Government."

Agitating doctors; and (left) Patna Medical College operation theatre: deplorable conditions

Predictably, the BHSA and 37 other leading doctors went to court even as the teacher-doctors of the state's nine medical colleges went on a three-month protest leave from October 1—one day before the ban was to take effect. Challenging the ban as violative of several articles of the Constitution as well as Rule 3-A of the Bihar Service Code, the doctors contended that the ban discriminated against the medical college teachers and got a stay order.

Observed Justice Ali Ahmed and Justice S.B. Sanyal of the division bench of the Patna High Court: "To us it appears that to put a ban on private practice will not be advantageous to ailing members of the society. Their inconvenience may increase and hospitals may not be able to render efficient medical care." The court also ordered the setting up of a panel to examine the condition of medical college hospitals.

The court verdict came as a shot in the arm for the agitated medical community which had already succeeded in securing a major concession—the sanctioning of the University Grants Commission's (UGC) pay scales for medical college teachers. Besides this the Dubey Government also sanctioned Rs 5 crore for the upgradation of hospital equipment and appointed a committee to suggest need-based improvements in the medical college hospitals.

Three days later the doctors returned to work with the warning that if their remaining demands were not conceded they would resort to agitation once again. Said Sinha of BHSA: "We have reciprocated the human-interest verdict of the high court, not the Government's decision to grant us UGC pay scales. That hardly touched even the fringe of our problems." Added BHSA chief Ramajanam Singh: "The doctors' demands include the computing of their salary on a UGC scale that takes into account their duty hours and number of working days, payment of additional dearness allowance, interim relief and time-bound promotion."

However, the Government was not ready to give up the battle. Said Health Minister Dinesh Kumar Singh: "The Government is determined to ban private practice and improve the overall health care."

The doctors argue that the ban is no solution. According to them the already unfavourable patient-doctor and the patient-bed ratio will deteriorate further and outdoor and indoor patient queues will lengthen. Operations were expected to be another major casualty with critical patients lying in limbo.

BHSA officials said that at Patna Medical College Hospital no facilities are available for even routine pathological tests. They charge that neglect has affected the college's costly medical equipment, worth over Rs 3 crore and that there is no facility for research work.

Said Ramajanam Singh: "There is no health administration worth the name in the state." Sixty per cent of the state's 6,000-odd government doctors are still to be confirmed, though some of them were recruited as far back as 1976. Many senior posts have been lying vacant for years. These include five posts of additional director, five posts of joint director, one post of drug controller, six posts of deputy director and 11 posts of regional deputy director, among numerous others. Of the nine medical colleges, seven have no principals and about 300 teaching posts are vacant. Recently the Government found that 350 doctors were working abroad on unauthorised leave.

Singh claimed that ever since he took over as health minister he has been fighting with officials to streamline the department's working. Recently, the Government raised the per head provision for diet and medicines in all government hospitals, and also ordered an inquiry into the equipment rusting at hospitals. How far these measures will benefit the patients remains to be seen. So while the Government and the doctors are locked in a battle over private practice, patients needing medical care in Bihar remain a most unfortunate lot.

A Divine Talent

S. Balachander, 60, is the unchallenged king of the veena on which he plays Carnatic music with dazzling virtuosity. He was interviewed by Features Editor INDERJIT BADHWAR for the continuing series of photo essays on the great masters of Indian art and music.

THE microphone picks up and amplifies the sound of his sobbing which at times drowns out the song of the veena he is playing in a New Delhi concert hall. For 15 minutes S. Balachander has been nursing an intricate melodic weave in Raga Lalita. He and his veena weep together. "Andavane," Balachander whispers. "Andavane." (Everything is the blessing of god). Over and over he repeats the word. He stops in the middle of his performance. The raga, he says, has been performed very rarely. "By not playing such ragas," he tells his audience, "how much we are missing sharing with you. What sin did this raga commit to deserve the fate of not being shared with the world more often?" He thunders even as his voice breaks. Then slowly his eyes turned heaven-ward, he stares blindly into space and resumes the recital.

Balachander is a man given to both jovial, hearty laughter as well as to instant tears. Both, he says, are the products of prayer. His incessant utterance of andavane during a performance, he says, "is my beseeching guidance of the raga devatas. 'What shall I do now?' I ask them. Or I thank them for taking me to heights I've never known. Sometimes I don't know where I'm going when I'm playing, and I ask them to show me the way. Or if I have gone wrong somewhere I'm asking their forgiveness for having made an ass of myself." For him life ceases to have any meaning without his incessant conversation with the gods of music because, as he says, "they chose me for this duty on earth. To take their music, to take the music of the Vedas to earth through this divine instrument. What I am doing was ordained."

He expresses his sense of divine duty in totally matter-of-fact conversation. There is no braggadocio. But he is keenly conscious of his artistic burden. "It is a blessing. And one should assert the blessing. One should say, I have been blessed, not that I think I've been blessed. But in that assertion there shall not be any ego, only humility with which we should express our gratitude. We are fortunate to be in a position to feel this." The brutal simplicity with which he eloquently expresses the core of his metaphysical being also helps him remain remarkably free of many of the existential dilemmas which generally haunt great artistes. He is rarely troubled by doubts about his place in contemporary Indian classical music, about the heights he has reached as an individual and about the completion of his life's journey.

"My satisfaction," he says, "is immensely full because I've been faithful to the sur devatas. I have never cheated the musical expectation of the gods. They gave me talent and asked me to do certain penance. If I can play the veena with true sruti, then where is the problem of attaining moksha? In my music I'm always reaching out for the salvation I've been promised, and I have full faith in the gods that they won't let me down. Every single twang of a musical note contains hundreds of prayers. When I play a raga I am praying at the feet of a deity. Where I stand or oscillate on a note is a part of that prayer. It is an intense sense of surrender. It is always a source of wonderment to me why I was chosen from among thousands of talented people. Why did the imprint of the divine musical being come to this mundane soul? Forgive me if I sound proud but the veena is about 3,000 years old. There are references to it in the Vedas. The sitar is 300 years old and came into being about the time Amir Khusro lived. The sitar is a great grand disciple of the veena."

Balachander is the first of his own gharana. There was never any single guru, no lineage, no tradition he could follow. "I learned," he says, "by listening." He was an infant in Madras. His father, a lawyer devoted to Carnatic music, spent whatever paltry sums he earned on inviting musicians, mostly vocalists, to live and perform in his house. His elder brother was learning to sing, "but I was always the intense listener. I never opened my mouth." When he was five, a musician presented him with a kanjira, a tambourine, which he mastered quickly. And at the age of six he was accompanying musicians in concerts on his percussion drum. A year later, movie-maker V. Shantaram, who had heard him play, presented him with a pair of tablas and featured him in Sita Kalayanam in which his brother played Rama, his sister Sita and his father, Janaka. By the age of nine Balachander was singing and playing the harmonium. When he had just turned 10 he was accompanying his vocalist brother on the tabla at a concert in Karachi. During the intermission, a lady who had listened to him in fascination went home and "did something which was to change my entire life," he recalls.

"She had purchased a sitar for her son who had never used it. It had been junked in the attic. Its strings were broken and the frets were rusted. But after the concert she presented it to me with great tenderness. The sitar, literally, was thrust on me. I had never played the instrument but I used to listen to Ustad Inayat Khan (father of Vilayat Khan) play over the radio. I had the sitar repaired in Madras and began playing Carnatic music on it. All that was pent up and bottled up inside me, the musical treasures which had been stored in that young heart just came pouring out. It was ordained. It had to be ordained. It had just never entered my mind to buy or play a sitar, leave alone a veena. Within a year I was performing concerts on the sitar. There were about half a dozen good veena players. I used to listen to them forming Carnatic music but I always found something sing in their playing. Because I was also a gayaka ger), I found the sense of gayaki missing from their ring. Their instruments seemed to twang and not to g. The sound was staccato. They seemed to be missing e glides so essential to Carnatic music."

CARNATIC music, he explains, has more ghamaka (gliding and oscillation) than Hindustani classical music. "I tried to incorporate this through the sitar but I could not really succeed. I realised that the sitar is not meant to duce Carnatic music. The note of a sitar dies down far abruptly. What I needed was a more elongated note h a single stroke."

In order to express his gayaki style in music, he says, "I to choose the veena. It was as if it were beckoning to The sitar helped me as a diving board to plunge into the ocean of the veena. Wasn't this ordained? There have been veenas in the south for centuries. There must have been veenas in my neighbourhood since my childhood. But it was through the sitar that I discovered the potential of the veena to satisfy the needs of Carnatic music."

Balachander considers himself a "strict classicist" in the tradition of Vilayat Khan and the late Nikhil Bannerji. "I proudly proclaim myself a complete traditionalist. I am not prepared to enter into fusion, or jazzify my music or suit my ragas to meet the needs of the audience. A divine art cannot be compromised. When I play I explore my inner soul. In my audience only a small percentage will be receptive to my wavelength. But I am also concerned about the others who are not up to the same level of reception. It is my duty, through this music, to elevate their sense of appreciation by reaching out to them and help them come up and blossom as listeners.

"Some people pander to their audiences through fusion music and jugalbandis. Meaningless music has taken deep root, music which misses the purity and innocence of god. Artists who indulge in fusion music are those who have been failures in their basic approach. They have been unable to be true to what they started with and so they took a diverted route through which they found treasures on the commercial level. A duet with Yehudi Menuhin can bring you gold discs, but how much of it is a contribution to our tradition?"

Tradition, he explains simply, is "oneness with one's own spiritual identity" and it cannot be made into an exercise in musical populism. "Look at the goddess Meenakshi and Lord Balaji. To make them more appealing to the modern age do you dress up Lord Balaji in a Pierre Cardin suit? We have to accept the deity and divinity in its original form and ornamentation, which in itself has infinite variety and which is impossible for us to analyse even in a full lifetime."

And he has no insecurities about not leaving behind, after his death, any definite compositional piece of work. "Symphonic works," he says, "are great works. But they

Two hours before a major concert, Balachander es on a bed in a modest New Delhi guest-house. On other bed, covered with a blue cloth with faded gold embroidery, rests his veena, "my constant companion at whose feet I have placed myself". He is not anxious about the concert to follow. "I do not practise before a performance," he says. "I am not even thinking about it. I don't know what I'll play. I leave it to the moment. I'm a man of the moment. The gods will guide me." And that evening when he played, starting with Raga Machaspati and ending, tearfully, with Raga Lalita, the sur devatas had answered Balachander's prayer. Andavane.

SURVIVING MUGHALS

Disputing the Inheritance

LOST in the steamy slums of Calcutta is a relic of history, the last surviving link of the most powerful ruling dynasty that medieval India produced and which for two centuries was the sole arbiter of its fate. It is the blue-blooded Mughal family, now bereft of all trappings of grandeur, power or riches that the Mughal name symbolised. The sole financial legacy of that past glory is a Rs 400 monthly pension, which too has become clouded in controversy following sordid wrangling between the claimants.

Reduced years ago to slum dwellers, the last of the mighty Mughals have been waging a sorry battle to keep the tattered memories of their imperial glory intact. Mirza Mohammad Bedaar Bakht, the last officially recognised direct male descendant of the Mughals who died in penury six years ago in Calcutta, would often revert to the Mughal style in a pathetic attempt to relive his past glory. Recalls Amitabh Chaudhury, a senior editor of a Calcutta daily: "Bedaar Bakht would occasionally come to our office dressed in splendid shervanis, twirling his majestic cane and holding a rose." But today his wife Sultana Begum has no queenly pretensions. She has moved in with a Sikh in a Howrah slum and her only desire is to see the Government pension pass on to her only son, Kamaal, who she says is Bedaar's son.

Opposing her claims are Bedaar's two daughters—Qamar Fatima and Raunaq. Living with their father's old friend Iqbal Azmi, they claim that Kamaal was born of a previous marriage and hence cannot lay claim to the fabled Mughal name. "Sultana Begum wants to perpetrate a fraud on history by installing her son in the Mughal lineage," adds Azmi, editor of an Urdu weekly, who supported Bedaar and his family for 38 long years. They claim that Sultana Begum was first married to a tailor called Abdul Rashid and that her marriage certificate proves this. Azmi has petitioned the Government to inquire into Sultana Begum's claims, demanding that either the pension be transferred to Bedaar's oldest daughter Qamar Fatima, or she also be granted a pension.

While the Government is yet to respond to this plea, Bedaar's two older daughters continue to live in abject poverty, sharing box-like windowless rooms with Azmi in a slum near Entally. The girls are uneducated, untrained in any craft and uncertain about their future. But at least, says Azmi, they have not ended up as maidservants as their mother wished. says Fatima: "Now we only wish that our three younger sisters — Tarannu, Anvir and Zeenat Mahal—could escape from our mother's clutches." Tarannu is alleged to have been given away by Sultana Begum to her Sikh paramour's friend in Delhi and only threats from Fatima could persuade her mother to secure her return.

"It is tragic to see the descendants of one of our most glorious dynasties reduced to this state," laments Azmi, who has devoted all his life to petitioning on their behalf. The injustice is all the greater, he says, considering that most erstwhile nawabs and rajas continue to hold on to their ancestral property. Even the descendants of Mir Jafar, whose betrayal paved the way for British rule in India, to this day own a palatial building in Calcutta's Park Street. But the last Mughal emperor, Bahadur Shah Zafar, after the 1857 War of Independence, was not only stripped of his property, including Delhi's Red Fort, but banished to Rangoon along with his wife, Begum Zeenat Mahal and only surviving son, Prince Jewan Bakht.

BAHADUR SHAH and Jewan Bakht spent their lives in captivity and it was only in 1902 that the British Indian Government lifted restrictions on them, following protests by liberal British parliamentarians. Jamshed Bakht, son of Prince Jewan Bakht, thus got freedom and a princely monthly pension of Rs 450. Jamshed married twice and kept a mistress in between and sired two sons—one legitimate and the other illegitimate. The legitimate son, Bedaar Bakht, was born of Jamshed's second wife, Begum Nadir Jehan, on December 21, 1920.

With Jamshed's death in 1921, the British Government discontinued the pension and instead granted a petty allowance of Rs 16 per month to his legitimate son, Bedaar. Two years later, Bedaar's uncle took the impecunious prince and his sister Qamar Ara Begum to Delhi to request the Government to resume the pension. But British intelligence arrested Bedaar's uncle and released him only on the condition that he meet no Congress leader or disclose his nephew's identity. On the advice of Khwaja Hasan Nizami, a local Muslim leader, the uncle with his two young wards came to Calcutta and moved into the historic Shahi Imambara. From then on Bedaar started receiving the sum of Rs 50 as pension from the British Government, Rs 50 from the Nizam of Hyderabad and Rs 100 from the Nizamuddin Aulia Trust of Delhi.

BUT so paranoid was Bedaar of the British intelligence that he remained incognito for years. Azmi, who studied in the same school as Bedaar, says: "None of us knew that Bedaar was the descendant of the Mughals. The only thing that intrigued us was the fact that on the first of every month he would dress up like a king and spend money liberally." Bedaar's royal lineage became known when his classmates followed him to the Imperial Bank one day and discovered that he received a monthly pension for being the descendant of the Mughals. So overwhelmed was Azmi by the discovery that he persuaded Bedaar to move in with his family instead of living on the verandahs of the Imambara. After Independence, thanks largely to Azmi's writings, the Indian Government granted Bedaar a monthly pension of Rs 400.

But for Bedaar this sum was barely enough to support his wife and children. He spent his life sunk in depression, occasionally composing poems. Kamaal who believes that he is Bedaar's own son, recalls: "Walid saheb (father) would hardly meet anybody and would spend most of his time reading holy books and praying till late at night." And it was only on occasional visits to Amitabh Chaudhury or at a poetry conference that Bedaar Bakht would try to relive his Mughal ancestry.

Bedaar's stepbrother Sikander, who had remained behind in Rangoon, got a somewhat better deal, although he was an illegitimate son born from Jamshed Bakht's mistress, Halima Bibi. When Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose arrived in Burma in 1941, he financed the building of a mausoleum over Bahadur Shah Zafar's tomb. Sikander was given money to establish a general store and he lived in relative comfort till his death six months ago. Unfortunately, he also left no male child behind, and with Bedaar also dying without an undisputed male heir—controversy clouding Kamaal's claims—the line of Mughal males may well have ended.

However, charges Azmi, "today the legacy of the Mughals has been usurped by Sultana Begum and her Sikh partner and they are making money at the cost of the five true daughters of Bedaar Bakht". They have been receiving donations from various organisations and individuals for being a Mughal, he adds.

But Sultana Begum is anything but cowed. Says she: "It is Azmi who is after my money and has been threatening me for a long time. Only Parvan Singh gives us money to suppport us while the rest of the community just condemns me." According to her, Azmi has stolen all her documents and photographs and is trying to deny her son the rightful legacy. Tarannu, she says, was given to Parvan Singh's friend and not sold. "I am trying to give my daughters a decent life. But who is there to help me?" she asks. Her son, frustrated by poverty, is planning to migrate to Saudi Arabia.

As the unedifying drama continues, with both Sultana Begum and her daughters staking claim to the pension, the last of the Mughals have rightly realised that there is not much in a name, even if it is the Mughal name. Says Sultana: "What is the use of the Mughal name if we can't get enough to eat?" Indeed, it is an unenviable legacy and not many would like to inherit it.

Finding fault with an Otis elevator is now extremely easy.

The health of an Otis elevator has never been in doubt.

However, should that rare breakdown occur, we've taken steps to remedy it as quickly as possible.

To begin with, every Otis you step into, now comes with a medical history sheet.

That's recorded and maintained on a computer in our central control room.

At the flick of a button, our engineers can track down the model number and date of manufacture of an elevator installed in even the remotest part of the country.

And should you call in with a complaint, it's immediately recorded by our computer.

Which sets of a flurry of activity.

The control room instructs the service engineer in your area to look into the complaint.

The service engineer in turn notifies the control room of the nature of the problem and the time spent repairing the elevator.

Information that all goes back into the computer.

And though this may have done wonders in speeding up and streamlining service to our customers, what pleases us most is something else.

Based on all the data collated, the computer prints out a list of elevators that could cause problems in the future.

Based on which our service engineers can take steps to repair them.

And actually avert a breakdown before it occurs.

Suddenly the phrase 'preventive maintenance' takes on a new meaning.

So though you can occasionally find fault with an Otis (there's a 100 year old elevator in Calcutta that does need repairs now and then) you'll find it extremely difficult to fault our service.

THE DANIELLS

Lasting Images

PRECISELY 200 years after Thomas Daniell and his nephew William set foot in Calcutta to begin what was to become a European discovery of India, a commemorative exhibition of their work reveals its enduring fascination for the contemporary Indian as for the 18th and 19th century European. A collection of original Daniells at Calcutta's Victoria Memorial has been dug out of storage for the exhibition, which opened in Calcutta last month and comprises some of their finest oils, water and colour aquatints. The Victoria Memorial has the world's largest single collection of Daniells, valued conservatively at over a million pounds (Rs 1.8 crore).

There are a total of 66 displays including a portrait of Thomas Daniell by David Wilkie from the Tate Gallery and one of William Daniell by R. Westall from the Royal Academy Library. The oils displayed have been painstakingly restored and among the 44 original works on display are 12 fully restored oils on canvas, 28 water colours and sketches and 16 aquatints from the memorial's collections of Oriental Scenery and The Views of Calcutta. The other paintings are photocopies.

"Original Daniells are a rarity because only about 150 of the 500-odd paintings they are believed to have produced are traceable today," says Victoria Memorial's Chief Art Restorer, Arun Ghosh. The prices of Daniells are, therefore, rising steadily. Five years ago, an original discovered by a British farmer sold at Christie's for £40,000. According to art critic Pranab Ranjab Ray, however, "the present-day value of Daniells is the 'historicity' of their work and not any artistic genius".

When the Daniells arrived in India in 1786, the English were ensconced in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras. And the colonials' tall tales of the fabulous land they were conquering were shrouded in myth and rumour. Photography had yet to be invented and Indians hadn't yet learnt the art of landscape painting. It was the Daniells' efforts, aided by mass-produced aquatint prints, that provided Englishmen with the first startling glimpses of this mysterious subcontinent.

The Daniells' landscapes were unmistakably in the style of the English school of landscape painting—of Reynolds, Gainsborough and Turner—down to the shape and the texture of the trees. "Most of their trees resembled common English trees and they painted Indian trees, like the palms and the banyan, only when they specifically focussed their attention on them," says Ghosh.

Their chief artistic merit and the reason why Daniells are highly sought after today, was their perfection of the colour aquatint process. "It was this technical achievement that gave the Daniells an edge over other English painters," explains Ghosh. Equally good painters—George Farington, John Zoffany, Thomas Hickey, John Alefonder, Arthur William Davis, John Smart—did not achieve a fraction of the celebrity status the Daniells did.

A collection of original Daniells at Calcutta's Victoria Memorial has been dug out of storage for the exhibition. This museum has the world's largest collection valued at over Rs 1.8 crore.

Using resin and acid, the Daniells devised a means to etch lines and tones on copper plates to reproduce their paintings on a mass scale. Each aquatint plate could be used to "print" over 100 reproductions. Yet, each aquatint is considered as good as an original because the "prints" had to be individually hand-coloured and hence each had subtle differences from the others.

The Daniells travelled extensively all over the country, returning to England in 1794. Between 1795 and 1808, they produced their famous six-volume collection of Oriental Scenery. Despite the stupendous price of 200 guineas, the set was a sell-out and the painters instant successes. "In these views," remarked the artist Turner, "the East was as clearly reflected as the moon in the lake." The artists have "succeeded in increasing our enjoyment by bringing scenes to our firesides, too distant to visit, and too singular to be imagined...." The East became a rage and one lord hired Thomas Daniell to recreate a Hindu house and landscape.

The East might no longer be a rage in England, and the Indian landscape might have changed beyond recognition. But the scenes they captured—the river ghats, temples shaded by overhanging trees, boats rowed by turbaned coolies, the mosques, palaces and the stretches of languid landscape—endure. Even the Festival of India was not complete without the Daniells' views.

Photographs by KALYAN CHAKRABORTY

View near Najibabad (top); and the great tank, Calcutta

Although the paintings exhibited are some of the Daniells' best works, many of their rare and lesser known works with the memorial have not been displayed owing to lack of space (part of the gallery is affected by a leaking roof) and the need to restore many paintings before they can be displayed. The exhibition could have been bigger and better publicised. But at least this is one of the rare events when outsiders can get to see some of the treasures stacked inside the vaults of the memorial.

Pungent Prose

AN UNFINISHED JOURNEY
by SHIVA NAIPAUL
Hamish Hamilton
Price: £ 9.95; Pages: 136

HE buries his hands in his pockets. 'Is it like that in your island as well?'" Those were the last words Shiva Naipaul wrote before his tragic death in 1985. The heart attack which killed him six months after his 40th birthday also thwarted the book on Australia he had just begun. The start of the book (which, typical of Naipaul's oblique approach, begins in Sri Lanka) is one of seven pieces in An Unfinished Journey. And as his father-in-law, Douglas Stuart, says in a clipped introduction, these pieces deal with Naipaul's abiding preoccupations—his hatred of humbug and bare-faced sham, his search for identity, his consequent need to travel, his revulsion of racism and unremitting fascination with India, the land of his origins.

Like his celebrated brother Vidia, Shiva Naipaul was a ceaseless traveller labelled by his brown skin as one thing, interpreted by his thoughtful, elegant style as another. Hostile to artifice, flummery and facile shibboleths, he became a sort of upright chronicler not always welcome: he was deported from Morocco and banned from Australia's Northern Land. In his two essays on Australia (Why Australia and Flight into Blackness) he gives free rein to his toxic and withering prose. In his dry-eyed unforgiving style, Naipaul does a demolition job on Australian morals, its peculiar brand of apartheid, and sees its racial violence as a palliative of social decay. The bilious beer-swilling bigot he runs into is proud of the fact that he is a racist. Rob that man of his racism, Naipaul says, and you rob him of everything.

Anthony Trollope, every dyed-in-the-wool Tory's darling novelist, takes a well-deserved roasting. And Naipaul savages the fact that the aboriginal has been costumed in the haute couture of prevailing intellectual fashion, hailed as an ecological saint, obdurate freedom fighter, mystical dandy. Introspectively, Naipaul muses: "I am, after all, a man of full-blooded Indian ancestry. Should I therefore put on a dhoti? Should I take myself to the contemplation of the transmigration of souls? After a century of separation from the motherland, one of confusion and disintegration, my racial essence has offered no clues to the dilemmas I have had to face." It is sad that what promised to be a bitingly memorable work on Australia was stilled in its womb.

In an elliptical, touching piece he refers to his ambiguous relationship with his famous brother (My Brother and I), a remote and mysterious entity during his childhood. Vidia was often offered as a shining example by elders—Trinidadian scholarship, Oxford and an outstanding novelist. Shiva thus became "sensitised" at an early age to discourtesy and stupidity. He claims that the Hindu Trinidad of his youth was not that of his brother's. He says: "We did not have a shared past. We did not have a shared pool of memory, ancestral or otherwise." After Oxford (reading classical Chinese), he too became a writer since there was nothing else he could do. But, this decision, Naipaul feels was the first step to independence. He was breaking loose of the Doppelganger absolutism which had marred his childhood. But he bore his brother no grudges and generously admires his gifts: "He has served as an example and an exemplar. But we are each our own man."

His sharp, sardonic skills are again seen in a pungent essay on the Illusion of the Thirld World, where he argues that to blandly subsume, say Ethiopia, India and Brazil under one banner of Third Worldhood is as absurd and denigrating as saying that all Chinese look alike. People only look alike when you can't be bothered to look at them too closely. Naipaul maintains that the Third World is a flabby western concept lacking the flesh and blood of the actual. He writes: "Human beings don't come conveniently packaged in over-ready, identical format. Islamic resurgence is one thing. The excesses of Idi Amin are another. A Marxist coup d'etat in Grenada is yet another. A Sri Lankan massacre is a Sri Lankan massacre—nobody else's. It is not some vague Third World event happening to be fitted into off-the-peg categories manufactured by the Third World ideological rag trade." And though all poverty may look alike, there are striking differences. As examples, Chinese and Indian poverty are not the same. What will work in omnivorous, centralised China will not work in fastidious, centrifugal India: neurotic Brahminical sensibilities are very different from those engendered by a mandarin bureaucratic tradition.

The two essays on India—on the death of Indira Gandhi and the Nehrus—lack Naipaul's arresting insights. The first recapitulates the events leading to Indira Gandhi's assassination. His description of New Delhi as a bereaved capital the morning after is evocative enough. But the scenes are familiar: the Hindu-Sikh conflict defying reason and disfiguring history; the British who sowed the seeds of Sikh chauvinism; the Akali agitations leading up to the Khalistan movement. But Naipaul has his good moments, when he "realises" that Marx's doctrines were a kind of Hinduism easily absorbed and adapted by the tradition and teachings of the ancient religions. He marvels: "...communalism is itself one of the forms of illusion: that the communalist is a victim of false consciousness, in other words, of Maya. What a perfect Hindu Marx would have made."

The last work with its poignant title, An Unfinished Journey, promises the styl-

"Politically, India seems to have gone full circle, to have regressed to the shallow but deadly intricacies of the Moghul court on the eve of the British conquest. Is it too fanciful to suggest that one can already discern the dim outlines of future civil wars? The dramatis personae exist—one doesn't have to invent them. Maneka has her little princeling, Feroze; and Rajiv has his Rahul. The dynasticism which, to some, has seemed a blessing, offering India stability and continuity, could become a rather messy business if the claimants to the inheritance continue to multiply. Whatever its successes under the benign guidance of 'Captain Rajiv', the intrinsically capricious character of the dynastic principle will ultimately subvert the too cheaply acquired illusions of stability in the foundations of Nehru's 'secular' state. Today, India may embrace the civilised Rajiv; but only yesterday it was recoiling in terror from Sanjay and the demons he had threatened to unleash."

eloquence of the Chip Chip Gatherers Fireflies. Set in Sri Lanka, it is full of minating encounters, alternatively rse and amusing, scary and witty, with Sri Lankan bureaucrats and also, the ring evisceration of Tamilian women with broken bottles. He runs into one Goonetileke after another—the Sri Lanan equivalent of a Singh or a Smith. One ch sanctimonious Goonetileke involed in development studies provides ample fodder for Naipaul's acid prose. He also meets an egotistical artiste who dreams of exhibiting in "Roma". And the artiste's penury-stricken friend Tissa who, despite his arrack-ravaged brain, harbours ambitions of becoming a writer. Naipaul warmly takes to Tissa. It is after a rumbustious bus journey to his home that Tissa recalls that the men in his family were failures and the women were the strong ones. "He buries his hands in his pockets. 'Is it like that in your island as well?' "

Shiva Naipaul never returned to his typewriter to answer Tissa's query. If it has been pointed out since his untimely death that there have been others who died young—a Keats or a D.H. Lawrence—it may be said that they had made fulsome contributions. For Naipaul, bristling with ideas and incisive skill, there was the promise of much more to come.

SHIVA NAIPAUL

Angry Author

SHIVA NAIPAUL was like a bull in a china shop of perfectly glazed self-deceptions. His words, perfect pellets, shot through all humbug. And he could be merciless with the smug. In India, where he spent a year-and-a-half in long and short stretches from 1973 on, comforting illusions shattered with regular frequency.

Often the victims of the verbal batterings were the WOGs—westernised Oriental gentlemen (and ladies)—who pushed the India of poverty and want to the fringes of their consciousness. Many an evening would end with either the victim (Shiva could use the English language like a whiplash) or Shiva, the shoulders stooping forward slightly, his cigarette, a long curve of ash, storming out into the night. The self-christened Delhi "intellectual" journalist who boasted about being mistaken for an Italian ("North African at the very limit but never an Indian"); the rich and lovely ladies who came and went talking about Husain, buying him by the inch or yard; the almost rich for whom modernity spelt five-star hotels with the latest pop music piped in, "brought in by hotel staff on tour"; or as he wrote in his article City By The Sea: "Bombay matrons...(who) will weep over the victims of thalidomide but lose interest when talk turns to the hundred thousand waifs at large in the streets." People like this seldom escaped Shiva's torrent of words.

Anger was what propelled him. Many in India did not understand it; mistook it for arrogance. Shiva carried within him a kind of hurt at what was happening to India. He was almost possessive about the wounded civilisation, as his brother V.S. Naipaul (10 years elder) had described India—a description he endorsed in one of his last articles on India. Furious about western writers who nit-picked India apart (the kind who after a few weeks in the country became experts on the subcontinent), he felt that the journey to the areas of darkness in India ought to be undertaken by the Indians themselves. Angrier still was he with expatriates of undivided India: "The darlings of the liberals of the West" who "performed" on Channel 4 in England.

The areas of darkness for Shiva Naipaul, though similar, were different. The smelly dawn line-up along the rail tracks disturbed him, but it was not an obsession. The target of his attacks was the ugly Indian, the morally and spiritually fouled. Political apathy and indifference to poverty disturbed him more. A people which could be laid supine by a Sanjay Gandhi, a country where politics amounted "to rival forms of vassalage, and lends itself to the most abrupt reversals" got the worst from his pen.

For Shiva, India was not just a metaphor or a journey into the heart of darkness. It was a very personal voyage. He was at heart a Hindu—as best as he knew how. He ate no beef, and strangely enough, no pork either. For his son, Tarun, he wanted a correct Hindu name. And a few days after Mrs Gandhi's assassination, he brooded over the samadhis along the banks of the Yamuna on whether the desire to be cremated by a sacred river ran through his psyche as well.

Shiva was not an Indian by birth or passport; nor did Indians claim him. But he claimed India. When India won the Prudential World Cup in 1983, it was a full-throated "we've won". Unfortunately, he was never to write a book about India. He wanted the distance of time before he tackled India. In that year in India he worked on A Hot Country, his novel about the West Indies. But had the journey continued, India would have been the next long stop-over. Shiva was midway through his book on Australia when he died suddenly last year, but India was greatly on his mind during those last months.

Irony was an inseparable part of Shiva Naipaul's literary baggage. And it didn't leave him after his death. An Unfinished Journey made it to the Sunday Times best-seller list last month. Something denied him while alive.

BHEL

Rudderless Research

THE battle started over the typing of a report, and the combatants were an engineer and a stenographer. But with this minor dispute snowballing into gheraos, agitations, punitive transfers and finally a court case, one of the premier research establishments in the country has been reduced to unprecedented turmoil.

And as the spotlight has stayed focused on the 69-acre research and development estate of the Bharat Heavy Electricals Limited (BHEL) in Hyderabad, startling facts have begun coming to light about the abject state of a research outfit that has spent Rs 139 crore, without BHEL being any closer to reducing its dependence on foreign sources of technology for its primary business of producing power generating equipment. Agitated engineers charge that there has been no systematic attempt to direct research towards indigenising the production of components crucial for producing power. Indeed, a four-member committee set up in August 1983 to evolve a comprehensive research policy has not met even once.

Engineers who have banded together under the BHEL Executives Association (BEA) have been campaigning against this drift since the association was formed eight years ago. But the only result of their protests has been a worsening relationship with the management, of which the court case is now the most obvious manifestation. Consequently, morale at Vikasnagar is at an all-time low. Perhaps nothing sums up the research staff's feelings better than their name for BHEL: the 'be-happy-enjoy-life' company. Observed Justice A. Seetharam Reddy of the Andhra Pradesh High Court, in his judgement on the engineers' case: "It is time for an independent probe into the causes of unrest and discomfiture which, if not arrested in time, will disrupt and cause detriment to the division, if not the entire establishment."

The court case arose last May, out of a petty quarrel over the typing of a report between BEA President and Deputy Manager L.K. Kaul, an engineer, and a stenographer Kistaiah. The issue snowballed in the next two months. Kistaiah got his supporters to gherao the deputy general manager and compel him to suspend Kaul. Kaul went on a fast while BEA members held gate meetings. The BHEL management ordered its own inquiry but the report was never released.

Then, in a sudden move, the management ordered the transfer of four engineer executives who were past or present office-bearers of the BEA. While S.S. Rao, a deputy general manager, and K.D. Udeshi, a senior manager, left for their new postings, the other two—R.K. Murthy Gutta, a manager, and C.N. Srinivasan, a senior engineer and current general secretary of the BEA—decided to take the issue to court.

In court, the BHEL management argued that the transfers were part of the process of executive development, but Murthy Gutta and Srinivasan accused the BHEL management of mala fide action. This, they said, was proved by the fact that though they were immediately relieved they were not told what they would have to do in their new jobs. Justice Reddy upheld the petitioner's case and averred that the company was preventing BEA activists from functioning in a lawful manner. Remarked Reddy: "The transfer orders are arbitrary and for extraneous considerations and not based on any rational need." Reddy directed BHEL to retain Srinivasan but okayed the transfer of ex-general secretary Gutta since he had partly reconciled to the transfer order, having picked up the travel advance.

IT was in the course of the hearing that the real state of affairs at the research centre came out. Srinivasan and Murthy Gutta told the court that research output was far below expectations because of the lack of a clear policy and the indifference of the company. Though the BHEL management denied the allegations, the testimony and documents presented to the court led Justice Reddy to observe that "the sooner this malady is rectified the better it is for the undertaking. Otherwise, this great divide in thought and action will eventually bring about chaos and calamity which at a later stage may be difficult and even impossible to be cured".

The office-bearers of the BEA argue that research is neglecting the crucial area of developing indigenous capability to make boilers and generators. Engineers say that if BHEL had concentrated its efforts on four or five critical components for turbines and boilers, by now some designs and products may have been developed.

The BHEL management has an explanation for this. Says Technical Director M.K. Sridhar: "The research to develop major power production equipment will cost several hundred crore rupees. We cannot afford this, so the research programmes and projects are tailored to make the best use of available funds." But, counters Srinivasan: "The major problem is that the company is not clear what work we should be doing. We are planning to go in for collaboration to make washing machines and even have research projects on unrelated products like burglar alarms."

In fact, apart from the fluidised bed boiler, the only research breakthroughs have come in peripheral products like the electrostatic precipitator controller and a dual speed induction motor of 50 kw rating. Challenges K. Ashok Rao, president of the federation of BEA's: "Can the BHEL board guarantee that when the collaboration production programmes end in the early 1990s, we will indigenously make a few major products either for the boiler or generator?"

To this Sridhar replies that "our production programmes are conditioned by market forces more than anything else. If the customers want a product made with foreign collaboration, why should we refuse to give it? We are in business." This only seems to bear out the charge of BEA activists that BHEL will look around for new collaborations, or renew the existing ones, when the present tie-ups end in the early 1990s. Says Srinivasan: "Customers feel our product technology is not well proven and consequently want products made with foreign collaboration. Our blood boils when we find Coal India planning to go in for the import of fluidised bed boilers though our coal research group has come up with a successful product."

The fluidised bed boiler apart, nothing of consequence has come out of the Hyderabad establishment. The company has taken on fanciful research projects like setting up a solar power station at Salojipally in Medak district which does not produce even 40 per cent of its 20 kw capacity. At the Vikasnagar complex itself, some test facilities have been lying uncommissioned for years.

The classic example is the Rs 2.5-crore closed circuit test facility to analyse the performance of turbine blades inaugurated by Queen Elizabeth in November 1983. It has been run only 80 times so far with air or carbon dioxide, and not even once with freon gas—which is heavier than air and stimulates higher velocities at lower speeds. This, when the facility was okayed for Vikasnagar by the Public Investment Board only because it would use freon gas; there is already an air test facility at the National Aeronautics Laboratory in Bangalore.

Equally shocking is the story of the Rs 45-lakh generic training simulator to be used in the training of power plant operators. Though it is intended to improve power plant efficiency by training operators, the simulator has not been commissioned for it does not have a start-up facility.

The head office has added to the mess in Vikasnagar by frequent changes of the head of the Vikasnagar complex—in the last 10 years, Vikasnagar has seen eight general managers. Engineers admit to frustration because of the "uncertainty about who is our real boss".

The BHEL management has now gone in appeal to a division bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court against Justice Seetharam Reddy's verdict. The outcome of the appeal is due to be announced soon. But whatever the court's verdict, the main point of contention between the BHEL management and the BEA will remain: the direction of the research to be undertaken at Vikasnagar. No matter what happens to BHEL's proposal to make washing machines, it is certain that more dirty linen will be washed in public.

RITURAJ-ASHUTOSH DWIVEDI

Jain: water baby

◆ "Catch 'em young" is the motto of Gwalior's Laxmibai National College for Physical Education; but it's not always easy. Especially if the young 'un happens to be a skinny four-year-old, all wet behind the ears and slippery as an eel. Ritesh Jain, only son of his middle class parents, was probably born with gills for tonsils. At two, when kids his age are still wetting their knickers, the water baby was taking his first strokes in the neighbourhood pond. Today, the pint-sized prodigy can execute a 20-ft dive and a breathtaking 200-ft backstroke. The college finally managed to bait this prize catch last fortnight with a special one-year training course. Says proud father Sumat Jain: "I want the best coaching for my son. I'll even part with him if some national body takes him."

◆ Three months ago, he became the "tourist" of the India XI, because he went all the way to England and came back without so much as lifting his willow. But Raman Lamba, 26, was destined to see a darn sight better than the green turf at Lord's. Last fortnight, he was not only seeing it, but showing it to them too—the Man of the Series Trophy for the One-Day Internationals against Australia. With a fiery 74 off 68 balls at Ferozshah Kotla in Delhi, the Delhi devil outswashbuckled swashbuckler K. Srikkanth. Lamba was walking tall at the end of it all with the best aggregate: 278 runs. "I am feeling great; on top of the world," he gloated.

◆ From the sweat n' grime of footpaths to the spit n' polish of five-star hotels is a long way up the class ladder. But Saeed Akhtar Mirza has just rounded the Nukkad to Hotel—not the streetside 'Taj International—No Branches' but real five-star stuff—and for showmanship, picked up some tips from Raj Kapoor on the way. When Kapoor saw Nukkad, he was so impressed he wanted to make a film of it. But Mirza had other ideas. And so, the Showman will now finance Mirza's next manifesto on the other metropolitan extreme—the seedy inside of a ritzy hotel, "seen from the viewpoint of my main protagonist, a waiter". After Hailey, it's now the hotel according to St Marx.

Mirza (left); and Kapoor: the hotel union

◆ It was Rajani who started it all. And even after she retired from her shrill crusades to quiet domesticity, Bombay's cabbies never quite forgave Meddlesome Madam for that taxi episode. They'd still be hating her; but for director Basu Chatterji, who hailed a taxi recently and was instantly recognised by the cabbie. Flattered, he offered his autograph. But the fella gave a snort, revved up to go and was almost gone before you could say Priya Tendulkar. So Chatterji said sorry and by the end of the scene—shot for Jalwa, where Chatterji plays himself—he had finally won over the hostile tribe. "It was fun doing a spoof on Rajani," he phewed after the cease-fire.

◆ When Aubrey Menen, 74, completed his Four Days in Naples in 1984, and flew to Kerala—the land of his father and the setting for his next novel—little did he know that he was flying into a trap of red tape. Though he wanted to write a book and not gallivant on Kovalam Beach, the babus gave him a tourist visa. Three months later, the visa expired, the police started hounding him and banks stopped cashing his cheques. But he stayed on; only to be evicted from his Trivandrum lodging last fortnight, since the banks were still not paying and the landlord couldn't care less if his broke tenant were Aubrey Menen or William Shakespeare. Only when the harassed writer went to press did the babus creak into action. But not before Menen had acidly remarked: "The British have left behind a decaying bureaucracy. I wanted to change India's image abroad, but I've begun to think that it's justified after all."

Shock Treatment

Last fortnight's Cabinet reshuffle, Rajiv's sixth in two years, was designed to give a timely jolt to the party's power-brokers. The cutting to size of hitherto powerful men like Arjun Singh and Arun Nehru indicated a new phase in Rajiv Gandhi's politics.

Pioneer and leader of India's cigarette industry, ITC today is a multi-business corporation offering a range of products and services.

In recent times, ITC has diversified into several new businesses. It has followed many different routes with but one single pursuit—excellence.

Look at ITC today.

ITC's India Tobacco Division makes the largest variety of cigarettes and smoking tobaccos. Relying on intensive research and employing the latest manufacturing technology it offers the consumer the widest choice in price and value.

The Indian Leaf Tobacco Development Division of ITC provides the tobacco farmer assistance in agro-technology from seed germination to tobacco curing; it helps him improve land management and crop output. And ILTD is one of the largest buyers and exporters of tobacco.

ITC's Packaging and Printing Division uses paper, board and multi-laminates to create packaging to critical specifications. The Division enjoys the confidence of over 100 brand leaders with disparate requirements ranging from basic designing to machine-packaging.

Welcomgroup, ITC's Hotels Division, is the country's fastest-growing hotel chain. Offering international standard service, ITC Welcomgroup is helping to provide special impetus to India's tourism industry.

Bhadrachalam Paperboards Ltd, founded by ITC, is a core enterprise located in a backward area. BPL has achieved super productivity through its mastery over technology; simultaneously it has acted out of exemplary concern for ecology and environment.

Concurrent with the making and marketing of products and services, ITC consistently contributes to the community from the fruits of its labours.

Platinum Jubilee

Sangeet Research Academy and the ITC Sangeet Sammelans reflect the Company's resolve to rekindle interest in Indian classical music and encourage promising talent.

In sports ITC sponsors numerous events to encourage the pursuit of excellence.

ITC generates massive employment in its own establishments and the ancillary industries the Company regularly works with. Thousands more are self-employed in operating the channels of trade.

ITC, today's multi-business corporation, is a major creator of wealth and surplus; in the last five years it has contributed no less than Rs 2400 crores to the national exchequer. The Company's diverse activities, and their deliberate aligning with national priorities, make ITC one of India's more important corporate leaders.

Now, striding towards the 21st Century, ITC is confident of its resources, and the skills to manage them. Routes will be many and varied, but the focus will unwaveringly be on the pursuit of excellence. The inherited virtues and values of the past will doubtless put their imprint on the future.

FALSE SECURITY

Your well-researched cover story on the dastardly attempts on the lives of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and J.F. Ribeiro ("How Safe is the PM?", October 31) showed that our intelligence machinery is not up to the mark. The terrorists have again shown that their intelligence tactics, planning and strategy are superior to those of the officials in charge of the security of VVIP's.

Ahmedabad VINOD C. DIXIT

■ Two consecutive attacks on the prime minister and the Punjab police chief are two consecutive slaps in the face of the Indian security system. It is indeed a matter of great shame that even after the assassination of General Vaidya, no lesson could be learnt and no effective steps taken to tighten security. The lax security will definitely boost the morale of the terrorists.

Patna ASHUTOSH GUPTA

■ No prime minster in a terrorist-infested country can ever be safe. Why do we forget the attacks on Reagan, Thatcher, the Pope and the successful one on Sadat in Cairo? But the point is, can we afford to present his life on a silver platter to the terrorists? If the terrorist has to plan and work hard, perhaps we have succeeded to an extent to save the prime minister.

The recent attempt at Rajghat was a mere farce. There are too many loose ends—the country-made revolver and the so-called "missing the target". It was certainly someone's attempt to open the eyes of security. Will those eyes open?

Secunderabad LT-COLONEL R.G. RAJAN

PRICELESS USHA

P.T. Usha's soul-stirring and priceless performance in the just-concluded 10th Asiad ("The Golden Girl", October 31) goes to prove what a single woman can do to enhance the prestige of the weaker sex that women are always shown as. Usha's is a no mean achievement by any standards. We can only stand by and applaud the laurels that she has won for the country.

Madras A.V. GANAPATHY

■ A contingent of 400 heads, out of which 100 were officials, in a country of 800 million people has made a total mess of India's position in the Seoul Asiad. Who should be blamed for this state of affairs—the selection committee of various federations, the participants or the coaches? Reports reveal that the contingent was more interested in shopping, mud slinging and criticising each other's performance.

Kanpur U.R. GUHA

■ Your optimism indicating areas in which Indians could win ("Set for Seoul", September 30) has proved only a chimera. Despite our's being the biggest ever contingent, your medal tally proved foolhardy—without any bad draw or an upset stomach. The Asiad also brought into focus the matter of training and selection of athletes. The officials owe an explanation as to what ails our sports bodies. Is it not a fact that our players qualify by using illegal stimulants at home without being detected by officials, whereas they fail miserably in the final show as they dare not use the same for fear of being disqualified?

Sitamarhi NIRMAL KUMAR GOENKA

LEGAL GRATIFICATION

At least one tax official ("The Reward Bonanza", October 15) has been honest enough to admit that the "reward scheme insulates us against other allurements". Others consider it as an insurance against penury. India is perhaps the only country where one has to bribe an official to do a perfectly legal act. The Government will now have to ratify corruption by formalising gratifications as rewards to a weak conscience.

RESERVATION ROW

It is quite evident that the reservation policy ("The Politics of Reservation", October 15) as originally conceived by our erstwhile leaders has lost its relevance. The need for a workable national policy is paramount and politicians must sink their differences and work out a solution.

New Delhi — S. SANTHAKUMAR

■ I would like to ask just one small question. The rich have their money to protect them and the poor and backward have the Government and politicians to back them through reservations. Where does the middle class go? Are they the only ones supposed to use their brains?

Calcutta — DEEPAK GIDWANI

TRUMPED-UP CHARGES

Your report ("Knocked Out", October 15) gives no indication that the Government's charges against voluntary agencies in Bhopal are trumped-up. The state Government's slander that the voluntary groups are acting for foreign powers is reduced to a matter of mutual name-calling amongst the action groups. This belies the true nature of the problem. Your report also raises questions about the status of the groups and makes inaccurate charges of in-fighting. The ICAR report which Alok Pratap Singh says is confidential is accessible to members of the public.

Bhopal — ARVIND RAJAGOPAL

■ I was working with the Zahreeli Gas Kand Sangharsh Morcha while on long leave from my work in Kishore Bharati. I went back to Kishore Bharati in February this year not because of a 'split' with the Morcha but because I could not allow my earlier work to be neglected any further, nor could I afford to live without a salary any longer. I am still available for consultation to any group, including the Morcha.

Hoshangabad Dist. — ANIL SADGOPAL

■ With reference to your report on voluntary agencies in Bhopal, I am not and have never been a member of the Bhopal Group for Information and Action. I have never made any statement insinuating that the Zahreeli Gas Kand Sangharsh Morcha is an agent of Union Carbide.

Bhopal — SADHNA SAXENA

Our report was based on a statement purportedly signed by Ms Saxena. The signature, it now turns out, was forged. The error is regretted.

TONGUE-TWISTING

The so-called anti-Hindi sentiment and agitation in Tamil Nadu ("Tongue Trouble", October 15) is not against learning Hindi as a language, nor as the common link language of the 'bazaar', but against its imposition as the sole official language of administration. Southerners, particularly brahmins, were never against learning Hindi: on the contrary, they took pride in knowing the language. Once you make it the official language of the Centre, you are putting speakers of all other languages, particularly those with Dravidian origins at a disadvantage.

Bombay — K.K. UPADHAYA

■ Though Hindi is taught as a second language in English medium schools in Tamil Nadu, it is not a compulsory second language. Students are usually asked to chose between Tamil, Hindi and a foreign language like French. Also, the Hindi Prachar Sabha is being rather optimistic in concluding that Hindi is becoming increasingly popular in the state. Fifty thousand students may have learnt Hindi in 1985 but the population of Tamil Nadu is 50 million.

Madras — ULLAS KADRI

■ The purpose of any language is communication. What is wrong in using Hindi, Tamil, or for that matter any language, as long as the message is conveyed? The leaders should not favour regionalism in the crucial stage when unity is required.

Bangalore — S. RAJESH

GORKHALAND GAFFE

Your comment on the Gorkhaland stir ("Dodging the Issue", October 15) is a well-timed one. The stand taken by the prime minister not only confuses the whole nation but also shows his own confusion over the issue. Also, this is not the solitary example of the Centre's double-speaking policy. Rajiv is a master of twisting facts for political gains. But he should in this case take a quick review of the history of the country. His mother gifted us with problems like Punjab and Assam. We hope that Rajiv will not give the country another such 'gift' for some political gains.

Ranchi — BISWAJIT DAS

SIGHT AND INSIGHT

Your photo-feature giving an insight into a blind man's mind ("The World of a Blind Man", October 15) was indeed an 'educated' potrayal. After this, one cannot help but wonder who are the really blind—the physically blind like Mr Bhalla or 'normal' people like us.

New Delhi — J.S. KAIMAL

NOBLE DEED

Kudos to Governor Jagmohan for taking long over-due action in arranging to hand over the management of the Vaishno Devi shrine to an independent board ("Transforming the Temple", October 15). It is gratifying to know that many improvements have already been made. In fact, an enactment to take over all temples and shrines of Hindus by state or even Central boards should be made. The offerings can be used, besides improving facilities for pilgrims, to help the poorer sections of society.

New Delhi — GANDHARV SAIN

FANNING FANATICISM

The article on increasing militarism ("Militancy on the Move", October 15) gives a clear picture of India today. It is now the habitat of religious fanatics totally ignorant of religious principles. How else can one explain the encouragement given by religious leaders to their people to accumulate arms, when no religion preaches violence. These trishul-wielding senas represent the vestiges of primitive and animal-like instincts. We seem to be gradually marching towards the stone age.

Pune — PRAMOD TYAGI

COMPLAINTS FILE

In your report ("Bebop Granma", Londonews, October 15), you suggest that 'Bandung File' gave the Khalistanis a platform to voice their 'familiar litany of grouses' without a mention of the fact that Sikh contributors to the programme completely demolished their arguments and demonstrated the politics of J.S. Chauhan and company. There is a familiar argument which puts forward censorship as a solution to a complex political tragedy—as is now unfolding in the Punjab—and the advantage taken of it by a lunatic fringe. We disagree.

POLL 6 RESULTS—INITIATIVES

Lack of Agreement

IN this, the sixth and final poll in the 'Opinions Today' series, INDIA TODAY invited its readers to rank eight recent initiatives of the Rajiv Gandhi Government in their order of priority in terms of the impact these initiatives have had on the country. A total of 9,760 readers responded to the poll. For an independent assessment of the results, INDIA TODAY commissioned Dr V.L. Mote, founder-professor of the Indian Institute of Management, Ahmedabad, who also holds a doctorate in statistical methods from the State University of North Carolina in the US. His analysis:

THE role that a government plays in shaping the social and economic environment of the country it governs needs no emphasis. Even in the US, the Federal Government intervenes to provide medical care to its citizens, to prevent environmental pollution, to end racial discrimination and not infrequently to protect its domestic industries from international competition. It is therefore to be expected that in socialised India, the role of the Central Government in the socio-economic development of the country will be all-pervasive.

How do the educated citizens of India evaluate some of the recent government initiatives was therefore a question of considerable interest to INDIA TODAY. The participants were asked to rank eight actions that the Indian Government has taken in the recent past, in terms of the impact these actions have had on the country as a whole. The participants have ranked the "Anti-Defection Bill" as the most effective action and "Improving Ties with Neighbours" as the least effective one. Analysis of the rankings given by the participants is presented in Table 1, Fig. 1 and Fig. 2.

The major conclusions that can be drawn from the analysis of the data are:

▶ The degree of agreement amongst the participants in ranking the eight measures is very low. This can be seen from the value of the coefficient of concordance, which is the lowest in this poll; 0.14987.

▶ The lack of agreement mentioned above is because of the disagreement in deciding the effectiveness of the first three measures, namely the Anti-Defection Bill, rationalisation of taxes and the Punjab accord. There is a greater agreement in the ranking of the other measures. The phenomenon can be observed from the average scores reported in Table 1. The successive differences in the scores associated with the first three measures are low and not significant statistically. In this poll also, there is a greater agreement concerning the least effective measures as compared to the agreement concerning the most effective measures.

▶ The young participants (those up to the age of 20) differ in their rankings from the ranking arrived by aggregating the all India rankings. The younger group ranks "Raids on Economic Offenders" as the highest in terms of effectiveness while this is ranked 5th on the basis of aggregate responses.

▶ Rajasthan is the only state where the rankings conform to the national rankings.

The lack of agreement in the rankings is not surprising. Measurement of the impact that a government action has on the country as a whole, is by no means an easy task. The difficulty in rankings is further compounded when some of the Government actions under consideration are similar in terms of the impact that the actions have on the nation.

In spite of these difficulties, the participants have attempted to evolve criteria for evaluating the eight actions. The criteria that seem to have been used are:

(i) Will the action reward the honest and hard-working citizens? Will it thus channelise the energies of the nation in the right direction? Will it remove the discord that is harboured by a large section of society and motivate it to work in the national interest?

(ii) How well has the action been implemented?

The reasons given by the participants for assigning the highest ranks to the Anti-Defection Bill and rationalisation of tax structure provide a good illustration of the application of the above criteria.

Referring to the Anti-Defection Bill, some of the participants observe:

▶ Political defections, which reduced the citizen and his mandate to a naught and enabled power-brokers to form unstable and corrupt governments, would be check-mated by this action.

▶ There is a nexus between corruption and defection. Political support is bought and sold and defectors are rewarded with offices of profit.

Speaking about rationalisation of taxes, participants observe:

▶ People have got relief from taxes. People have become more honest and are willing to work harder.

▶ All the firm-rooted corruption in India had emanated from the colossal tax rates. This move has stemmed the collapse of our economy.

The Punjab accord has been rated high in spite of its poor implementation. The reasons stated are:

▶ Though it is not implemented fully, it has created an impact on the minds of the masses.

▶ Even though the incidents that took place after the Punjab accord caused anguish, the initiative to reach such an accord was very bold.

▶ Though the accord was not fully implemented, it has done a lot to restore communal harmony and eliminate the bitterness in the relations.

Thus, participants are convinced about the soundness of the accord and are willing to be patient in spite of the problems encountered in its implementation.

One of the surprising features of the poll is the low rank assigned to the actions for eradication of rural poverty. From the data at our disposal it is not possible to identify the reasons for this low ranking. It is, however, possible to pose some questions which might help us in finding the answer. The questions follow as a natural corollary of the criteria stated earlier. The questions are:

Are there unsurmountable problems in the implementation of these programmes? As the lead comment on Rural Waste in INDIA TODAY (August 31, 1985) observed: "Political interference or intervention in development programmes tends to make it difficult to keep a proper control of such programmes, leading to lax administration, leakages and eventually corruption of the system."

Are these programmes basically unsound in the sense that these programmes do not lead to the upgradation of the skills of the rural poor? It is needless to add that as the nation marches towards the 21st century people without skills will be left behind.

The answers to the questions are important if the war against abject poverty is to be won by the turn of the century.

SAMPLES of respondents' comments on the seven initiatives other than the Anti-Defection Bill give an indication of why they rate some initiatives ahead of others in terms of their impact on the country.

ASSAM ACCORD

The accord was able to restore the atmosphere of peace and respect for life and property after a prolonged and bloody agitation. The Assam accord is a milestone in the history of India.
Bangalore — J.K. Paulson

It brought an end to a problem which had plagued India for many years and it will lead to the development of one of the most neglected states of the country. An applaudable achievement.
New Delhi — Dinesh Karna

The accord was a vital step considering the importance of the border state in terms of national security.
Vidyanagar — L. Ambujakshan

ERADICATION OF RURAL POVERTY

The Government's most significant initiative since poverty leads to illiteracy and this in turn leads to economic stagnation of the country. The Government has shown undue courage and determination to tackle poverty.
Salem — S. Sendhil

Eradication of rural poverty is essential for ameliorating the living standards of the rural poor since most of the projected population of 270 million people below the poverty line by the 21st century, live in rural areas.
Varanasi — Abhinandan Singh

IMPROVING TIES WITH NEIGHBOURS

In the light of recent happenings like terrorism and communal violence, improving relations with neighbours will ensure the unity and integrity of the nation.
Bhalukpong — R. Ingalhalli

India is a vast country surrounded by hostile neighbours like Pakistan, Sri Lanka, China, Burma, Nepal and Bangladesh. It will be in India's own interests to strive for good relations with her neighbours to lessen external threats and provocations.
Calcutta — G.S. Chatterjee

MIZORAM ACCORD

The signing of the accord has ended two decades of insurgency. The people of Mizoram can now live peacefully and forget the bloodshed and untold misery of the past.
Shillong — Harold Khongsit

Because the activities of the insurgents were backed by external forces and the tough topography, Mizoram could have become a serious national problem. In that context, the accord is the highest achievement of the Indian Government.
Pithoragarh — R.P. Bhatt

PUNJAB ACCORD

The accord was a breakthrough in normalising relations between the Centre and the state. It revived the confidence of the people in the Government.
New Delhi — P. Shahdadpuri

The Punjab problem had all the makings of an inferno. Whatever its shortcomings, the accord was the first worthwhile step towards putting out the fire.
Palghat — C. Pillai

RAIDS ON ECONOMIC OFFENDERS

For the first time there is some accountability for economic offences and justice seems to have crossed the barriers of money, power and influence.
Bombay — Milam Mehta

Big businessmen who had the Government in their pockets have been shown that nobody, no matter how big, is above the law. Recovery of taxes has generated desperately needed government revenue.
New Delhi — Brajendra Singh

RATIONALISATION OF TAXES

In effect, this has reduced the temptation to evade taxes and brought relief to the honest taxpayer.
Bombay — V.K. Iyer

One of the few initiatives of the Rajiv Government which has been rational and liberal. It has effectively curbed the flow of black money and tax receipts are on the increase.

A Time for Priorities

AT long last, the prime minister has acted to give new shape to his council of ministers. The exercise has been essentially political, and more changes and announcements can be expected in the near future. But the primary message has already been conveyed in no uncertain terms: that Rajiv Gandhi is back in command, having re-established his authority after months of drift. Now, he has to get down to the business of addressing with fresh zeal, the problems confronting the country.

Looking back, Rajiv's first two years in office have been marked by an extraordinary number of initiatives. In the political arena, he has pushed for a cleaning up of public life (starting with the anti-defection law), mounted an anti-corruption drive, tried to induct new blood into the Congress(I), and addressed himself with considerable success to the problems in Punjab, Assam and Mizoram. In administration, he has tried to reorganise and trim some of the ministries, streamline and speed up the functioning of the Government, and started re-training the mammoth bureaucracy. In the economic sphere, Rajiv has introduced a new tax policy, greatly liberalised the industrial and trade regimes, and pushed towards modernising the economy. He has also announced a new education policy, redirected the family planning drive, laid new stress on anti-poverty programmes as well as their implementation, and forced the Government to pay greater attention to environmental issues. In foreign policy, he has shown fresh initiatives around the country's borders and even further afield. This list can go on.

AJIT NINAN

Given the scope, range and sweeping character of some of these initiatives, this is a good time to draw up an interim balance sheet. Some of them have clearly delivered handsome results (the new tax policy), others have already shown some returns and can be expected to show more, given time; these can therefore be placed on auto-pilot. Most of the economic policy changes would come under this category. But a good many of the other initiatives have quite simply fizzled out, and not been followed through in order to ensure proper implementation. This is a signal failure. Finally, some of the initiatives have run aground, quite simply because the prime minister himself lost a good deal of his initial momentum. The search for new blood in politics, the attempts at a leaner, more effective administration and a reduction of corruption at the level where the public deals with the Government—all these are examples of perfectly desirable objectives being articulated, accepted and then getting lost along the way to some foreign capital or rural hide-out. And on one very visible point (a less captive and sycophantic Doordarshan), reform is not even seen as desirable any more.

The prime minister may well have been right in opening up so many fronts simultaneously. He was obviously a man in a hurry, a young man who was keen to see his country get somewhere. But at this stage in his administration, when the Government and its chief executive seem to have little time for anything other than fire-fighting on a dozen different fronts, Rajiv Gandhi has to look beyond the immediate problems and decide on his most important priorities, the tasks that he will see through—say in the next one or two years. India is a country beset with problems everywhere, so the question is one of deciding what should and can be addressed immediately. This is not to ask for yet another rehashed 20-point programme. What is needed is the identification of a clear set of issues to which the prime minister and his administration will pay overriding attention, and with which he can galvanise the nation into action. There is really no other way of salvaging at least some of the initiatives of the past two years, and getting them to deliver results that people can at least see in their daily lives.

Tackling the problem of communalism should be Priority No. 1. This is an old dragon with new fire in its breath, and the prime minister has not even donned armour yet to face up to the threat. Only if he shows his own seriousness on this issue will the others. Tackling poverty and unemployment are never-ending tasks that need the stamina of a marathon runner, and Rajiv Gandhi must stay the course on the first and start running on the second. The anti-poverty programme has been revitalised but still has too many infirmities (leakages and shoddy work in the field, for instance), and could be re-focused so as to achieve quick progress in hand-picked areas: say, the provision of water and sewerage in the villages. The employment issue, for one, has not been faced up to at all. Education is yet another subject of prime importance: vocationalisation, the provision of basic facilities in schools, the proper implementation of the new policy.

There should be a sharp attack on public waste in all its myriad forms, whether in public sector industry, government programmes or anything else. The country does not have such an abundance of resources that they can be frittered away through continuing sloth, inefficiency and plain corruption. Finally, the prime minister must realise that he needs lieutenants whom he can trust and to whom he can delegate the many tasks he has at hand. Having cut some heavyweights to size in last fortnight's cabinet reshuffle, Rajiv Gandhi has tended to fall back on old war-horses to give his team a sense of stability. This may be all right as a temporary strategy, but what he really needs is people with the boldness, initiative and ability to seize a problem and wrestle it to the ground, in the same manner that V.P. Singh has set the country's tax administration right.

DEITY DUES

Cartoons by AJIT NINAN

■ There is news that will comfort a middle class beleaguered by the price rise. Incredible though it may seem, even God came close to postponing a journey last month in Nalgonda district of Andhra Pradesh due to a shortage of hard cash. And He could proceed only after His personal effects were auctioned.

According to rather agitated sources in heaven, residents of Golanukonda had installed an idol of Lord Vigneswara in their village. Nothing wrong there. And on a certain day in September they happily assembled to take the Lord for the ritual immersion. That was where the trouble started. The priest was not about to have any of it, not until some outstanding dues were settled: who was going to pay him for pooja expenses over all those days was what he wanted to know.

Shocked and indignant faces were all very well, but the answer the man of God really wanted wasn't forthcoming. So, he immediately set about proving that the practice of religion had also inculcated a fine practical sense in him. He auctioned the idol, along with dhoti and sacred thread, and even the offering offruits and sweets to the deity. Only after he had Rs 99 safely in hand was God allowed to proceed.

CHROME HOME

■ In Delhi, where shortage of space is a perennial problem, the son of a businessman set out to prove that one doesn't need too much of it to be able to accommodate the basic necessities of life. If you think hard about it, all you really need is a trusty two-wheeler. Plus, of course, a certain amount of time, ingenuity, spanners, nuts and bolts, and lots of money.

The enterprising young schoolboy has turned his motorcycle into a veritable home and it has almost everything except a roof and rooms. He has managed to find the place to install not only a tiny television on the fuel tank of his two-wheeler, but also a cassette deck stereo system, with speakers in the front as well as behind, a cordless telephone and even a battery-operated mini-refrigerator.

What is more, the thing actually moves, and reportedly has been driven all the way from Delhi to Agra and back recently.

The real problem that is being posed is presumably for the insurance companies, who will have to decide whether they should register the contraption under the head of vehicle insurance or household insurance.

SECOND SIGHT

■ There is life after death. Though doubtless, the nature of it could always be a point of debate. A youth from Madhya Pradesh's district town of Sehore has indeed gone a step beyond in deciding that if he simply cannot manage to do the things he intensely wants to during his lifetime, he will just have to postpone doing them until after his death.

This young man, a clerk in a government office, is clear in his mind that what he would really like is to get around the world and, particularly, visit the West. But aware of the financial limitations he has to contend with, he knows that travelling abroad is easier said than done. After pondering over the matter, therefore, he decided ultimately that he just couldn't manage it.

So he figured out a unique alternative. When a social organisation arranged an eye donation camp in Sehore last month, the young government servant was a willing donor. He had only one precondition, however, to the use of his eyes after his death. This was the stipulation that they be given to a millionaire—so that at last he would be able to see the world. A fitting case of keeping an eye open for opportunities, if there ever was one.

BATTLE BABIES

■ There is so much talk among academics of having to deal with uninterested students that it is easy to be misled. The truth, however, is that students have rarely been more keen to absorb knowledge.

Take, for instance, the village primary school in Rajasthan's Bhilwara district. Eager children would stream into class every morning and find nobody there to tell them about the mysteries of either the world or the Hindi language. More often than not, the teachers were having a quiet chat in another room—probably discussing the lack of student interest over tea.

Last month, the little fellows decided that enough was enough and a public servant couldn't be allowed to get away with this kind of thing indefinitely. Taking a cue from their betters, they went on a little strike of their own demanding that their teachers come on time and teach them regularly. They wanted those teachers who refused to change their lazy ways to be transferred immediately. Chances are that the humiliated teachers are now looking forward to settling scores at the next exams.

Prime Portraits

● The prime minister is known for his spontaneity, but there's a dangerously thin line beyond which it degenerates into impetuosity. Recently a well-known scientist from the Council for Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR), calling on the prime minister in his office, showed him a portrait of the famous Indian scientist C.V. Raman, done within the council. Rajiv was impressed by the high-tech lithographic depiction of Raman. Could it be reproduced in large numbers, he asked. The answer was yes sir.

Rajiv thereupon ordered that copies of the portrait be sent to every government-funded high school in the country—there are nearly a lakh and a half of them. And then he had a second thought. He decreed that similar portraits of other Indian scientists be made and sent each month to all the schools. The visiting scientist replied that the special paper on which the portrait was done needed to be imported from Japan. No problem, said the prime minister.

But there are other logistical problems as well. How should the portraits be despatched? They cannot be folded, and they cannot be sent flat by post. They can, of course, be rolled up. So the answer: special cylindrical containers for packaging them. But these also must be imported from Japan, it seems. So now it looks as if several officials of the CSIR are going to spend their time licking stamps and stuffing posters into protective cylinders—about 1,50,000 each month.

Model Show

● Westland, the ailing British helicopter firm that was virtually bailed out of bankruptcy by India's purchase of a fleet of helicopters, seems to have staged a remarkable recovery. Top officials of the company were back in New Delhi last fortnight to do some aggressive marketing of their new model of helicopter, due to become operational in 1990. An audio-visual show of the new chopper and its computerised avionics was presented to senior Indian defence and civil aviation officers over an elaborate lunch at a prestigious five star hotel.

Westland is hoping that the newly-formed Helicopter Corporation of India will, under its ambitious expansion plans, be interested in upgrading its fleet of helicopters which includes the earlier version of the Westland. The newer model, larger, more efficient with highly sophisticated avionics, is being manufactured in collaboration with the Italian aviation company, Agusta, and seems to have impressed the Indian officials present, though, like the earlier purchase, any decision by the Indian Government is certain to carry a political price tag.

Recruits Racket

● Army Headquarters has been trying to resolve a problem to which the brass-hats so far have found no solution. They have received several well-documented reports that the army recruitment centres in many parts of the country are ridden with fraud and scandal. One common racket involves what is known as a "benami test". It goes like this: Ashok, 20, wants to join the army as a jawan. But he is illiterate and perhaps undernourished and will surely fail the exam if he appears. So he asks a more likely candidate, Naresh, to front for him. Naresh submits an application, puts a thumb impression on it, calling himself Ashok, and passes the tests. At recruitment time, the real Ashok simply enlists with no questions asked. The racket was detected when an alert army doctor, on double-checking, found that the man who was about to be inducted was shorter than shown on the certificate of the preliminary medical exam. An inquiry established that another person had taken the exam by proxy.

Cartoons by AJIT NINAN

Herring Bureau

● The Intelligence Bureau (IB) is getting increasingly involved in fishing for red herrings deliberately placed in its path by people with motives far removed from national security. On at least five occasions in the last two months, they have received letters or telephone calls from so-called "informers" who have warned them about the impending arrival of foreign-based Sikh "terrorists" at Delhi's Indira Gandhi Airport. On each occasion, teams of IB sleuths have arrived at the airport and hustled off the "terrorist" to the hyper-active interrogation centre at Delhi's Red Fort for questioning, where the suspect is then kept cooling his heels while further inquiries were conducted. On each occasion, it was discovered that the suspect was in no way remotely connected with terrorists and was innocent. The "informers" turned out to be relatives who were involved in property disputes in Punjab with the people taken in for questioning who were non-resident Indians. Sources in the IB, however, say that they have no way of dealing with the time-wasting problem since all such information has to be acted upon—keeping in view the prevailing situation—regardless of the background or antecedents of the informers.

CABINET RESHUFFLE Shock T

FOR months the country had been waiting for the reshuffle. Ministers had been on tenterhooks, and at least two of the most important ones had even been sounded by the prime minister about changes in their portfolios more than a month before the reshuffle actually took place. But when D-Day came, it caught virtually everyone unawares.

When Rajiv Gandhi returned from his tour of the Far East on October 20, among the papers that he devoted some attention to was a folder marked 'secret'. It had a detailed report on the political squabbling between Arjun Singh and former home minister P.C. Sethi, along with newspaper comments and intelligence reports about the domestic political situation. The reports emphasised the deep schisms within the party because of caste alignments, and even talked of potential threats to his leadership.

Though his colleagues did not know it, Rajiv Gandhi had apparently made up his mind even before he went abroad. And soon enough his aides were putting through long-distance calls to Calcutta, Bhubaneswar and Trivandrum, trying to locate people who had to reach the capital by the next morning. Indeed, Cabinet Secretary B.G. Deshmukh had already spoken to officials at Rashtrapati Bhavan about a possible swearing-in around lunch time the next day.

Arjun Singh had bathed quite late on the morning of October 22 and was about to settle down for an AICC(I) meeting with party secretaries when his RAX instrument rang and he was summoned to the prime minister's residence at 7 Race Course Road. The portly Singh, it seems, had already got wind of the coming change, and had said as much to a journalist friend who wanted to interview him as party vice-president. Also summoned on the RAX to Race Course Road was Arun Nehru.

Soon, urban development minister Abdul Ghafoor, transport minister Mohsina Kidwai, ministers of state V.N. Gadgil and Khurshid Alam Khan and former Haryana chief minister Bhajan Lal found themselves waiting outside the prime minister's office room at his residence. Nehru was the first to go in and meet Rajiv Gandhi, followed by the others. In the space of half an hour, Rajiv Gandhi had outlined to some of his colleagues his most important cabinet reshuffle after being elected to office nearly two years ago.

None of the ministers had come with a resignation letter. All of them were told to take pieces of paper from M.L. Fotedar, Rajiv Gandhi's political aide, and write out their resignations. Ghafoor pulled out a blank slip of paper from his pocket and, after a heated argument over his performance with the prime minister (Ghafoor asked which other minister had been able to successfully tackle the problems of cities like Delhi and Calcutta), finally submitted his resignation. Mohsina Kidwai in turn protested strongly against being shunted from one ministry to another (she was assigned transport only a few months ago, and was now being given urban development). The last to go in was Sitaram Kesri, who wrote out his resignation in Hindi. Barring Khurshid Alam Khan, who addressed his type-written resignation to President Zail Singh, all the other letters were addressed to the prime minister. Rajiv wrote "Accept" on each of the letters before forwarding them to the President.

But there was a small variation in the case of Arun Nehru. While everyone else said in his letter that he would be ready to work under Rajiv's leadership in whatever capacity he wanted, Nehru wrote in stiff, managerial style: "I thank you for the opportunity you have given me to work with you." The prime minister wrote in large lettering and with some emphasis: "Accepted".

When the scene shifted to Rashtrapati Bhavan, there was confusion. In the Yellow Room, chairs were kept even for the ministers who were dropped. And those who were to be sworn in came 10 to 15 minutes after the prime minister himself had arrived. President Zail Singh, who began walking to the hall at 1.45 p.m., had to be escorted back to his room because the ministers to be sworn in had not yet arrived.

After the half-hour swearing-in, it quickly became obvious that this reshuffle was different from its five predecessors. Any cabinet reshuffle involves juggling with three or four factors: administrative efficiency, political compulsions, honesty and the need to ensure regional representation. In his previous chopping and changing, Rajiv Gandhi had sought primarily to put together a team which was performance-oriented, with political considerations taking a back-seat. But this one, in contrast, had basically political objectives. In one fell stroke, Rajiv had uprooted what he obviously perceived as the budding parallel centres of power, including cousin Arun Nehru (who had held a key portfolio) and Arjun Singh, who had used his party vice-presidentship to try and expand his personal power base by enrolling new Congress(I) members and appointing hand-picked party office-bearers in a number of states. Also cut to size was Shiv Shanker, till then a constant presence in the inner circle around the prime minister, who had to pack his bags and leave the Ministry of External Affairs in South Block and confine himself to the Commerce Ministry in Udyog Bhavan.

So, while the prime minister said that performance had been a yardstick in his decision-making and that heavyweights had been brought into the Cabinet "as we did not have enough", the biggest heavyweight of them all—Arun Nehru—was now out in the wilderness. The other political heavyweight, Arjun Singh, had been pointedly given a lightweight portfolio. Clearly, the prime minister was consolidating his hold over the party in a decisive fashion. And the shape of things to come was evident in the fact that four of the seven new ministerial inductees were not part of any of the known lobbies in the party.

Rajiv's experiment in delegating vital tasks to hand-picked deputies had obviously not worked to his liking. It was soon after the landmark AICC(I) centenary session in Bombay that Rajiv had created the post of party vice-president, so that he himself could devote more time to the Government. But he did not define the powers of either the vice-president or the working president (neither post existed in the party constitution). And as the days passed, Working President Kamalapati Tripathi was deprived of even routine information about party affairs as Rajiv allowed Arjun Singh to run the party independently of Tripathi. One indication of this was the relative expenses on the working president and on the vice-president. In the case of Tripathi, the expenditure was no more than Rs 6,000 a month. But for Arjun Singh, it went up to an astronomical Rs 1.4 lakh.

SINGH was soon asked to push through with the party's organisational elections, and trouble quickly followed. He was accused of helping his people to flood the party with bogus members on caste lines and inducting his own protege at the district level. In addition, he came in direct confrontation with the chief ministers, whom he summoned twice for meetings on communal harmony and programme implementation. Meanwhile, Rajiv appointed him convenor of the party's cell to monitor the benefits being given to the weaker sections—a post that gave him the excuse to visit states that were not actually under his direct charge. Thus he went to politically sensitive states like Uttar Pradesh and Bihar and questioned the state governments on various official issues. Not only this, Singh was also given charge of all the frontal organisations. As his control over the party grew, so did the number of his detractors. And he came into serious confrontation with Nehru over Punjab as well as Jammu and Kashmir. On both these issues, Nehru advocated a tough line, which Rajiv ignored as he sided with Arjun Singh. And by the time Nehru suffered a heart attack last summer, his decline had begun.

But Nehru's battle was taken over by Tripathi, the man who had once complained about him to the prime minister when party election tickets were being given out in 1984. The real problem, of course, was that no one in the party was willing to take orders from anyone other than Rajiv. Since he was not accessible to the majority of them and Arjun Singh tried to fill the role in his own way, he came under increasing fire. Initially, Rajiv backed him to the hilt, but he slammed the brakes when it came to taking punitive action against Arif Mohammed Khan (the former Nehru protege who resigned in protest against the Muslim Women's Bill) and finally P.C. Sethi, who had lashed out at Singh in a couple of magazine interviews. Meanwhile, Arjun Singh had also run into an impasse at the AICC(I) headquarters, where he failed to carry with him his team of general secretaries, many of whom had begun to openly express their antipathy to the vice-president.

When the break finally came, both Tripathi and Sethi gleefully welcomed Rajiv's decision to shift Singh from the vice-presidentship. Said Tripathi: "Arjun Singh now is the right person in the right place." Added Sethi: "I do not know on whose advice the prime minister has removed him, but I am very happy at this development." With the timing of Arjun Singh's demotion, the prime minister had also sent a clear message to the party that he was willing to listen to criticism, and that he was receptive to calls for change.

In some senses, the prime minister-cum-party president was now trying to start again with a clean slate by pushing aside all the warring satraps in the party. If Arun Nehru was sacked and Arjun Singh sidelined, Rajiv tried to remove Tripathi from the working presidency too by offering him the chairmanship of the Ganga Development Authority. Tripathi promptly declined the offer, and it now remains to be seen whether a new, tough Rajiv Gandhi would go ahead with what he had in mind regardless, or whether he would tread gingerly. Meanwhile, one thing was clear: the prime minister was now supreme, and both the men who had at one time or the other during the past year been touted as "the most powerful men after Rajiv" had been cut to size.

Others in the political arena read the signals quickly. Uttar Pradesh Chief Minister Bir Bahadur Singh, who partly owed his high office to Nehru, had seen the signs of Nehru being out of favour some months ago and quickly started building bridges with others in the prime minister's household. In the context of his past loyalties, he declared significantly last fortnight that "on my part I can assure Shri Rajiv Gandhi that the entire state of Uttar Pradesh is solidly behind him".

It would, of course, have been difficult for Rajiv if he had not been so even-handed, and had struck at one faction and not the other. Rajiv had been receiving reports that his cousin was trying to build his own political base and even that Nehru was encouraging dissidents against him and Arjun Singh. Nehru's gesture of sending flowers to ailing opposition leaders like S.S. Mohapatra was seized upon by his detractors to argue that he was even wooing the Opposition. But Nehru's apologists said that he was doing no more than reciprocating gestures that they had made to him when he was sick himself.

NEHRU'S meetings with chief ministers and other politicians created their own problems in this context. Once again, the Nehru apologists argued that since it was difficult for them to meet the prime minister and they were disliked by Singh, they used to drop by at Nehru's office for discussing their problems. In fact, most of the Congress(I) chief ministers have complained of the prime minister's inaccessibility, and his seeming reluctance to spend time with politicians. One chief minister said last fortnight: "The prime minister seems to prefer spending time with his friends rather than with us, and chooses to spend three hours at his friend's engagement ceremony."

For all that, it is alleged that Nehru might have been trying to build his own power base within the party: he certainly used his influence to good effect at the time of handing out party tickets for elections to the Lok Sabha and the state assemblies. And by one count, there were at least 100 MP's and several hundred MLA's plus 50 state ministers whom he had helped at one time or another. Viewed from the prime minister's camp, there was the distinct possibility that Nehru could, at some point in time, become the focal point

A subsidiary objective of the reshuffle was to give greater representation to the states—Haryana, Kerala and West Bengal—where assembly elections are due.

Certainly, Nehru also had his detractors, and he was far from being a very popular politician. Among the people who could barely hide their satisfaction at his ouster last fortnight were an influential governor and a Central minister. Rajiv himself had started talking disparagingly of Nehru, with the word being spread that he had not been very efficient in the Home Ministry. Many Congress(I) politicians failed to read the signals about the estrangement between the two cousins, and some continued to see Nehru in the belief that they were meeting the prime minister's right-hand man.

At its root, the problem with Nehru may have been his attitude to Rajiv. Five years ago, he started out by ushering Rajiv into the world of politics, helping him through the initiation process. Then, circumstance saw Rajiv Gandhi catapulted into the prime minister's chair. Nehru continued to deal with Rajiv as an equal. Now the prime minister has told him in no uncertain terms who is the boss. Although a political observer quipped that "earlier Nehru was down, but not out; now, he may be out, but is he down?", right now the signal is unmistakably thumbs down.

Over the last few months, according to one well-informed source, Nehru had

ARUN NEHRU

"I need complete rest"

HE had just finished jogging for an hour on his manicured back lawns. A team of doctors was waiting in his spacious living-room to carry out the weekly health check on Arun Kumar Nehru, the man who till some months ago was considered the most powerful in the country after the prime minister. Outside, a couple of cars carted in groups of politicians from Uttar Pradesh and Bihar.

Nehru's supporters in the Congress(I) were visibly demoralised last fortnight. But the former minister of state for internal security was relaxed and showed no outward signs of concern. "You see," he said in explanation for his thunderous exit from the Council of Ministers, "I am still exercising and can't strain myself beyond a point."

Nehru has been advised to reduce his weight from 90 kg now to 80 kg in six months, and to keep strict control over his diet. His doctors allow him a few cups of lemon tea and lightly-cooked food. Cricket, a major passion, is banned. Above all, he has been advised to talk as little as possible. But he finds it difficult to keep away the stream of visitors, and the telephone rings constantly. He tells his friends that he will be out of action for four months (which, coincidentally, is when assembly elections might be held in three states).

Excerpts from an exclusive, hour-long interview with PRABHU CHAWLA:

Q. How do you feel now that you are not in the Government?

A. Excellent. The fact of the matter is that during the last few months I have attended office for only 75 days. And even then I used to attend work for only two or three hours a day. The work of the ministry was suffering. Till I resigned I was only handling the paramilitary forces and police training. The reality is that for the next couple of months I have to take it easy. I could not have put in a 100 per cent effort. So I had to decide to work half-heartedly or quit.

Q. So you decided to resign, or the prime minister asked you to resign?

A. If I was honest to myself and my job, that was the only alternative.

Q. There is no bitterness?

A. There is no question of any bitterness. It is the prime minister's prerogative to choose his team. For me personally, I feel I am having a bit of a holiday now after almost five years of active politics. I am catching up with my reading. During the last four days I have finished two volumes of Churchill.

Q. People say that you were emerging as an alternative to the prime minister.

A. This is utter nonsense. There is no shortage of rumours in politics. Both at the official level as prime minister and at the personal level as my cousin, I will make every effort to strengthen Rajiv Gandhi and the party, in whatever capacity I am there.

Q. But isn't it a fact that numerous politicians in power were loyal to you personally?

A. I am not aware of those who are claiming to be my people. I have always maintained that in the organisation there is one group—the Congress group. If someone goes out of the way to announce his loyalty he is also to be submitted his resignation to the prime minister no fewer than four times, provoked partly by health problems and partly by the humiliating manner in which the Government announced that some of Nehru's important portfolios had been taken away from him. Some party spokesmen say that Nehru was offered a light portfolio, which he declined on the plea that he would not be able to do justice to it. Nehru himself disclaimed last fortnight that "the question of an alternative portfolio never came up, because I would not have been able to do a proper job."

The sacked ministers often reacted with surprise. Ghafoor argued with the prime minister about his record in office, and Gadgil had been expecting promotion.

If putting an end to the factional squabbles and putting the rival centres of power in their place was the primary objective of the reshuffle last fortnight, there were subsidiary objectives as well. Rajiv had a point about inducting senior members (three are former chief ministers: J.Vengal Rao from Andhra Pradesh, Bhajan Lal from Haryana and Arjun Singh himself from Madhya Pradesh), but he seems to have been selective in his rewarding of performance and punishment of non-performance. One other factor must have weighed heavily with him, because he gave substantial new representation to the states expected to go to the polls early next year: Haryana, West Bengal and Kerala.

The extent to which the coming elec-watched. Loyalties and commitment are not proclaimed but practised.

Q. What is your opinion on the Kamalapati Tripathi-Arjun Singh confrontation? Are you with Tripathi?

A. I am a Congressman. There are many challenges before the party. Each one of us must behave in a manner that makes the leadership stronger.

Q. Why are senior leaders fighting?

A. I have always believed in what Mrs Gandhi said, that individuals do not matter. It is the policies which are ultimately important. And no one should ever project himself as someone who is individually powerful. The Congress(I) derives its strength from the leadership and from the workers in the villages. And 99.9 per cent of these committed workers share power in neither the Government nor the party. That is where lies the power of the party and the leader.

Q. Does the prime minister act on the basis of a set of advisers around him?

A. This constant talk of four or five advisers to the prime minister is absolute nonsense. Anyone sensible will realise that in any sphere of life you achieve results by delegation. And if there are a few hundred subjects, there will be a few hundred individuals being consulted. Sometimes this confusion is deliberately created because people keep passing the buck and don't want to own it up. My personal feeling is that if everyone keeps doing his job honestly this nonsense about a set of advisers will stop.

Q. What do you think about the postponement of party elections?

A. I am not authorised to comment on it. It is for the AICC to react to this. I believe they are doing something about it.

Q. Do you think that dissidence has increased in the party?

A. When was there no dissidence in the party? It is a big organisation. But all the Congressmen are loyal to the leadership. The party office-bearers are taking care of the minor problems.

Q. Do you have any personal problems with the prime minister?

A. No. I have the best of personal relationships with him. And there is no misunderstanding; this seems to be a media creation.

Q. What role do you see for yourself now?

A. I need complete rest now. Soon I have to go abroad for a medical examination. I will be out for a few months. Let me get back to normal.

tions preyed on the prime minister's mind was revealed by the rehabilitation of Bhajan Lal, who had been earlier forced to resign as Haryana chief minister following the road-blocks he put in the way of implementing the Punjab accord. But now Bhajan Lal was back in office. Rajiv must have kept in mind the fact that he had already dropped Rao Birendra Singh in September last year and annoyed the Ahir lobby in the state. Now, if he kept out Bhajan Lal, he would have a difficult time wooing the non-Jat vote at a time when the Jats themselves were rallying round the Lok Dal's Devi Lal.

But even while obliging Bhajan Lal, the prime minister gave the former Haryana chief minister the politically insignificant portfolio of environment and forests, which so far has not been a Cabinet-level post. This was done at a time when eight important ministries were being looked after by ministers of state with independent charge during the last few months.

Electoral considerations weighed equally heavily in the case of inducting Priya Ranjan Das Munshi, who was in fact the first to be informed of the reshuffle, a day in advance. West Bengal now has no fewer than four ministers at the Centre, out of 10 MP's. If performance were to be the main criterion for the reshuffle, Rajiv would have given marching orders to both Programme Implementation Minister A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury and Law Minister A.K. Sen. But both have survived the axe. For good measure, Ajit Panja was given independent charge of the Information and Broadcasting Ministry. According to opposition leaders, Panja's induction was motivated by the desire to use the official media for the coming election campaign.

In the case of Kerala too, three of the 10 party MP's are now Union ministers. M.M. Jacob, who has become the eighth minister in charge of parliamentary affairs during the last two years, is known to be close to the faction led by AICC(I) General Secretary A.K. Anthony.

But when Rajiv says that performance has been a yardstick used for judgement, he strains credibility. Certainly, Ghafoor had little to show for spending nearly two years looking after urban development. And Shiv Shanker had manifestly been unable to carry the double load of external affairs and commerce. So there was reason for these people being dropped. But V.N. Gadgil at information and broadcasting had been happy with kudos from the prime minister, and was in fact expecting a promotion when he got the axe. Neither Shiv Shanker, who had been a constant presence in the inner circle around Rajiv, had his role circumscribed by having external affairs taken away.

ARJUN SINGH

"The ultimate test is loyalty"

At Arjun Singh's sprawling, heavily-guarded bungalow on Tughlaq Road, the expected sense of gloom was strangely missing. Two days after being removed from the vice-presidentship of the Congress(I) and being sworn into an innocuous ministerial post, Arjun Singh continued to play host to politicians from almost every part of the country. Ministers and civil servants from Punjab and Madhya Pradesh continued to be permanent fixtures. When Kunwar Saheb (as Singh's admirers call him) was away, his sons Abhimanyu and Ajay Singh (who is an MLA in Madhya Pradesh) ushered important visitors through the ubiquitous metal detector and into Singh's tastefully furnished study. They engaged other callers in conversation at the entrance to the main house, protected by commandos. A small mountain of files from the AICC(I) office and the Ministry of Communications began piling up on the desk inside. And in the annexe to the main building, Singh's six-member personal staff found it difficult to cope with the simultaneous, strident ringing of three telephones. The aides continued to give five- and 10-minute appointments to even the chief ministers and PCC(I) chiefs.

Taking a break from the unending press of callers and congratulators, Singh sat back and discussed the latest political developments with PRABHU CHAWLA. Choosing his words and threading his way through the questions carefully, he maintained that his political aspirations were "circumscribed" by the wishes of the prime minister. Excerpts from the interview:

Q. How do you interpret the recent actions of the prime minister?

A. With this cabinet reshuffle and his other actions, the prime minister has tried to ensure better cohesion, unity and accountability in the Government and in the party.

Q. What do you mean by unity? Was there disunity in the organisation?

A. I am referring to the total concept of unity in the Congress. This is where the real test of all Congressmen lies. Each one of us has a different perception of himself. But ultimately the test is unquestioning loyalty to the leader, and keeping a united image in the face of all kinds of provocations.

Q. Don't you think that by inducting you into the Government the prime minister has succumbed to pressures from people like P.C. Sethi?

A. This is not true. With all humility and with my experience, I can say one thing about the prime minister. Shri Rajiv Gandhi may be polite, but he can never be pressurised by anyone.

Q. The move to remove you from the party post seems to be a step taken to oblige the Kamalapati Tripathi faction in the party.

A. I don't think so.

Q. Is it not a fact that the party was split vertically between two factions—one led by Tripathi and the other by you?

N.D. Tiwari paid the price for going slow on the industrial liberalisation front but his foreign policy stance may prove to be somewhat pro-Soviet.

N.D. TIWARI

P.V. Narasimha Rao in human resources development nor B. Shankaranand in water resources have a sparkling record. K. Natwar Singh may belong in external affairs, but his record in both steel and fertiliser has been fairly dismal. Margaret Alva has also survived despite getting the stick from the prime minister for the sports ignominy at Seoul.

In fact, barring Finance Minister V.P. Singh, there are few ministers with a very creditable record in the Government. Ironically, Singh's own future seemed uncertain for a while; somewhat shrewdly, a few days before the reshuffle he called a press conference and gave out figures of sharply rising tax revenue. Meanwhile, Rajiv indicated in an interview that Singh was unlikely to be dropped. The finance minister spent the best part of an hour with the prime minister two evenings before the reshuffle. Nevertheless, he was sufficiently on tenterhooks immediately before the reshuffle, and rushed to New Delhi from Bombay after cancelling a dinner meeting with Bombay Congress(I) chief Murli Deora and a medical check-up at Jaslok Hospital.

It was evident, meanwhile, that the whole plan was implemented without thinking things through fully. As industry minister, Tiwari may have been going slow on liberalising industrial policy (one example being the interminable delay in framing a new automobile policy), but in external affairs he is likely to introduce a pro-Soviet shift—which can hardly be what the prime minister intends, given the manner in which Bali Ram Bhagat was dropped from external affairs last May following his anti-US tirade over the Libya issue. Natwar Singh's presence as minister of state could cause some delicate problems of protocol: Foreign Secretary A.P. Venkateswaran was a year senior to him in the Indian Foreign Service before Natwar Singh decided to join politics. Also, Natwar Singh has in the past been identified with one particular faction in the Foreign Office.

On the plus side, Vengal Rao had a good administrative record as chief minister of Andhra Pradesh, and may be able to do a repeat performance in the Industry Ministry. But then again, Narasimha Rao is still left with the additional charge of health and family welfare, while H.K.L. Bhagat has both parliamentary affairs and food and civil supplies. Some of the untidiness remains.

Among the few sitting ministers to benefit from the reshuffle are those looking after the various forms of transport:

A. This is absolutely incorrect. Why should I lead a faction in the party? I don't need one anyway. I never had groups or factions even when I was the chief minister in Madhya Pradesh, where I could have encouraged personal loyalties.

Q. The party seems to be divided on caste lines too—between Brahmins and Thakurs.

A. The caste lobbies are a non-event in the Congress. Caste has no political relevance in modern India.

Q. You have been accused of mustering personal support so that you can be an alternative candidate for the prime ministership.

A. This is the biggest piece of humbug going around now. I don't think anything like that even came to my mind. My loyalties are known to my leader. And I have no problems with him.

Q. But a powerful section in the party has accused you of not defending the prime minister against the recent opposition attacks on him?

A. This is contrary to the facts on record. As vice-president of the party I did contradict the Opposition's allegations and defended the party and the prime minister.

Q. Kamalapati Tripathi keeps referring to a group of people surrounding the prime minister who advise him on all important matters. Who are the members of this group?

A. Well, this group is not visible to me at least. Maybe someone else has better eyesight for spotting individuals who are invisible. The prime minister takes the advice of anyone whom he thinks is useful for a particular matter or issue.

Q. Do you now feel that you would have been better off if you had not been inducted into the organisation? It has affected your image adversely, hasn't it?

A. Nothing can be more painful and farcical than conducting yourself in politics with ifs and buts. I had earlier maintained that my politics began and ended at the doorsteps of Mrs Gandhi. And now I want to reiterate that my desires and aspirations are circumscribed by the wishes and commands of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. I have no illusions about myself. It is for the leader to assign any role, and it is immaterial whether one gains or loses in that role.

MADHAVRAO SCINDIA

JAGDISH TYTLER

RAJESH PILOT

The three ministers of state in charge of transport were rewarded with independent charge on the basis of their past performance.

Madhavrao Scindia in railways, Jagdish Tytler in civil aviation and Rajesh Pilot in surface transport. In the past, all three reported to a Cabinet minister for transport. Now they have independent charge on the strength of their performance. Another rising star with an expanding portfolio is P. Chidambaram.

STABILITY in the various ministries has been one of the casualties under Rajiv Gandhi. If people have come and gone from external affairs as though it were a railway platform, even parliamentary affairs has seen as many as six ministers of state come and go in less than two years. In the sensitive Home Ministry, there have been as many as three Cabinet-rank ministers and seven ministers of state, in commerce three Cabinet ministers and five ministers of state, in textiles one Cabinet minister, five ministers of state and a deputy minister, and in petroleum two Cabinet ministers and four ministers of state have come and gone during the last two years. Barring the law and finance ministries, almost every ministry has been bossed over by an average of four ministers in the past 24 months.

Geographical representation in the Council of Ministers is not fair either. States like Bihar, Gujarat and Maharashtra would have expected to get better representation. In fact, Maharashtra with over 40 MP's has only one Cabinet minister. Rajiv has not filled the vacancies caused by the return of S.B. Chavan to Maharashtra and the resignation of Gadgil. In the case of Bihar too, the 'vacancy' caused by the death of Chandrashekhar Singh has not been filled while Ghafoor from Bihar had to resign. Arjun Singh is technically a Delhi MP, so Madhya Pradesh is without Cabinet representation, as is Rajasthan. In fact, the north—which has over three-fourths of the party strength in Parliament—has got less than 30 per cent of the ministerial berths.

Inevitably, the Opposition was critical. Said Bharatiya Janata Party President L.K. Advani: "If you analyse his cabinet changes, you get the impression of a child getting tired of handling toys and throwing them aside." Added Janata Party leader Madhu Dandavate: "Not only is the political functioning of the prime minister casual and ad hoc, even his ministerial appointments are casual." And Lok Dal Chairman H.N. Bahuguna said: "It is a tragedy that a young man with a parliamentary strength of over 550 members can't put a stable team together."

Such criticism is perhaps to be expected. But it is clear that, two years into his term, Rajiv Gandhi has come to the end of one phase of his political development. He started out two years ago with the two Aruns (Nehru and Singh) as his immediate lieutenants. One has now been dropped, the other has preferred to be a back room boy. Then came the reliance on a handful of senior politicians as trusted aides: the likes of Arjun Singh and Shiv Shanker, to whom he wanted to delegate responsibility. But with faction-fighting and dissidence surfacing, and the men who were given a chance using it to build their own bases, Rajiv Gandhi has now clearly embarked on a new course. In a sense, Rajiv the politician has been born.

Immediately, there is no question of a "number two". In some senses, Rajiv Gandhi seems to have fallen back on a group of old non-political friends. In other ways, he shows signs of having opted for Mrs Gandhi's system of functioning: allowing everything to filter up to him through a variety of channels, so that no rival centres of power develop. Somewhat surprisingly, a growing tribe of Congressmen has begun saying that the prime minister has yet another channel of information and judgement now: his wife Sonia.

But the prime minister cannot but realise that he needs lieutenants whom he can rely on, and to whom he can delegate tasks. He seems disinclined temperamentally to spend time with political animals, but now has no one else assigned to do the job for him. And in the new climate of one supremo reigning supreme, questions of loyalty can become questions of overriding importance—and to the country's detriment. In this watershed period, the prime minister is also faced with the grim task of recharging his batteries, rekindling the country's faith in his abilities and showing that he can deliver the goods. If there have been no great hurrahs over the Cabinet reshuffle, it is partly because he has only half done the job at hand: in the sense that he has only swept the board clean, but not put in place those who will shoulder the new responsibilities. The next few weeks will show whether Rajiv Gandhi has thought things through, and found solutions to the problems that he has taken in hand after months of drift.

The most trusted name in consumer electronics from South India

Eight years ago, we had produced only 13TVs, in our first month. At that time we were nobody.

But in just three years, Solidaire became the most sought-after TV in the South.

With that it went everywhere and made history. Whenever and wherever it went. Today Solidaire is a name that spells confidence and trust.

Solidaire has always been a honest TV. We only say, it "Seldom fails". It's something for you to think about.

Nevertheless, we've built a strong after-sales service team eventhough you may seldom require service – a strength which we've always used only to our customers' advantage.

Which's why lakhs of people have been buying Solidaire. By now they all know one thing for sure. Ask them they're point blank about it : "Solidaire seldom fails; for that matter is there anything that never fails?"

Now, imagine those people who proved luck otherwise. They bought those 13 Solidaire TVs first, in 1978. Certainly they were being daring and adventurous.

Good they were : isn't it?

TAMIL NADU

Asserting Authority

VIDWAN V. Lakshman, a popular astrologer in Madras who goes by the trade name of Balajosier and claims to be close to Tamil Nadu Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran, is perhaps the saddest man in the city these days. Just the other day—in fact, in the Independence Day issue of his magazine Balajothisam—the pundit had matched the horoscopes of MGR and his close aide R.M. Veerappan and proclaimed that the two leaders have been inseparable companions for countless births and forecast that they would continue to be so for many more lives.

Last fortnight, however, the unpredictable leader of the ruling All India Anna Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (AIADMK) decided to prove everybody wrong: the stars, astrologers and political pundits. In a stunning and totally unexpected display of political authority, MGR axed 10 of his 23 ministers, including Veerappan, the powerful information minister who was clearly on the inside track in the 'after MGR who?' race. Adding insult to injury was the fact that seven of the sacked ministers were known to be in Veerappan's camp, which has long been waging an open war of succession against the faction loyal to party Propaganda Secretary Jayalalitha. Prominent among the Veerappan loyalists shown the door was agriculture minister K. Kalimuthu, who showers equal venom on Jayalalitha and at attempts to impose Hindi on the state.

Ramachandran tried to play down the political significance of his dramatic move by saying: "The services of senior party leaders like Veerappan and Kalimuthu are now required to give the party a new thrust and enthusiasm. That is why I have spared them ministerial work." But the disclaimer fooled no one. Veerappan himself refused to comment, but an AIADMK MLA who is a staunch Veerappan-loyalist admitted: "The Cabinet changes are a direct hit at Veerappan and his followers." Noted another Veerappan camp follower, V.V. Swaminathan: "The whole exercise has shown that MGR is the undisputed leader of our party. And there is absolutely no questioning that."

BHAWAN SINGH

MGR's sudden decision to axe 10 ministers, including the powerful information minister R.M. Veerappan is a reassertion of his authority as the undisputed boss of the AIADMK.

If the sack orders amounted to a guillotining of the Veerappan camp, the portfolio changes effected among the other ministers sent thoroughly confusing political signals. For instance, V.V. Swaminathan, who was earlier handlooms minister, was given the infinitely more important information, tourism, prohibition and electricity portfolios despite being in the Veerappan camp. On the other hand, former electricity minister S. Ramachandran, a Jayalalitha-loyalist who was thought to be an MGR-confidant, has now been handed the insignificant charge of food. To confound the confusion, MGR not only reinducted former minister K.A. Krishnaswamy into the Cabinet but also gave him back his old labour portfolio. Krishnaswamy was the only minister who had gone after MGR announced dramatically last March that 10 or 11 corrupt ministers would be dropped.

Veerappan's unexpected humiliation comes barely a couple of months after MGR went out of his way to ensure Veerappan's entry to the Assembly. MGR not only gave Veerappan, a member of the legislative council slated for abolition, a ticket for the by-election to Tirunelveli two months ago, but even hit the election road—the first time after his paralytic stroke in October 1984. DMK President M. Karunanidhi echoed the doubts in a lot of minds when he asked: "If the chief minister wanted to remove Veerappan from the Cabinet, why did he make him contest the Tirunelveli by-election in the first place?"

The state's other political parties were divided in their interpretation of the motives behind the 'Tuesday night massacre'. The Congress(I) has an electoral alliance with the AIADMK, so it was perhaps natural that TNCC(I) President M. Palaniyandi should decline comment. State CPI Secretary P. Manickam felt the chief minister's move "shows that the factional squabbling in the ruling party is at its peak". The CPI(M) and the Tamil Nadu Kamaraj Congress, however, read a deeper meaning into the reshuffle. Referring to MGR's March announcement, the State Secretary of the CPI(M) A. Nallasivam observed: "The chief minister has tried to create the false impression that the Government has been cleansed with the removal of these ministers." Argued Tamil Nadu Kamaraj Congress President P. Nedumaran in the same vein: "MGR should conduct an inquiry into the activities of these 10 ministers while in office. Otherwise, these cabinet changes can only be construed as an eyewash."

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

In fact, two main reasons are put forward for the sudden decision to sack the 10 ministers. All the dropped ministers had recently raised virulent anti-Hindi slogans. Kalimuthu, in particular, had made any number of blood and thunder speeches denouncing the Centre's attempts to 'impose' Hindi on Tamil Nadu. Former education minister Aranganayakam had also voiced public disapproval of the Centre's move to set up Navodaya schools in Tamil Nadu, saying that these schools would be used to thrust Hindi—so perhaps there was some prompting from New Delhi before the reshuffle took place.

It is also plausible that MGR started giving credence to the reports that Veerappan was trying to emerge as a potential threat to him. At some public meetings after his election victory, Veerappan's fans are reported to have hailed him as the future chief minister. He is also reported to have mustered the signatures of 95 of the 132 AIADMK MLA's for a memorandum demanding that Nehru's assurance on Hindi should be incorporated into the Constitution—the motive was to demonstrate the support he enjoyed among the MLA's. Significantly, Veerappan had got most of the MLA's their tickets to fight the December 1984 assembly elections because MGR had been away in the US for treatment. AIADMK sources, therefore, say that the chief minister decided to cut Veerappan down to size before matters got out of hand.

Willy-nilly, then, the chief minister has succeeded in bringing about a situation where the senior leaders and founder members of the AIADMK have all been sidelined, with the solitary exception of Labour Minister K.A. Krishnaswamy. Veerappan, Kalimuthu, S.D. Somasundaram (who was dismissed from the AIADMK in 1984 and who has now formed his own party, Namathu Kazhagam), K. Manoharan (who was the number two man in MGR's first cabinet formed in 1977 and is now the assistant general secretary of the DMK) and S. Raghavanandam (the former AIADMK general secretary who was stripped of his post last month by MGR, who took charge of the post himself), were some of the first people to join MGR soon after he formed the party in 1972. Most of the ministers who are still surviving in MGR's Cabinet joined him only after he became chief minister in 1977.

Late last week, MGR rubbed more salt into Veerappan's wounds by ordering the summary expulsion from the AIADMK of Pazhakafai Pandi, the Madurai district secretary and known to be a close associate of Veerappan. And, sources say MGR also admonished Kalimuthu for his virulent outpourings against Jayalalitha. Demanding her expulsion from the party, Kalimuthu had reiterated his charge that Jayalalitha is an agent of the Centre and maintained that the Cabinet reshuffle had been done at her instance. But had clarified: "I am not cribbing about my having lost the ministerial post. I will serve my leader MGR to the end and will do whatever he ordains."

For the time being, the Veerappan faction is lying low, not uttering a word against MGR. Said an AIADMK MLA from Madras city, who is a close confidant of Veerappan: "We see this as a test of loyalty that MGR has imposed on us. We will remain solidly behind him whatever our status in party and government. It is only a question of time before we are taken back." Barely 30 MLA's have backed Veerappan—a steep fall from the high figure who joined him in his anti-Hindi appeal.

The propaganda secretary and her followers are also tight-lipped on the changes, although they cannot but be pleased. Two months ago, when Veerappan had stormed home in the Assembly by-election, it had seemed that Jayalalitha was on a losing wicket. With the rival camps' fortunes changing so rapidly, it is now certain that the factional war in the party is going to hot up in the coming weeks. But both the squabbling groups and the observers can do little else but wait for the next chapter to unfold in MGR's puzzling political game. For the moment, MGR has left nobody in doubt about who is the undisputed boss of the show.

While the Veerappan camp has not dared to utter a word against MGR, Jayalalitha and her loyalists are also tight-lipped but it is certain that the reshuffle will intensify infighting.

Controversial Outburst

NO other action of Punjab Governor Siddhartha Shankar Ray has brought him as many brickbats as his one-page statement last fortnight asking Chief Minister Surjit Singh Barnala to ensure that there is neither any meeting on October 25 at Malout by anyone nor any blockade of the town. Certainly, the statement had the desired effect: the Parkash Singh Badal-led Akali Dal decided to postpone its scheduled meeting at Malout. But Ray's strongly-worded statement drew sharp criticism from Badal and his colleagues and disturbed the members of the ruling Barnala-led Akali Dal.

Most important, Ray's outburst has brought a sharp halt to his growing acceptance in the role of mediator between the two Akali Dals. To that extent, the governor's statement has harmed the cause of peace in the state at a time when there were clear signs that the Badal group—under pressure from Amarinder Singh—was resiling from its hawkish stand.

Ray had earlier flown to Malout, the once-peaceful cotton trading centre in Faridkot district, where the killing of three prominent Hindus by terrorists had created communal tension. Ray told INDIA TODAY: "It was an explosive situation, and the proposed meeting of the Badal-led Akali Dal just outside the curfew-bound town would have had grave consequences. Officials believed that the militants would take advantage of the public meeting and try to stage a Batala-type blockade."

On his return to Chandigarh, Ray first spoke to Barnala and later in the evening shot off his warning letter saying: "I was surprised to learn that there was the threat of a blockade or gherao in Malout. I could not believe that any person can possibly give such a disastrous call unless he is a lunatic." Mincing no words, the governor added: "No government could possibly be a silent spectator if such a thing happened. Everybody should realise that much water has flown in the rivers of Punjab since the Batala episode some six months ago."

BHAWAN SINGH

Ray's warning to the Badal Akali Dal from holding a meeting at Malout has called a sharp halt to his role as a mediator between the two Akali Dals

Finance Minister Balwant Singh met the governor to protest, while defending the right of the governor to advise the Government. Later, Balwant Singh termed Ray's statement "violative of constitutional propriety", but added: "He must have been touched by the situation in Malout." The Badal group's General Secretary, former minister Sukhdev Singh Dhindsa, showed no such restraint in his criticism. Declared Dhindsa: "It is now clear that Ray is the real chief minister and Barnala only a puppet. We are a democratic party and have a right to hold a public meeting."

The Badal group also protested that it had no plans for a blockade—Ray had apparently been misled by a mischievous item in a Jalandhar newspaper. In fact, Badal revealed later that the very day that Ray was in Malout, the group had met at Muktsar and decided to postpone the meeting. Ray realised that he had been too harsh, but Raj Bhavan officials continued to maintain that "but for his statement, Barnala would have allowed the conference in the same manner that he allowed Baba Joginder Singh to preach violence. The public meeting would have ultimately resulted in a blockade and added to the communal flare-up. It was no senseless act but a well thought-out statement forcing the postponement."

Still, it will now be a while before leaders of Badal's group walk into Raj Bhavan. In the recent past, many Badal group leaders—including Amarinder Singh, former speaker Ravi Inder Singh and even Badal—have had prolonged talks with the governor. Ray had even succeeded, to some extent, in dissuading them from meeting militants after the assassination bids on Rajiv and Ribeiro.

The most significant evidence of this came in the five-page letter from Amarinder Singh, who heads the Badal group in the Assembly, to Badal asking him to discipline Akali leaders who have been helping the militants. "Some of our colleagues like Gurdas Singh Badal, Sukhjinder Singh and Youth Akali Dal leader Sher Singh have been making irresponsible statements vis-a-vis the attack on the prime minister and Ribeiro....This has to be stopped if the Dal is to survive," Singh explained later.

Amarinder Singh's letter has had immediate impact. Last week, in a departure from their earlier policy, the Badal group's leaders avoided lauding the militants' role at a conference held at Pattran in Patiala. "We cannot run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. We have to condemn all terrorism—individual, state or group," said Sucha Singh Chhotepur, a Gurdaspur MLA.

As the Badal Akalis meet next week to work out a cohesive party line, the initiative undoubtedly has passed into the hands of Amarinder Singh and his group. "Those who go the militants' way are free to leave the party," Amarinder Singh warned. In this changed atmosphere, it is a moot point whether Ray should have been so critical of the Badal group's plans.

ATTEMPT ON RIBEIRO

Well Planned

WITH hindsight, Punjab police chief Julio Ribeiro's escape from the assassination attempt early last month in Jalandhar can only be credited to providence. Investigations into the episode in the high-security Punjab Armed Police (PAP) complex at Jalandhar have revealed that the terrorists' penetration of the complex was complete, and their plans meticulously drawn up. Most of the revelations have emerged from the confessions of PAP sub-inspector Gurbachan Singh, 41, who provided minute details of the mess to the killers.

Dhanna Singh and Wassan Singh, two of the five notorious (and now underground) members of the panthic committee which masterminded the operation, had set up a four-member cell of policemen three months ago, with the specific objective of assassinating Ribeiro. The cell comprised PAP head constable Ajit Singh, PAP constables Dalwinder Singh and Sardul Singh, and Balwinder Singh, who was posted at the Police Training School at Phillaur, 35 km away. Balwinder is a cousin of Gurbachan Singh Manochahal, the Damdami Taksal-appointed acting jathedar of the Akal Takht, who is also absconding.

The four used to meet at the house of Ajit Singh in the PAP complex to plan the details of the attack, the weapons to be used and the escape route. Often, they were joined by the self-proclaimed 'General Labh Singh' of the Khalistan Commando Force (actual name: Sukhdev Singh alias Sukha Sipahi) and an as yet unknown emissary of Wassan Singh. The last meeting, three days before the attack, was held in the house of Sardul Singh. Dhanna Singh and Wassan Singh got a Tarn Taran tailor to stitch the uniforms. The weapons were chosen by Balwinder Singh.

The near-success of the assassination attempt is a clear indictment of the intelligence agencies. The PAP complex should have been under the closest possible watch. It is no secret that PAP personnel are unhappy because they work harder for less pay than their compatriots in the Punjab police. Besides, they live in one complex, where the dissatisfied can easily get together. In the past two decades, there have been two revolts on the campus. Understandably, it did not take Dhanna Singh and Wassan Singh too long to identify a group that nursed grievances against their seniors and was sufficiently fundamentalist in its religious beliefs. By all accounts, the religious views of the three PAP conspirators, as also of Balwinder, were no secret.

The four policemen, who have been absconding since the attack, again hit the headlines last fortnight when their handwritten resignation letters were dramatically delivered to two Amritsar journalists. In their letters, written in Gurmukhi, they accused Ribeiro of wanting to "finish the sons of Guru Gobind Singh", and added: "You are sadly mistaken. We have never tolerated injustice and life is never dear to us. We are joining the Khalistan Commando Force and quitting the butcher Punjab police."

The attack on Ribeiro has also scarred the reputation of the Punjab police, which has had a mixed record in fighting terrorism. In the last two years, one inspector, three assistant sub-inspectors, 12 head constables and 13 constables have been dismissed for allegedly aiding terrorists. But against this, in 1986 alone, 37 policemen have lost their lives in fighting terrorism. Conscious of this, Ribeiro insists that his force is still largely disciplined, with just a few "treacherous" black sheep.

Clearly buoyed by the assassination attempt and the propaganda fall-out of the resignation announcement, terrorists stepped up their violence last month, capping it with the shootout in Khuban where seven people were shot dead by five terrorists. Even Ribeiro conceded that the attacks showed that the terrorists had scored "a marginal gain". But there's been no dent in Ribeiro's courage. Referring to the assassination bid, Ribeiro declared at a meeting of PAP officers and jawans at the same Jalandhar complex: "This incident is a big insult and the entire Punjab police is ashamed of it. Revenge this insult." It is easy to see why the terrorists consider Ribeiro a bigger threat than either Rajiv Gandhi or Chief Minister S.S. Barnala. It is also just as apparent that Punjab still needs Ribeiro.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Empty Bowl

LAST year, the New Year's greeting card sent by the Andhra Pradesh Civil Supplies Commissioner Charan Das Arha had featured a reproduction of the bronze statue of Annapurna, the goddess of food, holding the Akshayapatra, the mythical vessel of food that never runs dry. Ten months later, the search has begun in the state for a real Akshayapatra to supply 25 kg of rice under the famous Rs 2 a kg scheme to all poor families.

It is certain that the state's public distribution system (PDS) cannot maintain the full supply in the new agricultural year which began last month. A shortfall of 1.50 lakh tonnes in procurement for 1985-86 (October to September) has eaten into the state's buffer stock of 2 lakh tonnes and with kharif arrivals in the first month far less than normal, N.T. Rama Rao's Government is faced with a crisis. Says Arha: "The situation could not be worse. Before long, we will be scraping the bottom of the barrel."

The state needs at least 22 lakh tonnes of rice to meet the annual demand of the PDS. This amount is to be procured jointly by the Food Corporation of India (FCI)—whose target is 15 lakh tonnes, of which a third is meant for the national pool—and the Andhra Pradesh State Civil Supplies Corporation (APSCSC), which is to procure the rest. But there is little hope of the two agencies meeting their target because of the floods that devastated the Godavari delta in August and the continuing drought in 12 districts. Procurement from the Godavari delta—traditionally over 6.5 lakh tonnes—is expected to be no more than 1.5 lakh tonnes.

Ironically, the problems faced by the scheme have arisen because of its success. Under the scheme, announced in April 1983, green cards were given to families with an annual income less than Rs 3,000 entitling them to be given 25 kg at Rs 2 a kg. Later, in fulfilment of Rama Rao's pre-election promise, the income limit was raised to Rs 6,000. Consequently, the number of green card families swelled to a staggering 10.2 million—seven out of every 10 families in the state. Apart from providing them rice at Rs 2 a kg, the PDS also provides rice at Rs 2.75 a kg to families above the income limit who have been provided with yellow cards.

Today, there are some 34,000 shops under the PDS in over 27,000 villages. The state Government spends Rs 24 crore annually merely on transporting the rice. The amount of rice sold through the PDS has risen dramatically from 13.7 lakh tonnes in 1983-84 (November to October) to 21.95 lakh tonnes in 1985-86 (October to September). Says Arha, who is also concurrently managing director of the APSCSC: "The PDS has brought the concept of the welfare state to the very doorsteps of the poor and needy."

M. RANJITH RAO

The state, faced with falling buffer stocks and poor arrivals, is finding it increasingly difficult to supply rice under NTR's popular Rs 2 a kg rice scheme.

Meeting the demands of the PDS produced no problems till 1984-85 because the procurement was so high (27.38 lakh tonnes that year) that even after the FCI met its commitment to the national pool, there was enough left for the PDS. Warning signals were flashed when procurement last year dropped to 25.51 lakh tonnes. But the PDS managed by drawing on the buffer stock of 2 lakh tonnes. Now, there is nothing left in the kitty.

Fully aware of the perils of a cutback in the scheme, Rama Rao has taken several steps to prevent the possibility, but to little avail. Soon after the floods, he waived Rs 36 crore of subsidies given to the flood-affected delta's farmers and directed collectors to encourage farmers to sow paddy during the current rabi season. But shrewd farmers, fearing a water shortage in the pre-harvest months because water flow in the canals is traditionally uncertain after January, decided against taking any risk.

Rama Rao also asked Delhi to permit FCI to hand over the rice it procures to the APSCSC—and not meet its commitment to the national pool first—but granting this request may not amount to very much because the FCI's godowns are practically empty. The state may then have to resort to importing rice from Punjab, pushing up the subsidy on account of the PDS from Rs 80 crore in 1983-84 to an estimated Rs 230 crore in 1986-87.

Rama Rao is also pleading with Delhi to let him buy rice for the PDS at the procurement price notified by the Agricultural Prices Commission instead of negotiating a price with the millers. Says Arha: "We will be on the millers' backs to make sure more rice is available for the PDS." Rao has also asked the Reserve Bank of India to give cash credit at the concessional rate of 14 per cent interest on the purchase price for the PDS. If Delhi approves both the pleas, the state stands to save almost Rs 22 crore.

The APSCSC has suggested raising the price of rice to Rs 2.50 a kg but Rao will have none of that. But the situation is so grim that Rao may well be forced to cut the allotment to 12 kg like in Tamil Nadu. Alternatively, the offtake could be reduced by making it mandatory to buy a kg of wheat for five kg of rice. Posters on the nutritional value of wheat have already been designed by the College of Home Science in Hyderabad.

Rama Rao has still to resolve his dilemma of how to convincingly tell his electorate that the state cannot meet its commitment for subsidised rice. But no matter how he resolves it, one thing is certain: the familiar V-sign with the left hand to symbolise the Rs 2 a kg scheme will soon fade out from Rama Rao's bag of histrionics.

EVEREST HOUSE

Tourist Spot

THE ruins are perched on the edge of a cliff, home to a host of bats, snakes and lizards. The once-sprawling estate has long been decrepit, crumbling from ages of neglect and disrepair. But the peeling walls and cobwebbed fireplace bear testimony to times of glory and discovery, when a man called George Everest came looking for the hidden folds of the Himalayas and left his name on the highest of the world's snow-clad peaks.

For decades, the rambling estate of the legendary surveyor in Mussoorie's Hathi Paon has been a sort of no-man's-land, a historic landmark shrouded in the mists of time. But around it has now arisen a controversy of mountainous proportions, on its ownership and restoration.

Last fortnight, the Central Government announced a Rs 10-crore scheme to restore the estate and develop it into a tourist spot. Coming as it did after an earlier announcement by the Uttar Pradesh Government of a Rs 17-lakh scheme for the same purpose, it only muddied an already hazy issue: what exactly is to be done? And by whom?

The seeds of the controversy were sown early last year when the Nehru Yuvak Kendra of Dehra Dun held a folk dance festival at Everest House. The wide coverage of the festival and scathing criticism about the state of the estate in the regional press compelled the state Tourism Department to wake up. In July last year, the state Government sanctioned a project for the restoration and development of Everest House—built on 40 acres of core estate land—and Assistant Director, Tourism, K.L. Shah approached its present owners with a purchase offer. However, Chaudhary Puran Singh of Dehra Dun and his family, who claim to have owned the land since 1968, refused to sell, terming the offer—for reasons of their own—as "premature".

Meanwhile, Mussoorie Subdivisional Magistrate (SDM) Vinod Sharma came up with the 'discovery' that the land actually belonged to the state Government. The land, he claimed, was given to Everest under the Crown Grant Act in 1830, giving him all ownership and transfer rights in perpetuity and succession. Dehra Dun District Magistrate Ashok Khurana says there have been successive owners after Everest and most of the documents about its changing ownership cannot be traced, leaving its exact ownership in doubt.

An infuriated Singh, however, refutes this claim: "We bought the land, including the house, through proper deeds duly registered with the authorities." As proof, Singh says that he has been depositing the ground rent of the land with the Government ever since his family bought it.

The scrutiny of the documents related to the property has now been handed over to the state Government's legal cell. Khurana feels that the acquisition of the land would pose no problem. "The process cannot be delayed by the interested parties. All one can fight for is higher compensation," he says. However, Chaudhary, a lawyer by profession, has threatened to take the matter to court where he promises to make it "linger on for so long that Everest House may even collapse in the meantime".

The announcements by the Central and state governments of their respective grants and schemes have only served to confound the confusion. The original development plan prepared by the state Tourism Department and Sharma, envisaged developing the entire estate as a tourist spot with Everest's name serving as a historical peg. The plan included an open air restaurant, children's park, picnic benches, honeymoon huts and a zoo. This plan was apparently accepted, according to a letter written by the Assistant Director Shah to Singh on October 10 last year.

But the subsequent announcement of the Rs 10-crore scheme of the Centre has raised fresh doubts as to who exactly is in charge: whether it is a joint Centre-state venture or the Centre alone or the local administration? Says Prem Thadani, a hotel-owner who was one of the first to recognise the tourism potential of the estate: "The whole series of announcements of funds is very confusing. I am worried about what will eventually happen to the place."

It all depends on who will be in charge, and how they will go about it. If the place is developed into yet another pleasure park, with zoos and honeymoon huts, poor George Everest may just end up being relegated to a stone plaque. Which, given the historical value of Everest House, would clearly amount to a Himalayan blunder.

LOK DAL

Power Play

THINGS are rarely what they seem in the Lok Dal. For all appearances last fortnight, the fight in the party was over the expulsion of dissidents led by former MP Ram Bilas Paswan. And the group seemingly settling into the saddle was the collective leadership presided over by party Working President H.N. Bahuguna, which has taken charge of the party's reins ever since Charan Singh's paralytic stroke in November last year. The expulsions came when Paswan and his cohorts had been readying for a convention. Though Paswan claimed that the convention amounted to a split in the party, the party leadership duly dismissed this as a flop because none of the Lok Dal's 166 MLA's attended.

In reality, this skirmishing and the dissidents' breaking away was no more than a side-show. Paswan and the other leaders who went out with him were never predominant leaders in their states. And if they were expelled last fortnight, they were merely paying the price for challenging the might of the collective leadership—which is dominated by the 'subedars' who have consolidated their hold in the states after Charan Singh's eclipse. Paswan clashed with Karpoori Thakur in Bihar, Rajendra Singh with Mulayam Singh Yadav in Uttar Pradesh and Bhim Singh Dahiya with Devi Lal in Haryana, even as they swore by Charan Singh's leadership. But, by taking on the subedars head-on, they committed political harakiri.

The real battle for leadership will be between the state chieftains and Ajit Singh, Charan Singh's son who formally entered politics in May and quickly got a Rajya Sabha nomination and the post of a general secretary. Singh's camp has always acknowledged that he cannot take over the reins of the party until he acquires the stature of his father among the party's following in the Jats and the backward castes and among the party activists. And, away from the spotlight grabbed momentarily by Paswan and his men, this battle has already started.

The Ajit Singh camp's initial strategy was to take him to the people soon after he took the plunge into politics. But then Singh got bogged down in helping the collective leadership tackle the infighting in the party over the Rajya Sabha nominations—which culminated in last fortnight's split—and in patching up with his mother (Gayatri Devi) and sister (Saroj Verma), who were openly supporting the dissidents while Singh backed the disciplinary measures against the dissidents. But in late September, Singh unobtrusively initiated his mass contact programme, kicking off with a convention of the Yuva Lok Dal. Then the former computer specialist addressed huge public meetings in Baghpat (Charan Singh's parliamentary constituency), Sonepat, Muzaffarnagar and Etawah in just three weeks.

The response, claimed Singh and his closest aide, Ajay Singh (elected as an MLC in Uttar Pradesh with Ajit Singh's help) was "overwhelming, beyond all expectations". In Muzaffarnagar, Ajit Singh was presented with a purse of Rs 3.5 lakh and a Maruti car; in Sonepat, he stole the show despite the presence on the dais of Devi Lal and two former chief ministers, Bhagwat Dayal Sharma and Banarsi Das Gupta; in Baghpat it was like a homecoming with a hundred arches to welcome him—far more than the Chaudhary ever got. Both Ajit Singh and the other speakers evoked the dynastic theme, and a chastened Saroj Verma introduced her brother to the audience as "the future hope of the Lok Dal".

The mass contact programme, say Singh camp insiders, is calculated to attain two objectives. By demonstrating his hold among the masses, the 'subedars' will be made to see that Singh is well on his way to becoming as popular as his father, and that he is the only leader with the ability to draw crowds in all the states—unlike the 'subedars' whose appeal is confined to their own individual states. This is already happening, they claim. The Rajasthan state party chief, Nathu Ram Mirdha, had said in an interview given before Singh's trip to Jaipur that it would take Singh at least a decade before he was given the party's leadership. But after seeing the overwhelming reception given to Singh by the Yuva Lok Dal members, Mirdha's speech at the convention was an unadulterated paean in praise of Singh.

the party activists is acknowledged, Singh will be in a position to take over the party's reins, hopefully with the subedars' consent. Said K.C.Tyagi, a party general secretary: "The purpose is to take the party along, not usurp power. Had we gone for the jugular in June itself, the party would have faced a real split, not the fake one brought about by Paswan and his men." In the next few months, the Singh show will move to east Uttar Pradesh and, finally, Bihar. Killer Bridge

THE 712.23 metre Jajmau bridge on National Highway 25 in Uttar Pradesh which links Kanpur to Lucknow and other districts is fast becoming a death-trap. Over 200 persons have been killed in the past six years on the bridge. Four major accidents have occurred on this stretch, the latest being on October 9 in which 69 persons were killed. On three occasions, Uttar Pradesh Roadways buses, overloaded with passengers, have nose-dived into the river from the bridge with its protective parapet and railings crumbling under the impact of the collisions.

Despite ample evidence in the Public Works Department (PWD) files and inquiry reports of previous accidents of a major design defect, state Government officials vehemently deny this possibility and proposals for modifications made in October 1984 have been gathering dust for nearly two years now.

The latest incident, however, in which an overloaded bus again plunged into the river without the slightest resistance from the parapets, has rattled the Government, specially since many proposals to prevent recurrence of such accidents have always been reduced into a tug-of-war between officials of two politically powerful departments—the PWD under Chief Minister Veer Bahadur Singh and the Transport Department under its minister Sanjay Singh. The Transport Department accuses the PWD of not carrying out suggested improvements which in turn, clinging to the theory of "no design defect", blame rash driving by the Uttar Pradesh State Road Transport Corporation (UPSRTC) drivers and overcrowding for the accidents.

The proposal for amending the design of the bridge was made in an inquiry report submitted to the Government in May 1984 after the September 27, 1983 accident in which 71 passengers were killed. PWD experts were asked to prepare new designs, incorporating higher footway kerbs, another protective railing and speed-breakers on either side of the bridge. The drawings were completed in August but were soon forgotten about. Earlier, in September 1981 a UPSRTC bus had hurtled past the railings killing all 60 passengers on board and in September 1979, a truck had fallen from the bridge killing six persons.

Jajmau bridge linking Kanpur to Lucknow: death-trap

Despite this alarming background, PWD officials have not implemented any of the schemes for strengthening the protective system of the bridge, which is used by more than 10,000 vehicles, including 2,570 heavy vehicles, every day. PWD officials say that the proposal to carry out design amendments of the kerbs and parapet were referred to the Bridge Committee of the Indian Road Congress, Ministry of Transport on August 22, 1984 but admit there was no need for such a move. The state Government was empowered to order any amendments in the bridge design in view of the recurring accidents.

Even to a layman, the bridge appears an invitation to disaster. Experts inquiring into the latest accident say that the actual roadway is 7.5 metres, thus making it a two-lane highway. The width of the kerbs is 1.5 metres on either side and the height is 228.6 mm, a "surmountable height" for vehicular traffic.

Adding to the danger is the fact that the bridge has a straight approach road which fuels the urge to over-speed. "If you see the bridge from a distance of 500 yards, it appears to be more broad than it really is because of the insufficient height of the kerbs," said a UPSRTC inquiry officer. There is also no restraining obstacle for a vehicle which hits the kerb, except for the weak 1.1 metre high railing which is designed only to provide some measure of safety to pedestrians. "Once a vehicle hits the kerb with even a speed of 40 kmph there are at least 90 per cent chances that it will climb the kerb and fall into the river," say officials. A preliminary UPSRTC report filed with the state Government recommends raising the height of the kerb to 380 mm and the provision of a stronger railing.

Officials of the Uttar Pradesh Bridge Corporation which built the bridge in 1977 concede that some modifications are necessary. Said N.C. Saxena, chief engineer of the corporation: "In view of the recurring accidents, raising of the height of kerbs has to be considered, besides provision of more protective parapet railings." Corporation experts also admit that the two-lane bridge cannot handle the density of two-way traffic on this highway and a possible solution is to build another two-lane bridge near this one. But despite three major disasters, the infighting within the various departments has so far stymied any action. Jajmau will continue to live with its sobriquet of "The Killer Bridge".

SHIV SENA

Striking Out

FOR the first time in its chequered 30-year-old history the militant Shiv Sena led by Bal Thackeray is poised to make its mark as a state-level party in Maharashtra. So far restricted to Bombay and a few smaller urban areas, the Sena has seen a rapid expansion of its influence and organisation in the last two years. Last month, following its first major state-level conference of party workers, the controversial organisation announced that it would contest—entirely on its own—the forthcoming elections in a majority of the 29 zilla parishads in Maharashtra. Said the Shiv Sena chief Bal Thackeray: "I am confident we have reached deep into the hearts of people in the villages. The public mood is in our favour."

Certainly the mood at the conference, attended by an estimated 5,000 delegates from newly opened branches in a majority of districts, was distinctly upbeat. Reflecting this, Thackeray said: "The zilla parishad elections will be a kind of test. How many we win is not the question; they will show how far we have reached." Later, at the annual Dussehra rally of the party, Thackeray declared that his ambition was to "see the saffron flag of the Sena on the legislature after the next elections".

There is no doubt about the upswing in Shiv Sena's fortunes. Following its success in the Bombay municipal polls in April last year—when it successfully capitalised on a controversy fuelled by the then beleaguered Congress(I) chief minister Vasantdada Patil that the Centre was considering converting the state capital into a Union territory—the Shiv Sena launched a concerted drive to expand in the districts, opening hundreds of units in all regions barring a few districts in Vidarbha. The Sena claims that just in Marathwada, the region to which Chief Minister S.B. Chavan belongs, it has established 200 units, and that the response has been similarly encouraging in the sugar belt of western Maharashtra and coastal Konkan.

The Sena's claims are not exaggerated. Large, freshly-painted boards of the Shiv Sena, with its intimidating symbol of a roaring tiger and a flying saffron flag can be seen even in remote areas. The party's main support comes from young, semi-literate men belonging to underprivileged castes.

The Sena's growth is primarily a result of a shift in emphasis of its political platform. Till two years ago, it was content to project itself as the champion of the rights of Marathi-speaking people—an emotional issue which could strike a chord only in the multi-lingual cauldron of Bombay. But following communal riots in the state capital and neighbouring towns in 1984, the Sena began building up an image of a party aggressively committed to the cause of Hindus. Asked, last fortnight, what the Sena's strategy would be in the zilla parishad poll, Thackeray replied candidly: "Our plank will be simply Hinduism." At the Dussehra rally, Thackeray even called on Hindus to arm themselves to safeguard the community from "possible attacks".

The Sena's rise has not gone unnoticed. Chief Minister Chavan has openly wanted to know from where the Sena got the money to expand like this. Chavan's reference was obviously to the popular belief that the Sena was financing its expansion through its control of the Bombay Municipal Corporation—the richest in the country with a budget larger than that of many small states. "We have been complaining to the Government about the Sena's corrupt practices in the corporation for a long time," said a prominent Congress(I) leader. "But only now when it sees the threat in the districts is the Government waking up to the problem."

The Sena's role in the corporation also came under a shadow when it refused to give permission to the Municipal Commissioner S.S. Tinaikar, to prosecute two senior civic engineers (who happen to be Marathis) for their role in a building scandal involving Yusuf Patel. But Thackeray defends his party's stand by insisting that a minister behind the building scandal should be prosecuted first, though he admits that the Sena is committed to protecting the interests of Marathi-speaking people. As for the Sena dipping into corporation funds, Thackeray says: "The party's expansion is being financed by donations from local people, from ordinary people like those who flocked to hear my speech at the Dussehra rally."

The Shiv Sena's performance in the zilla parishad elections will be a good indication of the response to its 'Hindu platform'. Its success will also depend a great deal on how the ruling Congress(I) and Chief Minister Chavan respond to the challenge in the districts. Chavan is known to be strongly committed against the growth of communal organisations in the state. As of now, the indications are that the Shiv Sena is likely to make its presence felt primarily in three districts—Thane, Raigad and Nasik—where it has had pockets of influence in the past. Clearly, politics in Maharashtra is headed towards a more exciting, if not ominous, future.

MAHARASHTRA

Star Stir

EVEN by Bombay film industry standards, it was a big-budget, multi-starred extravaganza. More than 125 vehicles packed with technicians, junior artistes, and studio hands. A galaxy of movie stars and leading producers and directors in the business. But this time, the drama was for real as the film industry staged its most spectacular demonstration of unity in its snowballing protest against the levy of special sales tax on the industry by the Maharashtra Government. "Never before for our own cause have we come together in such an agitation," said Producer-Director Yash Chopra, adding: "The war has begun."

This unprecedented show of solidarity was the high point of a total cinema bandh called by the newly-formed Action Committee of the Maharashtra Film Industry in protest against the implementation, from October 1, of the tortuously labelled Maharashtra Sales Tax on the Transfer of the Right to use any Goods for any Purpose Act, 1985.

The Act passed last year lay in abeyance till this month, when following tax concessions to other sections of society in this year's budget and faced with growing expenditure in combating drought, the state Government issued a notification implementing it.

Under the new law, an additional 4 per cent sales tax is charged whenever there is an exchange of a variety of manufactured goods, including cinematographic prints and equipment. The Act was convened primarily in response to the boom in leasing companies, but its extension to an already highly-taxed film industry, ensnared in its own economic mess due to unwieldy production budgets and falling attendance at cinema theatres, has suddenly galvanised a wide cross-section of film people.

The mammoth morcha was led by Sunil Dutt, MP, who, in the absence of co-luminary Amitabh Bachchan emerged the leading industry spokesman. The celebrities joining the morcha included producers and directors V. Shantaram, B.R. Chopra, Manmohan Desai as also President of the All India Film Producers' Council Ramraj Nahta; distributors led by N.N. Sippy, President of the Radio and TV Practioners' Association Ameen Sayani and the stars: Dev Anand, Rajesh Khanna, Jeetendra, Mithun Chakraborty, Shashi Kapoor, Raj Babbar, Dada Kondke, Shabana Azmi, Meenakshi Sheshadri, Farha.

The public show of strength had become inevitable after a round of talks, arranged by Bombay (south) MP Murli Deora between representatives of the film industry and the chief minister, failed to find a solution. Asserted Manmohan Desai: "Our leaders in the past few decades let us down badly, now it's a do-or-die battle."

Besides demanding the abolition of the new tax, industry leaders are asking the state for a 50 per cent reduction in the entertainment tax on cinema tickets, abolition or reduction in other taxes, incentives for film production and for cinema theatres, as also stronger action against film piracy. "Maharashtra has the dubious distinction of charging the highest entertainment tax, 177 per cent, in the world. It is unable to check video piracy and 90 per cent of the films are flopping at the box-office. Survival is becoming impossible," says Nahta.

Maharashtra's film industry provides employment to nearly 3.5 lakh people and has contributed 3.5 per cent—Rs 76.69 crore—as entertainment tax alone to the state's total tax revenue of Rs 2,207 crore in the last financial year. Of this, almost half was collected in Bombay's 125 cinema theatres, where a ticket is the costliest in the country.

Even though the annual investment in film production is Rs 250 crore, many studios in Bombay have closed down. Bombay's share in the number of films produced in the country has also gone down: of the 912 produced last year only 214 were from Bombay. "The economics of Bomaby's film industry has gone completely awry," says Producer Amit Khanna. "The problem is quite deep-rooted, but till now, film people have failed to unite in relation to the Government. But this time there is solidarity."

And, even as a fund-raising drive was begun in aid of film workers, who will be the worst-hit by the agitation, Sunil Dutt dashed off a telegram to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi saying: "This is an SOS from the entire film industry in Maharashtra. The state Government had rung the death-knell with this new impost instead of providing relief from the crippling problems of the industry. Your personal intervention seems imperative." And Manmohan Desai, red-faced after an entire day in the sun protesting against the state Government, intoned: "There will be no solution to this problem until the prime minister intervenes," thus ringing up the curtain on what promises to be the most epic battle scene in Indian film history.

Bank holidays were treated as national holidays!

The extent of impact of banking in day-to-day life is such that the national holidays were dependent on the closure of banks and not vice versa.

Banking which emerged as an aid to trade has through the years spread itself as an integral part of everyone's life. From financing giant petroleum refineries to a farmer's tractor; from transfering funds across the seas to payment of school fees, banks play a vital role.

Today, Banking Industry is the epicentre of a nation's economy, touching varying needs of all people.

Vysya Bank, through the years has grown in size, stature and operations. Financing trade, agriculture or industry is not its only preoccupation. As the majority of its constituents are general public, to whom banking is for everyday financial transactions, Vysya Bank plays a vital role in the areas of meeting the household banking needs and in improving its customer service.

Realising its relevance to society and its needs, Vysya Bank has reached out beyond 'banking'. Organising service activities like blood donation, eye camps, adoption of villages etc. have placed the Bank in an exclusive position among the private sector Banks in the country.

With its philosophy to innovate, adopt and excel; with its trail blazing records and achievements, Vysya Bank's future is bright, full of better prospects for growth.

Trivedi (inset) and his body found near the tracks

While the Supreme Court vindicated Arjun Singh in the liquor case, the findings of a judicial commission into a driver's death were worrying.

MADHYA PRADESH

Judicial Tidings

EVEN as speculation continued to surround the political status of Arjun Singh, two judicial bodies in Delhi and Bhopal had both good and bad news for the former chief minister of Madhya Pradesh. While the Supreme Court gave Singh a shot in the arm by ordering the deletion of the strictures passed against him by Justice B.M. Lal of the Madhya Pradesh High Court in the famous liquor case, the report of a judicial commission of inquiry appointed by the Madhya Pradesh Government could pose fresh worries for Singh.

The commission, headed by retired high court judge M.L. Malik, had been set up to inquire into the death of a state government driver at Bhopal during Arjun Singh's chief ministership. The local police had dismissed the case as suicide. But the judicial commission has now blown that explanation sky-high. The commission's five-month-old report—which is still secret, but a copy of which was obtained by INDIA TODAY—calls the driver's death a "clear case of murder" and severely castigates the police for "misdirecting the investigation" and "cremating the body in unseemly haste, creating suspicion". The driver, though deputed to the chief minister's residence, was actually working for Singh's nephew. The state Government has now asked the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) to inquire into the death of the driver.

But the Supreme Court judgement has been a clear vindication for Singh. Justice Lal and the acting Chief Justice of the Madhya Pradesh High Court, J.S. Verma, had struck down the changed liquor policy on the ground that it was discriminative. Justice Lal, in a separate judgement, had gone on to allege that the policy had been arrived at in an "underhand" manner and that money had changed hands between those who were favoured in the new policy and the "concerned authorities." Justice Lal had also accepted the petitioner's argument that the new liquor policy would result in a loss of Rs 56 crore, even though there were obvious errors in this hypothesis.

Not only did Chief Justice P.N. Bhagwati and Justice Khalid uphold the policy, the two judges were harsh on Justice Lal in ordering the deletion of his strictures. Devoting a full nine pages in their 84-page judgement to the strictures, Justices Bhagwati and Khalid said: "There is not an iota of evidence to establish or even as much as indicate that the state Government was actuated by any collateral purpose or was guilty of any 'sinister underhand dealing' or was prompted by any corrupt motive in reaching the policy decision....What the learned judge has said is based entirely on conjecture and suspicion—an approach which does not go well with judicial disposition of a case." Demolishing the basis of Justice Lal's observations, the two Supreme Court judges concluded with the admonition that: "Judges should not use strong and carping language while criticising the conduct of parties or witnesses. They must act with sobriety, moderation and restraint."

The Supreme Court's judgement comes as no surprise to those who have followed the case closely. As was clear at the time of the high court judgement (INDIA TODAY, April 30), and as has now been reiterated in the Supreme Court, Justice Lal's strictures were based on allegations that even the petitioners had only mentioned in passing in their petitions and had not argued out in court. Singh, who had been pained enough by the strictures to seriously consider impleading himself in the case to clear his name before deciding, wisely, to stay out, was characteristically low-key in his reaction to the judgement. Said Singh: "The final verdict has come. It is for the others to interpret."

But if one worry has faded, the M.L. Malik Commission's report has added a new one. Chief Minister Motilal Vora claimed last fortnight that "the Malik Commission has not passed strictures or cast aspersions on anyone." But as the commission's report shows, this is patently incorrect.

The badly-battered body of Rajendra Trivedi, 30, the state government driver, was found by the side of a railway track on the morning of July 3, 1984. Although his driving licence was with him, the police declared his body to be "unclaimed" and cremated it the same day without bothering to trace the relatives. But other government drivers refused to believe the police version and struck work two days later, demanding a judicial inquiry. The press was quickly onto the story, and as public resentment mounted, Arjun Singh ordered a judicial probe by Malik, explaining: "No doubt should remain about any matter in which my name is even remotely connected."

The commission found that although Trivedi was summoned to work at the chief minister's bungalow on February 13, 1984, he was actually deputed to work at the house of his nephew, Shailendra Singh, "in flagrant violation of official norms". In fact, the commission notes with shock: "Reports were that as many as 35 of the 200 (state garage) drivers were likewise working for non-officials."

Udaynarain: seeking justice

The records of the state garage, produced before the commission, reveal that a personal assistant to Arjun Singh rang up the state garage and requisitioned Trivedi's services. The then superintendent of the state garage, B.S. Deshpande, told the commission that he sent the driver to the chief minister's bungalow on February 13, 1984. After two months, Deshpande sent a memo to the Chief Minister's Secretariat asking for the return of the driver. When there was no response, he was marked absent and his salary for April, May and June withheld. After Trivedi's death, Deshpande was moved out of the garage.

Trivedi's family members—his two brothers, Arjun and Udaynarain (both drivers in the state garage) and aged mother, Godavari—told the commission that in those months he was actually working for Arjun Singh's nephew, Shailendra Singh, 37, a contractor. Trivedi, the brothers claimed, had come to know Shailendra Singh and his wife, Jyoti, 33, when he was working with former minister Devendra Kumari Devi, a relative of the Singhs.

On July 2, the family members told the commission, Trivedi packed his luggage and left home, saying that he had to accompany Shailendra Singh somewhere. Next morning, his blood-spattered body, with as many as 45 injuries, was found by the railway track. The police later recovered his belongings from the house of Shailendra Singh. But they still went out of the way to prove that it was a case of accidental death.

But forensic expert Heeresh Chandra, director of Bhopal's Medico-Legal Institute, told the commission that in all probability the driver was murdered elsewhere and his body dumped near the railway track to give it the appearance of accident or suicide. The motive of murder, Malik concluded, was either Trivedi's extra-marital affair with a married woman or involvement with a gang of smugglers. He recommended investigation by an agency "free from local influence".

But Trivedi's relatives seem to have little faith in the proposed CBI inquiry. Last fortnight, Udaynarain filed a criminal complaint in a Bhopal court in an attempt to drag to court luminaries like Arjun Singh, his son Ajay Singh, Shailendra Singh and his wife, and also the police officers connected with the case. The charges levelled by Udaynarain range from murder to criminal conspiracy and attempt to shield the guilty by framing incorrect records. Says Udaynarain: "I know that I will probably achieve nothing, but at least I will have the satisfaction of knowing that, despite my humble means, I tried my best to bring out the truth." But irrespective of what happens in the court the conclusions of the commission are bound to pose more problems for Arjun Singh.

MADHYA PRADESH

Power Politics

A recent notification by the Madhya Pradesh Government divesting the assembly speaker of some of his administrative and executive powers has developed into an open confrontation between the executive and judiciary. Although the Government, after a month-long cold war, was forced to retract part of the offending order, Speaker Rajendra Shukla is still bristling with ire from what he considers an attack on his constitutional powers.

The controversial September 4 notification, apparently issued without consulting Shukla, not only transferred the speaker's powers regarding the appointment, promotion, transfer, pension etc of the assembly's employees to the Department of Parliamentary Affairs but, most important, gave powers to the Government to decide the salaries and allowances of the speaker and the deputy speaker (constitutionally, this is decided by the house). Further, the new department was also entrusted with matters relating to formulating a code of conduct for legislators and their salaries, powers, privileges and immunities.

Predictably, the notification drew flak from diverse quarters. Said Shukla, who cut short his trip abroad to rush back to Bhopal and register his objections with Chief Minister Motilal Vora: "No one can usurp the speaker's or the legislature's powers enshrined in the Constitution." The vidhan sabha secretary fired off a note to the Government seeking a review of the notification.

Reflecting the legislators' ire, N.P. Shrivastava, leader of the Janata Legislature Party, said angrily: "The Government has no right to formulate a code of conduct for the MLA's." Shrivastava, a former deputy speaker, says the notification violates Article 187 of the Constitution which guarantees independent secretariats for state legislatures.

In its defence, the state Government argues that the Department of Parliamentary Affairs is merely meant to function as a liaison between the Government and the Assembly. "The notification has been brought to protect the speaker's interests. His powers have not been curtailed at all," claimed Vora.

Initially, the Government was unmoved by the mounting criticism, but after Lok Sabha Speaker Balram Jakhar also criticised the notification last fortnight, Vora and Parliamentary Affairs Minister Ramkishore Shukla rushed letters to Jakhar assuring him that the Government would amend the notification. This was indeed done last week, with Ramkishore Shukla saying later: "In the notification the words 'pay and allowances of the officers and employees of the legislature' were inadvertently and erroneously included."

But vidhan sabha sources point out that the unimpugned parts of the order still amount to eroding the autonomy of the legislature. The Government is still to withdraw the part of the notification taking over the pay and privileges of the speaker, deputy speaker, legislators and the formulation of the code of conduct. Speaker Rajendra Shukla's dissatisfaction was evident in the special committee, headed by Opposition leader Kailash Joshi, set up by him to review the issues created by the controversy.

The confrontation is an offshoot of the political rivalry between Moti Lal Vora and Rajendra Shukla, both of whom belong to the Chattisgarh region. Shukla belongs to the Arjun Singh group and has been a constant source of discomfort in the house to the chief minister. It is a pity that in settling political scores, Vora overlooked the larger issues in question.

HARYANA

Poll Pursuits

THE battle for Haryana, the only Hindi heartland state scheduled to go to the polls next year, slipped into a higher gear last month with both the ruling Congress(I) and the main opposition alliance, the four-party Haryana Sangharsh Samiti, unveiling new vote-catching surprises before the electorate. The two communist parties and breakaway opposition leaders added to the excitement by throwing up a third front. Although there is no firm indication of the election date—the earliest is next February, the latest May—it is certain that this will be the most closely contested poll in the state's 20-year history.

Chief Minister Bansi Lal, inducted five months ago with the clear brief of wresting the initiative from the Devi Lal-driven Haryana Sangharsh Samiti, added to the election build-up by announcing major concessions for farmers and youth, the two sections under Devi Lal's spell. In one dramatic stroke, the chief minister waived the entire loan arrears of Rs 133 crore due from farmers in the canal irrigated areas and announced the abolition of land revenue. Later, addressing a 30,000-strong youth gathering, Lal gave up his long-standing opposition to direct elections in college unions and assured greater participation for youth in block samitis and market committees. "If Bansi Lal can win back the youth from the Lok Dal, he will win the battle," said H.S. Hooda, principal of the Jat College in Hissar.

Bansi Lal (left) addressing rally: making concessions

The Haryana Sangharsh Samiti, the four-party alliance of the Lok Dal, BJP, Congress(S) and a section of the Janata Party, had earlier captured the farmers' imagination by its aggressive denunciation of the Punjab accord as being against their interests. But Bansi Lal's concessions as well as his drive for a cleaner and more responsive administration have presented it with a fresh challenge. "We forced the Centre to pack off Bhajan Lal and it is our pressure that is winning big concessions to you," Devi Lal declares triumphantly at public meetings. Lok Dal leaders claim that several months after Devi Lal started on his round of public meetings, he still continues to draw larger and more appreciative crowds than the chief minister.

There is no doubt that Devi Lal's rapport with the Jats is still unmatched by any other politician in the state. But this is both his major strength and weakness; the aggressive support of the Jats for him tends to put off the other communities. Acknowledging this, the Lok Dal widened its support base by persuading two former chief ministers, Bhagwat Dayal Sharma (a Brahmin) and Banarasi Dass Gupta (a Bania) to join the Samiti. Also joining them in the Samiti were second-line leaders like Mool Chand Jain and Balwant Rai Tayal (both Banias with some influence).

Significantly, however, Sharma's son Rajesh continues to be a minister in Bansi Lal's cabinet, and none of Sharma's supporters have followed him to the Sangharsh Samiti. Bansi Lal underplays Sharma's importance by pointing out: "Sharma has always been against the Congress, which he left in 1968."

But the Samiti suffered a set-back when, protesting against Devi Lal's overbearing style, several second-rung Lok Dal leaders like Bhim Singh Dahiya, Sarup Singh (former vice-chancellor of Delhi University and a close relative of Charan Singh) and former finance minister Satbir Malik parted ways. "Devi Lal loves his family the most. Others in the

The breakaway Lok Dal leaders were joined in their anti-Devi Lal front by the CPI(M), the CPI, and a section of the Janata Party. The communist parties are opposed to Devi Lal because of his denunciation of the Punjab accord; they believe that the accord can do justice to both states. Says CPI(M) leader R.S. Hooda: "We take opposition to the Punjab accord as an opposition to peace and unity. Devi Lal's 'Nayayudh Morcha' is no better than the 'Dharamyudh Morcha' of Bhindranwale." The third front also aims to contest all 90 seats in the Assembly elections, and a clearly worried Devi Lal paid hurried visits to Janata President Chandra Shekhar and CPI(M) leader Harkishan Singh Surjit. Both counselled him to water down his attack on the Punjab accord, which he finds difficult to do at this stage.

Bansi Lal, on his part, has jettisoned his predecessor's strategy of outshouting Devi Lal in making pro-Haryana demands, and has been quietly and effectively arguing that the Centre will ensure that justice is done to the state. Again, while the communal mood when he took over was distinctly nasty, Bansi Lal has gone out of his way to assure all communities that the Government will offer equal opportunities to them.

The chief minister's strategy is already paying dividends, even among the Jats. Till recently, it was almost impossible for a Congress(I) leader to get a hearing from the Jats. But last fortnight, Bansi Lal even ventured into the heart of the Lok Dal's support base to hold a well-attended meeting at Pai in Kurukshetra district. Showing political savvy, he promised the Jats, an aggressive farming community looking for greater social status, "a world class capital city very near to your villages". Vowed Lal: "If I have funds and the time, Haryana will be a different state."

As Bansi Lal awaits the Eradi Tribunal's verdict on river waters—the Congress(I)'s poll chances could well depend on this—the people are making the most of the opportunity. "We shall decide whom to vote for at the proper time, but the concessions mean a great deal to us," said Hira Nand, a farmer from Kaithal. There is only one other thing certain about the Haryana pre-poll scenario: the electorate is in for the kind of wooing it could only have dreamt about.

LAST WORD/RAJENDER PURI

Flight to the Future

EVER since Rajiv Gandhi told us that we're going to the 21st century I've been under obligation to him. I mean, before that who ever knew that we would go to the 21st century? But then, a thought troubled me. Yes, we're going to the 21st century, I told myself, but in what condition will we reach there?

It was at that precise moment of agonising confusion that I decided to call on my favourite astrologer. He would tell me.

"Panditji," I said. "In what condition will we reach the 21st century? Please study the planets and let me know."

"I've already done that, my son," Panditji replied with a kindly smile. "Have no fear, our condition will be much better in the 21st century than it is today!"

"Wait a minute," I said quickly. "At that time the whole world will be better off than it is today. What I want to know is how much better off we will be in comparison to the rest of the world. The fact is, I'm sick and tired of other nations looking down on India!"

"Don't worry," he said. "We will be better off in comparison to other nations too."

"Yes, but how much better off?"

"Well, I've made a study. Take hockey. Currently India is last among the World Cup competitors. There is no team worse than our team. By my calculations, in the 21st century there would be at least 10 other teams worse than ours in the World Cup." I exclaimed: "If we will be ahead of 10 other teams we will be back near the top of the table!"

Panditji averted his eyes and said, "Mmmm!"

"What about the economic situation?" I asked. "Right now there are only 11 nations in the entire world which have a lesser per capita income than India. How will it be in the 21st century?"

"Our position will move up," Panditji said confidently. "In addition to the 11 nations, there will be at least 20 other nations behind us. I guess there ought to be around 31 nations poorer than India in the 21st century."

"Holy cow! That's terrific going!"

"Thanks to Rajiv Gandhi's computers and advisers, all this will come to pass," Panditji said solemnly. "India's position will move up solely due to Rajiv Gandhi's efforts!"

"You've no idea how much you've bucked me up," I said gratefully. "By the way, any idea which nations we will overtake by the 21st century? That should give us an exact picture of how well off we will be at the time."

Panditji pursed his lips. "I can't give you the complete list right now, but off hand I would say that India will certainly be ahead of Orissa, Assam, Mizoram, Kashmir...."

"Hold it," I screamed. "Those aren't nations, they are states of the Indian Union!"

"Oh, didn't I tell you?" Panditji looked up with genuine surprise. "By the 21st century India will have broken up into at least 22 new nations!"

"Twenty-two new nations?" I gasped.

"Naturally," Panditji said irritably. "How else will we move up in the world rankings? India's boundaries will stretch right up to the Yamuna! But thanks to high-tech, India will continue to forge ahead...."

State Squeeze

CALCUTTA High Court judges find little reason to rejoice over the Union Law Ministry's recent decision to upgrade their salaries and service conditions. They feel that the Marxist state Government will invariably find ways to prune any real benefits that come their way. Already, in spite of a law saying that they be provided bungalows, the state gives them only an allowance that works out to a niggardly Rs 800 per month, compelling judges to live in cramped quarters. The former chief justice, Satish Chandra, was forced to live with his family in a two-room suite in the state guest-house for three years because he could not afford a decent residence.

PRABHUTTHA BOSE

Banerjee: unhappy

"It's degrading," said Justice Bagabati Prasad Banerjee, who lives in a small flat himself. His office, a tiny cubicle crammed with books, serves as a full-fledged court during vacations. The state Government provides neither security at home nor a proper library at the high court itself. Official cars are so few and dilapidated that on an average a judge is dropped to work only thrice in a month. The Marxists, it seems, are still in no mood to pay. State Law Minister Mansur Habibullah had remonstrated at an all-India conference on the service of judges last year: "We can't use poor people's money to pay judges." There is no evidence to suggest that the Marxists have changed their mind.

Troubled Tiger

PROJECT Tiger has been deemed a success nationwide but recent developments in Uttar Pradesh have got the state Government worried. In the last five months alone, the carcasses of eight tigers have been found in the jungles of Lakhimpur-Kheri. These forests, with a 200 sq km area touching the Indo-Nepal border, have always been a happy hunting ground for poachers, who are said to be in league with smugglers. Thanks to these operators, animal skins and other parts of carcasses often find their way to Nepal from where they are smuggled to other countries.

The recovery of five carcasses in May from a truck in the Mira township of Kheri, the district famous for the Dudhwa National Park, was the first startling evidence of the large-scale poaching going on in the area. In August, yet another carcass of a tiger was found lying on the Sharda canal embankment in Pilibhit district. The post mortem examination disclosed that the tiger had died from a gunshot wound. In September, wildlife officials raided the house of the village chief of Husainpur in Haripur range of Pilibhit and recovered a tiger skin and a buried carcass from near his house. Two days later, a tigress's corpse was retrieved during the cleaning of the control gate of the Sharda canal barrage in Madho Tanda (Pilibhit). Clearly worried, the state police and Forest Department have launched a massive drive to stop this illicit trade. It is still too early to assess the operation's success, but clearly there is not a moment to be lost.

Welcome Verdict

A recent judgement by the Indore bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court may help hundreds of slate-pencil workers suffering from silicosis, an incurable lung disease caused by silica dust pollution, in the state. Justice Virendar Dutt Gyani ordered a slate-pencil factory of Mandsaur, where slate-pencils are made by cutting soft rocks, to pay a compensation of Rs 20,000 to Vimal Chand Jain, a worker suffering from silicosis. Earlier, Jain's request for compensation had been turned down by a labour court on the ground that he should claim damages from the Employees' State Insurance Scheme (ESIS) which applied to the factory. Criticising the delay, Justice Gyani expressed surprise over the fact that the case was pending at the labour court for more than three months simply because the court did not have a place to hold its sittings at Mandsaur. He asked the authorities to implement the Factories Act provisions which declare slate-pencil manufacture a 'hazardous industry'. The judgement may help a similar case that is now pending with the Supreme Court.

Statue Struck

THE latest step in Andhra Pradesh Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao's continuing Teluguisation drive is the installation of statues of 33 prominent state heroes along the 2-km drive on the Hussain Sagar Tank Bund Road linking Hyderabad and Secunderabad. The project, which entailed the widening of the Tank Bund Road and the construction of a bridge—at a cost of Rs 4.5 crore—has been completed at break-neck speed. In ramming this project through, Rama Rao has shown determination which could have been put to better use, given the drought in Rayalaseema and the floods in the Godavari delta.

A statue being installed

Hyderabad Mayor K. Prakash Rao tried to hold up the project by pointing out that the permission of the Hyderabad Corporation had not been sought, but Rama Rao brushed him aside. Akbar Ali Khan, a Hyderabadi and ex-governor of Uttar Pradesh, protested that the statues were an affront to the 16th century sufi, Hazrat Hussain Shah Wali, who had designed the lake and the bund. Khan threatened a satyagraha to stop the statues' inauguration, but Rao talked him out of it. Rama Rao now plans to add to the statue boom, after gauging the public mood.

JAMMU & KASHMIR

The Politics of

WHAT next? Even seasoned Kashmiri politicians who have seen predictable patterns in hundreds of dramas that have unfolded on the political stage of their state during the last 40 years ask this question in complete earnestness.

They are aware that the scions of the two families which have shaped the history of their state—Rajiv Gandhi and Dr Farooq Abdullah—have been talking to one another for the last several months. But nothing concrete emerges. They have seen minor bandhs, hartals and communal incidents in the state during this period, apparently signalling the inexorable rise of fundamentalist forces, but they fizzle out no sooner than they start. And no matter how vociferously politicians lobby against Central rule, Governor Jagmohan continues to occupy the chief executive's seat in the state.

The uncertainty stems in part from a unique admixture of political mistrust and blackmail in which the various power-brokers in the state are locked in an unholy symbiotic embrace. They fear one another and yet are afraid to let go. This is reflected in no small measure in the negotiations now underway, between the National Conference(F) (NC) led by Farooq and the Congress(I), designed to usher in popular government in the state after nearly 10 months of Governor's and Central rule. It is clear that if elections are held now the NC, the only mass-based party in the state, would sweep the polls. The most obvious question being asked is, so why does Farooq need Rajiv's party? Or for that matter, why does Rajiv, whose party can easily form a government with the now independent group of 14 MLA's, need Farooq?

According to sources close to Farooq, the Centre had promised last August that the current assembly would be dissolved and elections held within a short period. The Centre then viewed this as the only realistic way to resolve the political uncertainty in the valley and curb what was seen as the rising power of religious fundamentalism that seems to thrive in a vacuum. But Rajiv was informed by party sources that the Congress(I) organisation in the state was so weak that his party might wind up losing several seats in its traditional stronghold of Jammu because of the exceptional rise in the strength of the BJP in the area.

Traditionally the Congress, in the interest of maintaining a strong Central presence in the state, has always controlled the state legislature either directly or through alliances—except for the period of Farooq's government, which was toppled because it had refused to play electoral ball with Mrs Gandhi. In the current negotiations Congress (I) leaders, fearing considerable losses in a straight election, have been bargaining for new electoral alliances in which the NC would not contest a certain number of seats in order to ensure Congress(I) victories in those areas which would make up for any losses in Jammu.

According to sources in both parties, if the talks are successful, the scenario then calls for an interim coalition government between the two parties with a new chief minister—Farooq—being sworn in and fresh elections by March of next year. "We are not against a coalition," says Abdul Sanat Teli, provincial chief of the NC, and an MLA from Srinagar. "But the longer the Centre delays things the worse it will be for the Centre and for us. It is important that pro-India elements be strengthened." NC partymen, most of whom want a quick end to Central rule, resent having to drag out negotiations with Congress(I) when they know they can win hands down on their own. But as one party official put it: "Realistically, we have to deal with the

With reports of violence in the state being highly exaggerated, the talks between Rajiv and Farooq are significant. The scenario calls for an interim coalition government between the two parties with a new chief minister—Farooq—being sworn in and fresh elections by March next year.

Congress. Look at history. They could make and break Sheikh Abdullah, Bakshi Ghulam Mohammed, G.M. Sadiq, G.M. Shah. And they toppled us once before. They are like a sword over our heads. History has reconciled us to accepting king-makers from outside." Adds Teli: "But Rajiv must now show his goodwill. He must be decisive and take risks. After all, Dr Farooq took a risk and we showed our bona fides."

The reference was to the recent uncontested election of Mufti Mohammed Syeed to the Rajya Sabha in which the NC did not field a candidate, notwithstanding the fact that the NC had earlier held the vacant seat. Farooq's public embrace of Mufti last month, when he referred to him as a "brother" was particularly galling to some of his supporters who had heard his father Sheikh Abdullah refer to him as "a worm of the gutter". The public turnaround was what caused a demonstration in Srinagar in which portraits of Farooq and his father were burned and desecrated amid the chanting of anti-India slogans. That Farooq or his party have not decried the recent outbursts of fundamentalist outpourings is only a reflection of the other side of the blackmail puzzle. He needs them.

Farooq is capable of presenting a pro-national front to the Centre as the only person who can contain fundamentalism while playing to the gallery at home. His recent meeting with the president of Pakistan Occupied Kashmir during the Haj did not go unnoticed in the valley. In fact, it was seen as a development in which Farooq was talking to both sides in his role—inherited from his father—as the protector-in-chief of Kashmiri identity.

As former Congress minister from Anantnag M.L. Kaul puts it: "This is a strange business. We are talking to the NC and we are not able to shake hands in public. But the fact is that Congress can't ignore Farooq. A disgruntled and angry Farooq can be quite dangerous and a factor for instability if he decides to play the fundamentalist cause or starts talking about the United Nations."

Dr Mahboob Beg, an MLA from Anantnag and former minister in the G.M. Shah government says that the Congress(I) now has a "golden opportunity" to form its own government by allying or merging with the independent group of 14 that broke away from Farooq's government under the leadership of Shah. "They should learn from the past and not repeat old mistakes," he says. Farooq, he says, assumes a nationalist posture with the Centre "but he talks to the Kashmiris in gestures. He will never bury the issue of Kashmir's political separatism. We all understand the gestures. When he criticises Congress(I) he attacks India. When he attacks the Centre he attacks India. He calls me a ghaddar which means an Indian agent."

Beg maintains that Farooq out of power can be a "nuisance" but that a government formed by the Congress(I) will be able to deal with him politically. The people of Kashmir, he says, will get out and vote for Farooq, "but he knows that they won't come out on the streets and fight for him."

The Congress(I) is clearly in a dilemma. It is seeking to share power in the state without a grassroots organisation of its own. As Abdul Ahad Waza, a staunch Srinagar-based Congress(I) party worker points out: "The committed people in Congress(I) are being kicked out and anti-national elements are being taken in. You can go all over the valley and you will see that there are not even any district committee offices of the party." And for the past several months, since Mufti Mohammed Syeed was taken into the Union Cabinet as tourism minister, the party has been without a functioning president. Says veteran Congress(I) leader Trilochan Dutt, MLA from Jammu, who is being tipped to become deputy chief minister in "Congress(I) has a golden chance to form a government by merging with the independent group."

DR MAHBOOB BEG
former minister in G.M. Shah government case a coalition government is formed: "Clearly we are at fault. We should strengthen our Congress and try to form a government, but for the sake of communal harmony it would probably be wise right now to deal with Farooq. True, he obliquely supports communal politics, but that is because he is insecure. The NC gets weakened if elections are deferred and that plays into fundamentalist hands, which undermines the traditionally secular nature of the Kashmiri Muslims."

But each party harbours grave doubts about the other and any alliance can be but an uneasy truce. While Farooq is said to trust Rajiv at a personal level—he considers him a true secularist but indecisive—some influential members of his party are advising him not to put all of the NC's eggs in the Congress(I) basket. Their view is that the Congress(I) will not survive as a national party and that regional parties will decide the future of India and that the NC should ride the tidal wave of regionalism that they see emerging. And the Congress(I) is not also entirely happy with the coalition choices before it. Farooq's reputation as chief minister was not the best. As one government insider put it: "He was like a little boy with a toy." He made impetuous decisions, left in the middle of sensitive cabinet meetings for private business and preferred to man street traffic posts when his own partymen were imploring him . visit flood-affected areas in the state.

The Congress(I)'s other options are limited. Having toppled and then discredited the Shah regime as corrupt and anti-national, the Congress(I) can hardly be expected to embrace the "defectors". And well-informed political circles believe that the reason for the fall of the Shah government was more than its inability to cope with the law and order situation in Anantnag and Baramula last February. Shah was considered to be an arrogant, blunt man by Congress(I) leaders. He had refused to play ball with them. He refused to call meetings of the coordination committee which was supposed to work out a merger between the two groups. The Congress(I) had installed him in the hope that not only would the move finally break up the Sheikh Abdullah family but also destroy the NC as an organisation. The task entrusted to the Shah government by the Congress(I) was to break up the NC's cadres, take over locals' wakf properties as well as the revenue-generating complex of Mujahid Manzil (NC's headquarters), and close down Nawa-i-Subh, the NC party newspaper.

While Shah was politically ambitious to become chief minister, he had no intention of destroying the party. In fact, his government was toppled after the Centre learned that Shah's wife, Khaleda (Farooq's elder sister), and her younger sister, Surayya, had been secretly working to promote a re-merger of Shah's NC (Khaleda) with the parent organisation.

"We could be sitting on a volcano. Political parties provide a buffer zone between fundamentalism and politics."

MAULANA IFTEKAR legislative leader of the Congress(I)

"We are not against a coalition. But the longer the Centre delays things, the worse it will be for the Centre and for us."

ABDUL SANAT TELI
provincial chief of the NC

Maulana Farooq says his party canvassed for and helped Farooq's party come to power in the first place, "but he is not taking us into confidence. He is dashing off to Delhi all the time and displaying utter servitude to Delhi. What's going on? Does he represent the people or Rajiv Gandhi? The Centre must know that it cannot keep interfering with legitimately elected bodies in this state and must accept them. Only that can bring stability." He says that the basic position of his party, not inconsistent with the NC's platform, is that Article 370 of the Constitution governing Kashmir's relations with the Centre must be preserved, and the distinct character of Kashmir must be kept intact. "But Farooq seems more concerned about his own power than these issues," he adds. Maulana Farooq also points out that people detained under Governor's Rule must be freed, the governor's ordinances revoked and immediate elections be called, "otherwise there's no way to check the spread of communalism".

This view is endorsed by fundamentalist leader of the Muslim United Front (MUF) Maulana Abbas who has given several recent calls for bandhs and hartals in the state. In addition to the demands listed above, Abbas also calls for the implementation of proportional representation in the state for filling all government jobs and university admissions. "We have never tasted democracy. We have always had a maharaja," he says, referring to Governor Jagmohan. Adds Professor Abdul Ghani, an MUF organiser: "There is a saying here that after 40 years of darkness Kashmir will see light. We are in the 39th year. Our next step will be to offer ourselves for mass arrests. There is repression under Governor's Rule. Government officers are being fired without cause, people are being imprisoned."

Politicians are mostly united in seeking an end to Central rule. "We could be sitting on a volcano," says Maulana Iftekar, legislative leader of the Congress(I). "Political parties provide a buffer zone between fundamentalism and politics. We provide access to the people which must now come." But Moinuddin Pandit, head of the Awami Forum, a breakaway of the Awami Action Committee, differs: "In the name of religion we have been looted by all parties. For the first time, under Governor's Rule, we have water, better schools, better roads. I say let this rule continue until the good works are finished. The common people praise Jagmohan. The problem here is not so much politics as the fact that Kashmiris are always a suspect people and no party has tried to bring them into the mainstream."

There is little doubt that Jagmohan has come to occupy a strategic role in current Kashmir politics. Fundamentalist parties and political propagandists have tried to portray Kashmir as a state on fire with violence at every turn. As Javed Mukhdoomi, superintendent of police, Anantnag, says: "In a political vacuum, mullahs often occupy the stage and 50 hoodlums can hold a town to ransom. But the activities were small and just fizzled out." The state is peaceful and boasts of the best tourist season in a decade and a bumper apple harvest.

IN addition to waging war on vested interests and corruption (see accompanying story), Jagmohan has launched massive welfare schemes, mostly in rural areas. Roads have appeared in places which had never seen roads. For the first time in history, towns like Srinagar and Sopore which never had sewage systems are being equipped with modern drainage. Primary health care centres, new schools, expanded bus stations, clean drinking water facilities, projects to surround cities with parks and natural forests are sprouting all over the state. And the state's bureaucrats, as Srinagar Divisional Commissioner Hamidullah Khan says, "are inspired. I have never seen morale so high. We can do our work without political interference. There's been a revolution here". His sentiments are echoed by a wide variety of people.

Jagmohan on tour: setting high standards

Says Mohammad Rafiq, a hawker from Anantnag who has just moved into a regular shop constructed under a new project for the city: "We praise Khuda for Jagmohan. I used to be a worker for NC and went to jail for the party. But now if they come for votes, we will boycott all politicians. Governor's raj has done in this city what no politician did for us for 40 years."

Echoes Arjun Nath, a pundit in Bogund village where temples and houses were burned last February and now have been reconstructed through special grants: "I had lost all faith in the system. Partybaazi had created communal tensions and politicians had disgraced democracy."

Even Ishtiaq Ahmed, leader of the student strike at Srinagar's engineering college had praise for Jagmohan who has constituted a working committee of students and bureaucrats to redress grievances. "Our strike was based on our demands for better facilities and proper allocation of college resources, but the papers and politicians painted it into a communal disturbance," he said.

The paeans of praise, if repetitive, are genuine. And most of them come from taxi-drivers, slum dwellers, village folk in areas which have seen speedy development work for the first time.

Even as formal politics gradually returns to the state, one thing is certain: Jagmohan's will be a tough act to follow for any politician. In nine months he has captured the imagination of the people by travelling to areas rarely frequented by politicians in the past—where he has been showered by rose petals and mobbed by well-wishers. His simple bread-and-butter, performance-oriented approach has brought speedy development to areas which had seen no progress in 40 years. And the people's expectations have risen greatly. Whichever party comes to power is going to be judged by a much higher standard of performance, because the Kashmiris now have a standard—Jagmohan's standard—by which they will be rated.

ADMINISTRATION

Corruption Crackdown

PERHAPS the most controversial move undertaken under Governor's Rule in the state has been a concerted and unflagging drive against corruption in high places and the deeply-rooted spoils system permeating every level of government and politics. The drive, a combination of administrative action, issuance of ordinances, as well as a vigorous pursuit of court cases aimed at breaking monopolies and vested interests, has to a large extent been spearheaded by Muzzaffar Beg, 39, the state's advocate-general.

Beg, who comes from a farming family near Baramula, was educated in his home town and later went to Harvard University for graduate studies in law. Says Beg: "In a system where the Government is almost the sole distributor of largesse, power and patronage go hand in hand and the state always becomes the loser in terms of lost revenue. Fighting these interests is often a lonely, sometimes thankless job." Admits businessman H.S. Sawhney: "These actions have shaken up the power structure as never before. And it is no wonder that politicians of all colours who profited by the status quo and protected one another as well as certain bureaucrats are opposing these actions as undemocratic."

Selected examples of the extent and diversity of the drive:

▶ In one of the earliest actions he took as governor, Jagmohan suspended one of the most powerful officials in the state—M.M. Khajuria, director-general of police. He was formally charge-sheeted and a high-level inquiry being conducted by a retired chief justice is now under way. The charges filed against Khajuria include abuse of his official position for the spot purchase of spare parts for vehicles, guard items, sports and laboratory equipment; filing of fraudulent travel vouchers; manipulation of official documents and contract tenders. Khajuria was posted as director-general of police in August 1985 and continued to enjoy the confidence of the state Government notwithstanding confidential reports dating back to 1957 in which his conduct, efficiency and integrity were repeatedly the subjects of scathing comments from high officials and had been brought to the attention of the Union Home Ministry.

"In a system where power and patronage go together, the state is the loser of revenue. Fighting these interests is often a thankless job."

MUZZAFFAR BEG
advocate-general, Jammu and Kashmir

▶ Current vigilance inquiries are focusing on the involvement of former ministers in illegal deals. One involves the release of Rs 14 lakh by the director, food supplies, for the purchase of tarpaulins. The reasons for the order are not listed in the purchase books and one firm which supposedly supplied the material doesn't exist. In another case, a minister released money to an agriculture marketing society which had been formed by 11 of his family members. This same minister was involved in obtaining false certificates for family members and appointing them on an ad hoc basis to teaching positions. Another minister purchased Rs 75,000 worth of furniture for his residence through the state forest corporation. Of 508 cleaners and drivers recently hired by the Transport Ministry, 308 were sponsored by a single minister. Ninety-four of those hired under the minister's direct recommendations were found to be unqualified but were taken in under specially relaxed standards. In another vigilance case, investigators are examining circumstances under which another minister, using a front organisation, purchased coal from the state mineral corporation at Rs 125 per tonne below the real price and sold it in the black market.

▶ An ordinance, which for the first time, opens up country liquor vends to public auction rather than giving them to a single individual or running them departmentally strikes indirectly at the role played by the Farooq Abdullah government in attempting to grant an exclusive contract to a firm to manufacture, bottle and market country liquor in the state. The firm, Madeira Bottlers, armed with a "letter of intent" from the Farooq government in 1983, had proceeded with the construction of a factory. Subsequently, a confidential inquiry established that the go-ahead to the firm had been given under direct orders of the chief minister against the advice of the finance minister and finance commissioner who had favoured bidding on competitive terms because the project entailed a major change of policy. Not only was the Finance Department kept out of the scheme until the letter of intent was issued, but the Cabinet too was not consulted for its approval.

Even as Madeira Bottlers began construction of its factory, the governor passed an ordinance amending the law and allowing the auction of country liquor shops in the state. Madeira Bottlers challenged the governor's action through a writ petition to the high court arguing that the Government had gone back on its earlier promise. But the state's advocate-general scored a rare victory when the court, in rejecting the petition, noted: "The action of the governor is not mala fide and besides, it has public purpose because recourse to open auction is presumed to be in the public interest...because it is universally accepted as a fair, just and reasonable mode promoting healthy competition."

Another major victory for a gubernatorial ordinance came only last fortnight. Under a government order which took effect on June 1, private practice by all government doctors including dental surgeons was banned. A note prepared by the secretary of the Health Department explained why the measure became necessary. Among the reasons: doctors were fixing dates of operations and charging fees in their private clinics and then attending to those same patients in government hospitals; doctors engaged in teaching—professors, associate professors—remained so occupied in their private practice that they did not teach classes for years together.

The ordinance was challenged in a writ petition to the high court by several politicians including former deputy chief minister D.D. Thakur. The court noted that the governor's action was not capricious because it had been followed up by several measures such as the establishment of primary health centres in each district along with 150 sub-centres in rural areas, speedy filling of posts lying vacant in medical colleges, creation of three new blood banks, as well as special incentive allowances for government doctors—demonstrating the genuine desire of the Government to improve health care. The writ petition was dismissed forthwith.

The administration also recently challenged in court the power of what is commonly known as the state's "forest mafia", which has traditionally enjoyed political protection. When forest cutting leases held by the lumber bosses expired in 1983, about 150 of them filed court petitions seeking not only an extension of the leases but also the right to cut wood in adjacent forest areas. The courts passed an ex parte order under which the lessees cut about Rs 100 crore worth of forests. When the state Government objected, the forest merchants agreed to a compromise under which they could enter into fresh agreements to cut wood but they would have to purchase the felled timber by paying a royalty to the state. But later the lessees reneged on this agreement: they asked for more time for felling and even challenged it in court. Again, their plea was granted ex parte. The Government responded with an ordinance designed to free the forests from the control of the lessees. But this too has been challenged in court. A division bench of the high court recently gave the state Government a partial victory when it ruled that while lessees can now be banned from entering forests they should, however, be paid some compensation.

The extraction of pine resin which, after conversion to turpentine and rosin, is used for the manufacture of products such as paper, soap and paint, has been a big industry in the state. Official figures estimate its extraction at 40,000 tonnes annually for the last several years. Most of the extraction was done by private contractors under an agreement that it would be used within the state for increasing the manufacture of end-products. Several investigations during the last few years revealed that the resin was being sold in the black market and being smuggled to other states, and that the unscientific tapping of trees was taking a lethal toll of the state's forests. In 1985, the G.M. Shah government appointed an expert committee to review the situation. But before the committee could submit its report, the Government fell. Under Governor's Rule, an ordinance was promulgated under which the state would extract the resin, process it into rosin and turpentine and then sell it to industry. But this Act has been challenged in a writ filed in the Supreme Court.

Another measure particularly unpopular with the state's politicians is the control that the administration has now chosen to exercise over the disposal of state-owned properties. Traditionally, evacuee properties—lands and houses abandoned by families who left for Pakistan—were given as patronage offerings by ministers to selected individuals at well below market rates and heavy profits were later realised through subsequent sales. Now these properties are either auctioned or converted into schools or welfare homes for the destitute.

DUBAI INDIANS

Traders in Trouble

WHEN the huge neon signboard of Premier Electronics failed to light up as usual a few Fridays ago, the throng of weekend shoppers in Dubai's commercial heartland was taken by surprise. Premier had been their favourite shop for almost any kind of electronic and electrical appliances and, with Eid Al Adha round the corner, the shop had been attracting more than the usual custom.

When the showroom failed to open on the following Saturday, the first whispers of uneasiness erupted into a shrill panic of enquiries. By evening word was out that the owner had fled the country. Ramesh Bhatia, the managing director of Premier Electronics and owner of the successful Premier Building Contracting Company, had added to the growing body of unsavoury legend about fleeing Indian merchants and their tales of knavery.

Bhatia had left large unpaid bills to banks and suppliers, debts conservatively estimated at between DH 15 million and 20 million (between Rs 5.20 and Rs 7 crore). But, unusually, he also left behind a "farewell note" explaining the reasons for his sudden departure. The unsigned note, which began with the sentimental plaint that, "we are leaving this country with tears in our eyes, the country we thought was our own", squarely blames the Premier group's local sponsor for deliberately creating problems that made it impossible for the Premier companies to operate.

Bhatia's case is symptomatic of the strains under which the Indian merchant community—the largest among Dubai's expatriate groups—now operates. "We are being squeezed," says a veteran of the Gulf textile trade. "The so-called local partners don't put in any capital but claim the right to management control and arbitrary shares in profits. If we object, our days are numbered."

The brouhaha over the Premier closure, particularly in the wake of the farewell note—widely circulated to banks, traders, the media and United Arab Emirates (UAE) businessmen—has thoroughly upset the Indian merchants, who hold that this is not the first time one of them has been forced to abandon his business and flee the country in the new climate of aggressive nationalisation and unbridled greed for profits. However, Bhatia's is the first case where a businessman has talked openly of problems with local partners, and a close friend insisted that Bhatia's assets in unpaid bills for construction jobs would cancel his debts.

The downturn in the Gulf economies and the closure of two of the biggest markets in the region owing to the Iran-Iraq war have brought business down to a small trickle from the rich founts of the previous years, making it difficult for expatriate businessmen to meet the demands of their local partners, who refuse to scale down expectations. As a result, sudden business failures have become a fairly frequent occurrence over the past two years, attended by the unannounced departures of the owners who have left behind a trail of bad debts and a murky reputation for Indian traders.

Initially, the people concerned were small businessmen, owners of retail shops and the like, whose exit created only small ripples. But in recent months, with more of the big companies going under because of credit restrictions and the continuing recession, even the big names among the Indian traders have been made scapegoats for the liabilities of their local partners, including personal bank loans. Not surprisingly, even the pillars of the Indian community have tottered and fallen.

The reverberation has been the most in the case of Bhagwandas Bablani, a popular entrepreneur belonging to the topmost strata of the local business community,

The closure of Premier Electronics is symptomatic of the strains under which the Indian merchant community in Dubai, caught in a cleft stick legally, is now operating.

who made an undignified exit from the UAE a couple of months ago to avoid possible arrest. Bablani, who came to the UAE more than three decades ago, had to abandon a widespread trading empire dealing in products as diverse as oilfield supplies and upmarket cosmetics when his partner took the easy way out and held the expatriate responsible for bank loans of about DH 50 million (Rs 17.5 crore).

THE problem is the lack of bankruptcy law and company law, and the big loopholes in what passes for the law at the moment," laments a second-generation Indian businessman who has been trying unsuccessfully to cope with the recent changes which have made the UAE a harsh new environment for those weaned on its comfortable laissez-faire attitude of the past. The law is such that the expatriate trader is left with the onus for all omissions and commissions.

Until four years ago, Indian businessmen had the full freedom to run any business in Dubai with just a trade licence—secured by furnishing a bank guarantee of DH 100,000. But the situation has now changed dramatically. As part of the increasing nationalisation campaign, the authorities stipulated that 51 per cent of the share capital must belong to a local UAE citizen. A certificate of this partnership is essential for obtaining visas for employees, and even for the expatriate owner himself. Although this means that the UAE partner should put in slightly more than half the capital and bear responsibility for any commercial transaction, in practice it works quite differently. In fact, Dubai allows a "legal loophole" which absolves the local national from any commitment by notarising in the civil court separate agreements between the partners which state that the local partner is entitled only to an annual sponsorship fee and is not responsible for any legal or financial commitment.

Sheikh Rashid's sickness has deprived Indian merchants of a benevolent patron.

While even their compatriots are seldom willing to give runaway merchants the benefit of the doubt, in the case of Bhatia there is little to disprove his claim that harassment by his partner had forced him to leave Dubai. Well-known UAE nationals who had been approached by Bhatia to mediate with his sponsor have privately admitted that the Indian had recourse to little else in the face of the obstinate demands of the local person.

Meanwhile, the implementation of a law which makes it mandatory for the UAE partner to put in 51 per cent of the capital has been twice delayed by the federal authorities because of the lack of response. In the straitened circumstances now prevailing in the Gulf, few local gentry have been willing to make such heavy capital investments.

Caught in a cleft stick legally, the Indian merchants have been realising the helplessness of their situation in the aftermath of the Bablani and Bhatia ousters. Their old patron, Dubai ruler Sheikh Rashid, is seriously ill and the UAE is run by his three sons, who have neither the time nor the inclination to listen to a community they treat with scant respect.

"We have no access to the majlis any more," bemoans a Dubai veteran who recalls that as recently as the early '80s he could meet Sheikh Rashid personally and "get any problem solved". After the recent upheavals, their efforts to put their case before the authorities have been mediated by some Dubai merchants with whom the Indians still enjoy some repute.

"It would be difficult and useless to deny that there have been no outright cases of fraud where Indian merchants have run away with bank loans and the profits, to start businesses elsewhere," admits a supplier who has been cheated of DH 2 million (Rs 70 lakh) by runaway dealers. "We have no forum which can speak for our just demands."

There was a forum in the past, the Indian Merchants Community, which had the direct ear of those who mattered in Dubai. But in 1983, it was closed down by the authorities, ostensibly as it did not fulfil certain municipal regulations. The real reason, it has been said, is that local businessmen had objected to a parallel organisation to the local chamber of commerce. At the same time, the Indian serving on the board of the Dubai Chamber of Commerce and Industry was also removed.

The only other organisation of any note, the Indian Association of Dubai, has lost what little credibility it had by giving up its protective role to become a purely social body frittering away its financial reserves in feting diplomats.

As with the ruling family, the merchants now find that they have to come to terms with a brash new generation in the business sphere also. "These young people want to make the maximum money in the shortest possible time; they care little about long-term policies or the ethics of business," laments the owner of several trade agencies in Dubai and Al Ain. He reports that, notwithstanding fixed fees, his local sponsor for a chain of retail outlets makes periodic demands for money to meet travel and other personal expenses. "Sometimes my sponsor (a major in the UAE army) comes to check on our business; and if he sees the turnover is higher on that day he will ask for a larger share of the profits. Frankly, time is running out for us in the UAE." That may be an overly pessimistic statement, but the warning signs are there for all to see.

IMMIGRATION

Passport to Peril

A fortnight after the squalid and harrowing scenes at London's Heathrow Airport's Terminal III, when hundreds of visitors from the Indian subcontinent camped out for endless hours on its florid plastic chairs in wretched desolation, the bedlam over the sudden clamping of visas for visitors from India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Nigeria and Ghana has taken a new twist. The Conservative Government's decision to take away the rights from British MP's to intervene in immigration cases has sparked off yet another jangling scrape—this time within the House of Commons.

Until now, MP's had the right to intervene when approached by a constituent on behalf of a passenger who was refused entry by an immigration official. They had only to contact the Home Office for removal to be "stayed" until the controversial Minister of State at the Home Office David Waddington had investigated the decision and decided if the refusal of entry was justified. Most passengers were then admitted on a temporary basis. Now Home Secretary Douglas Hurd has helpfully suggested that, with the new compulsory visa system, there is little need for Britain's MP's to lose their sleep over immigration cases.

In a well-coordinated publicity drive by the Home Office, which has been drenching newspaper offices with statistical trivia, it now states that representations of MP's have increased from 1,000 in 1980 to more than 4,500 last year. Because Britain's Immigration Act stipulates that airlines have to meet the costs of returning passengers refused admission if directions of removal are given within two months, the Home Office alleges that MP's interventions are costing the British taxpayer more than Rs 1 million a year. Indubitably, MP's do make frequent appeals. Sydney Bidwell, the Labour Party MP from Southall—"Bidwell Singh" to many local Sikhs—has a well-worn reputation in his constituency of intervening when requested by one of his constituents. Piara Singh Khabra, president of the influential Indian Workers Association, relentlessly takes one case after another for visitors from India to the Southall MP.

But many Indians view the latest measures of the Thatcher Government with cynicism. They see it as yet another "racist ploy" in an interminable sequence orchestrated by the ruling Tories. Says S.S. Sekhon, an Ealing-based solicitor: "It is ludicrous to think that there would be many people from the Indian subcontinent arriving in Britain without visas after all the scandalous events at Heathrow and that MP's would have to make numerous representations. Which airline would now be stupid enough to carry a visitor without a valid visa?"

It was not just Britain's large Asian and black communities who were seething and branding the new measures as "naked racism". A furious row erupted in the House of Commons when the Labour Party's shadow Home Secretary Gerald Kaufman told Tory MP's that they "only give a damn for the human rights of those with white skins". Kaufman, who maintained a highly-visible profile at Heathrow amidst the general misery last fortnight alleged that Asians had been treated like "second-class human beings" which would not have happened "if their skins were white". Home Secretary Douglas Hurd, to general merriment in the House, demanded: "Are we being asked to believe that all these young men happened to choose the third week of October to come to see the Tower of London?" Hurd's reference was related to some of the extraordinary reasons many young men—mostly from Bangladesh—gave to the cold, dry-eyed questioning of immigration officers. Asked why they had come, some said it was to see tourist sites. Pressed to specify, the answer was often, "Slough" or the Tower of London. There were computer engineers who had not seen a terminal, rich businessmen who did not own a sou and one who had even flown 6,000 miles to see the "snow".

Britain's scandal-mongering tabloids—aptly titled the gutter press by John McEnroe, went to town with alarmist stories of "Asians flooding Britain". The scurrilous besmirching was led by the odious Sun, which ran a front-page banner headline branding the incoming Asians as "liars". When INDIA TODAY questioned numerous non-Asian Britons about the reasonableness of the Government's measures, the general response was that the move by Mrs Thatcher was exceptionally popular. And there did seem a great deal of confusion about the identity of the Asians who sought entry into Britain. Many thought they were "Indians and Pakis". In reality, only a small proportion were Indians. A majority were young single males from Bangladesh and Pakistan.

Youthful Bangladeshis, having paid extortionate rates to unscrupulous agents, flew in droves into Britain to beat the visa deadline. Bangla Biman operated numerous "special flights" between Dhaka and London. Air-India only operated its normal weekly complement of flights. A survey of the inflow of visitors from India during the few days preceding the visa deadlines showed that the number of visitors from India maintained its weekly average. And most Indians had valid reasons for entering Britain.

EVEN though a fortnight had elapsed, official circles in Britain seemed to be still angry at what they termed needlessly intemperate remarks made in Sydney by the Indian prime minister—remarks which were widely applauded by Britain's ethnic minorities. Rajiv Gandhi had said: "The steps that the British have taken are very clearly racist. There can be no other description of the measures that they have taken. We see it as an extension of their racist policies which they are expounding on South Africa."

Baroness Young, the minister dealing with Indian affairs in the Foreign Office told Indian High Commissioner P.C. Alexander that her government greatly regretted the Indian prime minister's remarks. To which Alexander asked what other interpretation should one draw from the fact that five Asian and African countries of the Commonwealth have been singled out for this treatment. There is no visa regime for visitors from any of the white countries within the Commonwealth. Even visitors from South Africa, which practises apartheid, are welcome to visit Britain without a visa. What Indian officials repeatedly have to answer are charges that it was the first to impose visas on all UK citizens. India House has countered that the regulation applies to every visitor to India and does not discriminate between one set of countries and another.

What was galling to most Asians in Britain was the callous manner in which incoming Asians were treated. Old men, women with wailing babies and hungry children were kept herded together for hours on end at the airport as immigration officers vigilantly deliberated over the merits of one passport after another. There have been calls by various Asian organisations for official inquiries against the Immigration Services Union—calls which will come to naught. One indignant engineer from Bangladesh and a long-time resident in Britain, Mohammed Amin, told INDIA TODAY: "Her Majesty's Government has just capitulated to a bunch of thugs—the Immigration Services Union—who had threatened strikes. Now they are going to spend millions of pounds more to employ more staff in five different countries. And amidst all this, if several thousand hapless Asians got kicked around, who cares? As long as they were not whites, there would be no media or political pressure. But I can assure you if blacks were treated in such a cavalier fashion, they would probably have rioted and wrecked Heathrow. We just happen to be incredibly docile."

The end result of the distasteful episodes of the past fortnight was that it was all much ado about nothing. Illegal immigration in Britain is now a minor problem. It was effectively stemmed in the '70s. There is now little opportunity for apocalyptic speeches for a Mrs Thatcher on one hand (threat of Britain being "swamped" by immigrants) or Enoch Powell on the other (the famous "rivers of blood" speech). What most observers taking stock of the visa clampdown after two weeks suggest is an eerie feeling that for the next general elections which will come up in 18 months time, the Conservative Party is gearing itself up to replace the Falklands factor with the race factor.

Charred Campaign

IMPERIAL Tobacco Ltd, one of the world's largest cigarette groups, choked and sputtered over its own fumes when one of its promotional campaigns sparked off a furore amongst the Sikh community in Britain last fortnight. In its "Wonders of the World" competition, organised by Embassy, one of its companies, in which smokers can win a "Dream Holiday", Embassy had included the Golden Temple at Amritsar as one of the 50 pictures enclosed in cigarette packs. The company's researcher had obviously overlooked the fact that smoking is taboo among Sikhs. Small wonder that Embassy and Imperial Tobacco offices were besieged by angry calls and letters from numerous Sikh community leaders from all over the UK, protesting at the hurt caused to their religious sentiments. A contrite company spokesman issued an apology for the "offence caused" and assured Sikhs that in future every precaution would be taken to ensure that none of their promotional activities would give offence to any religious community. Imperial Tobacco also emphasised that the offending card was one amongst the 50 which included the wailing wall in Jerusalem, St Peter's Basilica in Rome, Bangkok's Golden Buddha and Lord Ganesh. The company pointed out that it had certainly no intention to "discriminate in favour of or against any particular religion". However, it is now too late to withdraw the cards from the competition since there are some 250,000 outlets selling Embassy cigarettes all over Britain. It is understood that a quiz game organised by the company also includes queries related to the Sikh religion. These will not be reprinted, says the badly-burnt Imperial Tobacco.

Radical Row

DAVID Selbourne, author of a book on India and well known for his sulphurous prose, is the newest cause celebre among the academic fraternity in Britain. The three principal players in this sizzling row are Selbourne himself, Ruskin College—the pluralist college of the Labour movement at Oxford University, where Selbourne has been a tutor for the last two decades—and Rupert Murdoch's daily, The Times.

Selbourne

Despite his impeccable left-wing credentials, Selbourne did the unpardonable last March when he penned an article for The Times on the Liverpool Militants. Murdoch's paper has been subjected to a boycott by the trade union movement. And when Selbourne returned to Ruskin for his lectures, he found himself confronting student pickets who branded him a "scab", and facing criticism from his peers. Now Selbourne is contemplating legal action against the college authorities for their refusal to offer a commitment to academic freedom.

Novel Award

A major new award for Commonwealth writing is to be announced later this fortnight at the "Hall of India" in the Overseas House in central London. The Book Trust, an educational charity, in association with the Commonwealth Foundation and the Royal Overseas League, intriguingly called a "Gentlemen's Club", are associated in launching together the "Commonwealth Writers" prize.

The new award is designed to encourage emerging literature from the countries of the Commonwealth and works eligible for it would be in the field of fiction, collections of one-act plays, short stories etc. in English. Those works published between January 1, 1985 and Decmber 31, 1987 will be considered for the prize. While the precise amount of the award has yet to be decided, organisers say it would be "a considerable cash prize". There will also be probable "runner-up" awards for the regional winners— in Africa, the Caribbean and Canada, South-east Asia and the Pacific.

The award, the first major prize of its kind that concentrates on a specific grouping, will, the organisers hope, become a sort of "Commonwealth Booker Prize".

Hockey Blues

WITH a vigorous helping hand from the massive media coverage on many hours of prime time television, field hockey, its stars and the north London venue, Willesden, are now household names in Britain. As for the Indians, having got the wooden spoon, it was by far the most ignominious performance by an Indian team in the history of the sport.

Anwar

The saving grace was the Indian Veterans XI, oddly titled 'The Seva Dal Indian veterans hockey team'. The throngs of Indian fans were treated to a soupcon of the old magic through Captain Udham Singh, Govinda, Inam-ur-Rahman, Ashok Kumar, Kuttappa and Vinod Kumar. In the John Lelliott World Cup veterans tournament, the Indians lost in the semi-finals by a single goal. The 26-member team, led by Tariq Anwar, MP, and including Aslam Sher Khan and Vilas Muttemwar, also MP's, paid their own fare apart from faring better than the national eleven.

Otis introduces microprocessor controls for rush hour traffic.

Elevators were invented to make life more comfortable.

At Otis, that's a rule we never forget.

What use is an elevator if it takes you twenty minutes to get into one?

Which is why Otis is integrating powerful computers with their elevators. They maintain a continuous vigil over the doors and brakes of the elevator. Ensuring optimum speed of operation. So that the travelling and waiting time for a passenger is reduced to a minimum.

Traffic jams are, of course, more often the result of bad traffic management.

But now you can program an Otis to fit your building's requirements. And avoid unnecessary queues.

For example, if your building has greater rush on the 7th and 13th floor, but no rush at all on the 9th, you can program your elevator to automatically stop at the 7th and 13th floors, and ignore the 9th floor altogether.

Or, you can program the Otis not to stop at the lower floors on its way down, should you want the slackers there to exercise a little.

And if you happen to be the big boss, you can even jump the queue. Because you can program the Otis to ignore all other calls and come up to fetch you first.

The options are mind-boggling.

And as the needs of your building change, you're not left with an outdated traffic plan.

Because all you have to do is pull out the old program card and replace it with a new one.

For more information on microprocessor-based lifts, call Otis.

Or fix a time to meet with our representative at a mutually acceptable place. Keep aside a margin of 20 minutes if your elevator is not an Otis.

SRI LANKA

Political Machinations

President Jayewardene has once again set the cat among the ethnic pigeons. Addressing a Colombo rally last fortnight, the Sri Lankan President stated that "the provincial councils proposal will not be presented in Parliament until the terrorists laid down their arms and accepted the concept of a unitary state". Since the acceptance of Sri Lanka's unitary constitution is common ground to all parties in the country, including the parliamentary representatives of the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF), as well as the Indian Government—the exceptions being the most hard-line militant groups—that demand came as no surprise. What did mark a sharp shift in the negotiating stance was the call for a laying down of arms as a pre-condition to the introduction of the Provincial Councils Bill.

The Sri Lankan President further added: "The Indian Government and the state of Tamil Nadu should pledge their cooperation to end terrorism, with all terrorist weapons handed over to our Government, and the terrorist camps in the north dismantled." While most diplomats, many of whom represent important aid-giving countries, were dismayed over what seemed a serious setback to the already slow-moving negotiations, Indian concern became immediately evident when High Commissioner J.N. Dixit called on the President the next day. The "clarification", as it was tactfully termed, pinned the blame on the press and its natural predilection to over dramatise the utterances of notabilities, often taking remarks out of context.

But the real context in which Jayewardene's remarks should be examined is within the increasingly aggressive domestic political scene in Sri Lanka, more precisely, the newly-formed Movement for the Defence of the Nation (MDN), an unusual alliance of the influential Buddhist clergy and assorted opposition forces. Jayewardene's dramatic announcement at the Colombo rally did look suspiciously like a tactical retreat in the face of the MDN's mounting agitation against his offer of provincial autonomy to the separatist Tamils.

The MDN's common target was the ruling United National Party's (UNP) back-benchers who give the Government its massive five-sixths majority. The bill needs a two-thirds majority. These MP's represent rural constituencies. Almost all of them are Sinhala-Buddhist. Not only are many of these MP's physically isolated but, in the prevailing climate of opinion, psychologically so. In December 1982, 48 per cent voted "no" in a referendum by which the UNP extended its six-year-term by another six. Now past its ninth year, it is clearly overstaying its welcome in an electorate long accustomed to regimes changing every five years. The rural MP is as vulnerable to electoral fatigue as he is to the worsening economic conditions.

RAGHU RAI

Jayewardene's case is that he has reached the limit which public opinion in a democracy will allow. The rest is up to India. He would prefer Rajiv to assert himself in his role of mediator.

Finance Minister Ronnie de Mel, engaged in his own painful negotiations with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank for a massive loan, describes the situation as "grim". Next year's budget deficit is a record US $1 billion (Sri Lankan Rupees 29 billion). Estimated revenue is just over Rupees 40 billion. Defence spending (Rupees 8.7 billion) could swallow income from tea, rubber and coconut, the three main exports. Today, 40 per cent of Sri Lanka's families live on food stamps valued at $25 a month.

By adopting an anti-autonomy line, Bandaranaike—whose name is known far better internationally than that of any other Sri Lankan and who is far more respected traditionally by the Indian leadership—has alienated this important external constituency and thus thrown away her trump card as the only credible alternative to Jayewardene.

Behind this obvious lapse on the part of a shrewd and tested politician lies the same electoral fatigue factor that is now a problem for the ruling UNP's serried ranks of cabinet ministers, ministers without portfolio (or not much), deputy ministers, district ministers, project ministers and plain ordinary MP's, all loaded with privileges and perks, some of which are liberally, if selectively, extended to the clergy by the state whose largesse is limitless.

Having issued a stern warning to the MDN, Jayewardene has now stiffened the morale of his rank-and-file with his statement on pre-conditions for legislating on provincial autonomy. At the same time, he has turned his attention to the main source of external pressure and possible help, India.

The Sri Lankan Government wants Rajiv Gandhi to be more assertive and decisive in his dealings with the Madras-based Tamil moderates and militants. It was pleased to find the Indian prime minister describing its present proposals as "fairly good" at his Canberra press conference, a spectacular contrast from his Harare tirade, but was disappointed when he spoke of "direct negotiations" between Colombo and the Tamil representatives, with Delhi merely preparing the ground. Fearing that Delhi has conceded far too much to M.G. Ramachandran as the key middleman, Colombo would prefer Rajiv to assert himself in his own chosen role of mediator.

The Sri Lankan Government realises that "something extra" (at present unspecified) will have to be given to the militants in the final round of the diplomatic game, and that any deal with only the TULF, even if possible, would remain a piece of paper. This "extra" will depend largely on the Government's reading of the Opposition's effective capacity for mass mobilisation, its ability, in short, to create chronic instability in the south to make Sri Lanka ungovernable.

The militant's minimum demand is a north-east merger, a modified version of the traditional homeland's concept using the Indian model, while the TULF speaks of a "single linguistic unit" with a re-drawing of provincial borders. The Government's best offer is a boundary commission within 18 months of the accord. Neither Sinhalese opinion nor the UNP's political will could support bold Nehruvian exercises of that type.

Colombo's case is that it has reached the limit which public opinion in a democracy will allow. The rest is up to India. To back up its case with diplomatic pressure, Sri Lanka made a strong but abortive bid to have its view of "cross-border terrorism" and "separatist threats" endorsed at Harare.

Preoccupied with other, more immediate and pressing issues, Rajiv Gandhi's patience with Colombo could be soon exhausted. The primordial terrors of the Sinhalese and the worst fears of the Government will then be realised if an exhausted and exasperated Delhi makes the Tamil issue entirely a Tamil Nadu responsibility.

Search for Legitimacy

"No fair and free election is possible under Ershad."
—Begum Khaleda Zia, chairperson, Bangladesh Nationalist Party

"We participated in the parliamentary election to join the House. But whether we shall go or not depends upon how Ershad calls the Parliament into session."
—Sheikh Hasina Wazed, president, Awami League

"The question of credibility does not arise at all. Opposition threw a challenge that they would resist the polls and the holding of the polls alone was a mark of credibility."
—President H. M. Ershad

THE question did arise, after all, when General H.M. Ershad finally romped home with a tremendous majority in last fortnight's presidential election. But the boycott of the polls by the Awami League and Bangladesh Nationalist Party, which head the country's major opposition alliances, and the pathetically low turn-out of voters eventually left little contest and less of credibility in the polls—the third in Bangladesh since 1971. Ershad's victory, despite his ardent desire to give the election a genuine coating of authenticity, had all along been a foregone conclusion.

The results predictably left political observers cold. The victory, as they pointed out, hardly reflected the actual showing at the polls. Most voting centres were deserted. The Government claimed 60 per cent voting, the eight-party alliance led by the Awami League put the figure at 3 per cent while independent observers put it at around 5 per cent. Presidential candidate Abdus Samad, who got little over 1 lakh votes, said he couldn't cast his own vote: someone had already exercised his right of franchise.

However, the polls were not entirely uneventful. The last few days before the elections saw concentrated violence in Dhaka, leaving two judges of the Supreme Court, among others, injured in a bomb blast. Dhaka University and areas around it were turned into a virtual battleground as the students took to the streets with bombs and bricks, and the police raided the hostels, seized a hoard of bombs and weapons and arrested over 200 students.

The scene would certainly have been dramatically different had the opposition parties decided to contest as well. The decision by the opposition alliances led by the Awami League of Mujib-ur-Rehman's daughter Sheikh Hasina Wazed, which has 72 seats in the Parliament elected under General Ershad, and the Bangladesh Nationalist Party, founded by former president Zia-ur-Rehman and led now by his widow, Begum Khaleda, has taken the situation in Bangladesh back to square one. Immediately before the elections, with his victory assured, Ershad declared that the important thing was to go ahead with the elections, which the Opposition had said couldn't be held without its cooperation. But the elections only served to distance the opposition parties further—a far cry from the May 7 parliamentary elections earlier this year which the Awami League and its allies contested and won, signalling as it were the return of mainstream politics in Bangladesh and seemingly marking the end of the country's political stalemate.

But the process was reversed in the subsequent by-elections, when the League lost two seats held by Sheikh Hasina in Gopalganj, her ancestral village. This soured the party's fragile understanding with Ershad, and ultimately led to the boycott of last fortnight's elections.

So, far from proving the dispensability of the Opposition, the elections have only made the country's political scenario appear murkier, with everybody guessing Sheikh Hasina's next move. Hope, for Ershad, lies in the proposed Indemnity and Ratification Bill, with which the Government is expected to dissolve the Parliament later this year. On the day of the presidential election, Ershad told reporters that his Jatiya Party and other "like-minded parties" could garner the required 220 votes in Parliament.

The Indemnity Bill is also expected to influence Sheikh Hasina's future plans as well. Addressing a press conference immediately after the presidential election, Hasina did not rule out chances of her joining the Parliament when it is called in end-October. But given the Government's plans to dissolve the House with the Indemnity Bill, Hasina just might stay where she is—outside the Parliament—seeing little for herself in the new dispensation.

Whatever turn the country's political situation may take, it seems unlikely that the Opposition will succeed in toppling General Ershad in the near future, considering the lack of unity in the Opposition: the two alliances are not exactly the best of friends and one would just as soon see the other hurt, instead of joining hands against their common foe. Observers have begun to feel that there never was any real threat to Ershad. Mohammed Farhad, general secretary of the Communist Party of Bangladesh (CPB) has himself admitted that they contested the parliamentary polls because they realised that they couldn't oust Ershad through a movement. The CPB and its allies, who have made it to Parliament after a gap of three decades, will be the worst hit if the Indemnity Bill and the dissolution of the House does come through.

With the Jatiya Party, and its leader General Ershad, assured of more than enough support for pushing through the bill and dissolving the House, a change in the country's political scenario cannot therefore be ruled out. But from all indications, however, it may not be a change for the better. For, though the proposed bill and the dissolution may make the political journey easier for Ershad and his supporters, it seems hardly likely to lead to anything decisive. So, with the approaching winter months, Bangladesh seems destined for a longer season of vacillation and uncertainty.

INDO-US TIES

The Hard Sell

"IT was a wonderful visit." Thus spake US Defence Secretary Casper Weinberger after he had recovered from his bout of "Delhi belly" that scratched him from the final day's discussions with Indian Defence Ministry mandarins during his official visit last fortnight, the first such by an American secretary of defence. At first blush, it would appear that Weinberger was not just referring to his time spent gazing at a moon-washed Taj Mahal or other ancient monuments. As one Indian official involved in the parleys summed up succinctly: "The atmospherics were very good."

Just how good, will in the ultimate analysis, depend on the future meanderings of Indo-US relations. Certainly, the sale of a handful of GE-404 engines for India's highly-ambitious and long-delayed light combat aircraft (LCA) project, still in its conceptual stage, hardly represents a "new phase in Indo-US defence ties", as the US State Department and some of the headline-hungry Indian newspapers have suggested. As re-emphasised by Minister of State for Defence Arun Singh (who headed the Indian delegation), there are two basic principles governing major Indian defence purchases from any country: reliability of supply and transfer of technology.

The US State Department and the Pentagon have been traditionally reluctant to pass on high-tech goodies to India mainly because of the paranoia that these will immediately come under Soviet scrutiny. Thus far, the Pentagon has only been willing to okay the sale of the F-20 Tigershark, an aircraft that could hardly classify as a bestseller or even high-tech. But more important in the Indian Government's eyes is reliability of supply. The US has not exactly covered itself with glory in the past in this respect as far as the Indian experience is concerned during its periodic bouts with Pakistan. As A.P. Venkateswaran, the Indian foreign secretary, remarked to the American team: "You have always played the bad Samaritan, holding an umbrella over us when the sun is shining and promptly taking it away when it starts to rain."

The Indian Government's point is that India has been buying high-tech defence equipment from a variety of western sources (France, Britain, Switzerland, the Netherlands, West Germany and now Sweden), without any great risk of the Soviets or anybody else getting into the act. Further, as one member of the Indian delegation pointed out: "Historically, most of the leaks of high-tech American equipment have been from the US itself, and not from any developing country." To drive the point home, Weinberger was studiously kept away from the section where Soviet MiGs are being manufactured in the Hindustan Aeronautics complex he visited in Bangalore. In South Block's eyes, the only reason the US is eager to sell defence equipment to India is to lessen its military dependence on the Soviets, and not from any great change of heart in the White House vis-a-vis India.

PRASHANT PANJIAR

The sale of a few engines for India's light combat aircraft hardly represents a new phase in Indo-US ties.

Weinberger with Arun Singh: ground rules

Weinberger himself may have returned home convinced that any transfer of US equipment does not translate into "selling the store" to the Soviets. But he will find it virtually impossible to convince his colleagues in the Defence Department on that particular score, as is evidenced by the sale of the Cray-XMP supercomputer which has been dragging along for well over a year. Meanwhile, the Cray has already been superseded by three other models. The Indian Government, it is learnt, has agreed to provide safeguards if the computer deal is pushed through quickly, but that again will depend on the prevailing mood in Ronald Reagan's Washington.

The complexities involved in any significant shift in Indo-US defence relations was also amply demonstrated by Weinberger's inevitable next halt—Islamabad—where Pakistan was promised an airborne early warning system as part of the next $ 4.02 billion (Rs 5,000 crore) military sales package. The package includes a variety of modern armaments that will perforce have to be matched by the Indian side. Neither is it likely that Islamabad will allow the US to sell India any comparable weaponry while the "special relationship" between the two countries exists.

Consequently, there is little likelihood of any major change in Indo-US defence ties. What seems to have changed is the perception on both sides ("clearing up the cobwebs" as one official put it)—and a dramatic increase in commercial ties. There are currently 850 Indo-US joint ventures in operation, a majority of them commissioned in the last two years. Thus, while at a limited political and economic level, the Weinberger visit could serve as a spring-board for better ties, at any other level of import, the spring-board would be still situated at the shallow end of the pool.

KENNETH LARKINS

Teaching in Tihar

EACH time Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi travels abroad, it's time for Geography class in the juvenile delinquents' ward in Tihar Jail. Pointing at a world map hung on the wall, former Air Vice-Marshal Kenneth Larkins, sentenced to 10 years rigorous imprisonment under the Official Secrets Act for espionage, gives the boys a sketch of the country being visited by the prime minister. English class follows Geography, and then General Science, General Knowledge, Life Sciences, History (based mainly on the Discovery of India by Jawaharlal Nehru).

It's a regular school—in jail. A novel experiment is being carried out these days by the Tihar Jail authorities to reform their younger convicts with the help of an educated inmate. And so far, it has been a runaway success.

The idea was mooted soon after Charles Sobhraj escaped from Tihar Jail and, for security reasons, the Larkins brothers were shifted out of ward 17 to ward 14 next to the juvenile delinquents. "The new ward was unreal," Air Vice-Marshal Larkins told INDIA TODAY. "There were 150 boys staying next door yet there was no noise, just an unearthly silence." Seeing the boys just sitting around all day doing nothing, Larkins thought of teaching them. A Signals man in the Air Force, he had never taught anything but flying before. Still, he applied to the jail authorities for permission to tutor his young neighbours.

Permission was granted but there were no students. None of the delinquents, conditioned by their backgrounds, were interested in education. So Larkins switched strategy by concentrating on games, positive that any boy would like a game of cricket. He wrote to the Chief of Air Staff Denis La Fontaine for some sports equipment and pat came a reply from Vice-Chief P.P. Singh granting equipment generously. The games began but the studies did not. Nobody was willing to come to class. At first he let the boys play by themselves. "Then I started growling," he says, "use your mind, I'd scream. Run for that catch, you won't get it if you just stand there." His "growling, grumbling and coaxing" began to pay off and the enthusiasm built up so fast that they ran out of equipment. Reinforcements were sought and received from the armed forces and the Dignum Tuition School run by his sisters in Lucknow. But still there was no headway in studies.

Then one morning, Larkins walked up to the boys and said: "Come, I'll tell you all about venereal disease (VD)." And they came, in numbers. "I had to capture the interest of these boys. I had to arouse their curiosity so as to bring them into the classroom once," grins Larkins. Once they were there, not only did he tell them about VD but also about Armstrong setting foot on the moon and the World Cup Football then being played in Mexico and how people in Delhi were watching it live on television thousands of miles away. "You want to know more about all this, then come to my class," Larkins enticed the boys. This time they came. And today Kenneth Larkins has 42 boys learning a new way of life under him.

Classes begin at 9 a.m. and continue in the afternoon after a break between 11.15 a.m. and 3.30 p.m. English is by far the most popular subject as the students feel that their prospects for employment after the jail term will be enhanced if they can speak English. The classroom belies the fact that a few months ago it was a store. Colourful maps hang on all four walls, a globe rests on the window next to a huge blackboard as Kenneth Larkins tries to hold the boys' interest in his halting Hindi. The beginnings of a library next door boasts of mythological works like Mahabharata, Panchatantra, comics like Tarzan, elementary reading like Numbers 1-20, Hindi sulekh, and even fiction like A Zoo in my Luggage by Gerald Durrell. These are all donations collected by Larkins through letters shot off in all directions. The material has been collected not only from the forces and his sisters but also from social welfare bodies like the Ankur Educational Society, schools like the Army Public School and La Martiniere of Lucknow, and even individual donations like a single cricket ball donated by Balsara, a Parsi boy from Calcutta.

Games begin at 4.30 p.m.—football, handball, volleyball, baseball, kabaddi, seven tiles, cricket, and Tihar cricket—a combination of cricket and French cricket to overcome the space and equipment shortage. The sports fields are kept spotlessly clean, in a freshly swept compound with roses growing in neatly maintained flowerbeds, all along the path around the volleyball court, the baseball and cricket field and leading to a small mud temple in the centre of the compound. Sports have become competitive in Tihar with the warders divided into three teams for a regular triangular league championship.

"I'm doing this only to try and bring back some credit to my father's name. I don't think he could have stood the shock of both his sons in jail," explains the silver-haired, six-foot, lanky, 60-year-old Larkins, the younger of two brothers. "Thank God he died before he saw this," he says with his eyes brimming. The elder brother, Frank Larkins, is not really involved though he has shown some interest by supervising a tailoring class last fortnight. But the younger Larkins makes up for the two of them. "I'm trying to teach them to be a little curious about what's happening to other people. I'm trying to convince them that this god-given machinery of mind and muscle can be improved beyond their own expectations with practice and finally I'm trying to get them to believe that they can be loved and respected by the community where they live and their own little families," says Ken Larkins.

As additional inducement, the boys have been provided with some special attractions. Sunil Gavaskar and Mohinder Amarnath came in to play cricket with them in jail when the Delhi Test against Australia got washed out with rain last month. Says Inspector General (Prisons) P.V. Sinari: "It's a new experiment and there are a lot of hurdles. We're trying our best to make it succeed."

And the growing interest shown by the boys is ample evidence of its success. Huddled together in class are boys convicted for murder, drug peddling, theft and petty crimes, each sharing a common curiosity—and the guarded optimism that this new awakening will help change the course of their tragic lives. Larkins too has discovered a new motivation in life behind bars—and a new optimism. "I'll walk out of these gates one day and I'll go to Brisbane and eat turkey with my wife and daughter," he says confidently.

HEART DISEASE

Hitting the Young

Photographs by HARI OM GULATI

The past decade has seen a dramatic rise in the number of Indians suffering heart attacks. It is now hitting people in the prime of their lives, cutting short bright careers and leaving behind a trail of shattered homes. A majority of the heart attacks today strike people in their 40s and even 30s. Despite improvements in diagnostic and treatment facilities in the country, hospitals are increasingly failing to keep pace with the rapid rise in heart attacks. And with the Government yet to launch a preventive public health campaign, cardiologists fear that heart disease will soon assume epidemic proportions. To assess the magnitude of the problem, Principal Correspondent RAJ CHENGAPPA interviewed a wide cross-section of patients and doctors in several major cities. His report:

RAVI Sareen could not believe what his doctor was telling him. At 35, Sareen, an auto-spares salesman in Delhi, was beginning to enjoy the good things of life. His office had just given him a hefty raise. At home his two children, Amit, 11, and Aditi, 7, had settled down to the routine at school—giving him and his wife, Pratima, more time to relax. And yet here was his doctor looking worriedly at X-ray prints of his heart and telling him: "Unless you undergo surgery immediately you have only a 10 per cent chance of living for another year."

Sareen was stunned. He had had a few indications that things were going wrong with his heart, but he had not taken them seriously. Four years ago, his doctors had detected that he was mildly hypertensive and advised him to give up cigarette smoking. He switched to chewing tobacco but did not slow down the pace of his life. And then, last January while chatting with a friend, he felt a shooting pain in his chest as if "someone was gripping my heart". Tests revealed that he had suffered a heart attack. Sareen's battle for life had begun.

Two decades ago, Sareen would have made medical history for Indian cardiologists. The majority of patients then were more than 50 years old, many even over 60. That situation has now changed dramatically: heart attacks are hitting people in the prime of life, cutting short the brightest careers, leaving behind shattered homes where the finances are still unsettled and the children too young to help their widowed mothers tackle the world.

Two-thirds of the heart attacks today strike people under 50 years. And worse, a third of the total affects those in their 30s, like Sareen. Said G.B. Parulkar, dean of the KEM General Hospital in Bombay: "Earlier if someone below 40 was admitted with a heart attack we would ogle at him. Today our wards are filled with people in their 30s and 40s."

And despite an increased bed capacity, the country's cardiac centres are unable to cope with the rush of young patients. The Madras Medical College (MMC) Hospital, which recently increased its 200-bed facility by another 100, found that they were occupied even as quickly as they were added. At the All India Institute of Medical Sciences (AIIMS) in Delhi, the waiting-list for heart surgery patients now exceeds 500 and except for urgent cases, some patients have to wait for weeks before they can be operated upon. At the nearby G.B. Pant Hospital, where also admissions are a struggle, Chief Cardiologist Professor M. Khalilullah says: "The increase in cases is both dramatic and frightening."

Heart patient in an intensive care unit

Anand Swarup, 41, development manager in a Jaipur bank, had his first heart attack when he was 35. He had ignored his doctor's advice to give up smoking 60 cigarettes a day. And last January, after his third attack, he was asked to go in for by-pass surgery. The operation was successful, and Swarup has been forced finally to give up smoking in order to stay alive.

As in the West, heart attacks have quickly moved up as the number one adult killer in India, elbowing out more traditional killers like tuberculosis, pneumonia, bronchitis and cholera. Slightly over a decade ago, heart disease accounted for just 6 per cent of all deaths in the country. Today, the figure is 10 per cent, and is rising. Of the 10 million Indians who die every year, 1 million do so because of heart disease—as many as in the US. Tuberculosis, in contrast, claims only 0.8 million.

Worse, as many as 12 million Indians are prone to just one form of heart disease—atherosclerosis (a thickening of the coronary arteries that constricts the flow of blood to the heart and causes a heart attack). And one out of three of those affected die with his or her first attack. Most do not even reach a doctor before they are dead.

But even for those who survive the first attack, the prognosis is not too good. One out of 10 of them die within a year. The rest continue their tenuous existence, not knowing when the next stab of pain in their heart will be their last. "We are looking at a disease that has become a major cripple and killer in the country," says C. Lakshmikanthan, chief cardiologist at MMC Hospital.

Those who do survive a first heart attack often become "cardiac cripples". In Vadodara, M. Varshaneya, 51, chief engineer at the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC), found that after his first heart attack he could not maintain the old pace and opted for a less strenuous posting at headquarters. Sareen, the auto-spares salesman, gave up his lucrative job and opened an electrical shop so that he would not strain himself too much. Anand Swarup, 41, a bank officer in Jaipur, found that even walking to the general manager's office was difficult and said: "I've never felt so depressed in my life. I had perfectly good hands and legs, and yet I was virtually crippled and tied to my seat."

And when the silent killer, as heart attacks are known, ends a life, it leaves behind a trail of death and shattered lives. It moved into Subhash and Jayanthi Khandpur's home when they were having a quiet holiday last June. He was a paediatrician and she a gynaecologist. Along with their son, Sujay, they had gone to Darjeeling to take a break from busy schedules. And just as they were beginning to enjoy themselves, it struck.

All Subhash felt was a slight burning sensation in his gullet. And then without warning he collapsed. A doctor was called in, but he could do little. Pain relievers did not help and 12 hours later Subhash was dead. He was only 48 years old. Widowed at 42, Jayanthi cries softly and says: "I feel only a great emptiness." And then looking at Sujay she adds: "How can I be a father to him also?"

WHILE the heart-broken families try to pick up the pieces of their lives, cardiologists are trying to solve the puzzle of the dramatic rise of heart attacks. Some wonder whether this increase is a result of people becoming "heart conscious", as Ashwin Mehta, cardiologist at Bombay's Jaslok Hospital, puts it. But statistical studies by cardiologists in the country's 20-odd hospitals with specialised cardiac centres show common trends:

- heart attacks seem to hit Indians a decade earlier than in the West. A majority of the victims are male;
- the middle class seems to be as vulnerable to heart attacks as the affluent;
- one out of four patients showed no symptoms of heart ailments, and for them the attack came like a "bolt from the blue";
- those under 40 years of age usually had severe heart attacks, making treatment even more difficult than normal; and, three-quarters of the victims below 40 were smokers, indicating that there might be a strong link between smoking and heart attacks among the young.

While Indians today are getting more "heart conscious", cardiologists despair at the lack of preventive care and the ignorance that continues about heart problems. The fact is that any disease of the heart is deadlier than most people think.

Contracting and expanding 1 lakh times every day, the heart is the central powerhouse of the body's circulation. Shaped like an egg and weighing less than a paperweight, it is a fist-sized bundle of pulpy muscles. To sustain

Anita Khetrapal, a New Delhi housewife, is among those whose lives have been shattered by the spread of heart disease. Lajpat Rai, her husband, who owned a printing press, died of a heart attack four years ago when he was 41. She now looks after their three children on her own. Her husband's brothers help out with money, but there is never enough. Her life, she says, "is only full of problems".

its phenomenal pumping power, root-like coronary arteries constantly supply its muscles with blood. But the heart can get affected in any number of ways. Children are most commonly affected by rheumatic heart disease which begins as a simple cough and leads to such problems as weak heart valves. Among adults, the most common heart disease is atherosclerosis. But heart problems could take many other forms: irregular heart-beats that need the implanting of pace-makers, and congenital defects like a hole in the heart that need open heart surgery.

Like the rest of the world, Indians are belatedly realising that the biggest danger from cigarette smoking is not lung cancer but heart disease. With every third adult Indian male being a regular smoker of either cigarettes or beedis, the habit is deeply entrenched in the country. The nicotine in tobacco makes the body's blood vessels constrict, forcing the heart to work harder to pump blood through them. "If you are a heavy smoker you are asking for a heart attack," warns Dr D. Chinniah, head of Bangalore's Jayadeva Institute of Cardiology, which has "Smoking is dangerous" signs plastered on its walls.

Anand Swarup, the Jaipur bank officer, now wishes he had

TREATMENT

Hi-tech Hopes

THE news on the heart front may be bad, but dramatic improvements in diagnosing and treating heart patients have enhanced survival rates in hospitals, ensured speedier recovery, and reduced treatment costs, sometimes quite sharply. Meanwhile, even complicated by-pass surgery does not now need a trip to Denton Cooley in Houston.

Traditional equipment like the electro-cardiograph (ECG), which records the heart's electrical activity, and the sphygmomanometer, which measures blood pressure, have made way for a host of new hi-tech diagnostic tools. At the Madras Medical College Hospital, doctors put patients on a 24-hour ECG watch which includes a carry-along recorder that can even be taken to office. Using a computer that processes the recordings, doctors can pinpoint when the heart behaved irregularly.

At nearby Apollo Hospital, doctors employ an echo-cardiograph that uses high frequency sound waves which send back echoes from the heart that form images of its condition. In Delhi, the AIIMS's cardiology department uses a nuclear scanner to detect anomalies in the heart. A harmless radioactive tracer is introduced through the patient's veins and the gamma rays it emits as it passes through his heart are recorded by a special camera. Almost simultaneously, images of his heart are flashed on a screen. Studying them, doctors can analyse how efficiently the heart is working.

In Bombay, when KEM doctors wanted to analyse the condition of a patient's heart more accurately after an attack, they asked him to go to their 'cath lab' for an 'angiogram'. While the patient lay down, his right thigh was anaesthetised. A catheter, a hollow tube shaped like a scooter clutch, was then gently pushed into an artery till it reached his heart. An opaque dye was sent in through the tube that allowed the giant X-ray cine cameras hovering above his chest to record information about the heart's blood supply and the condition of the arteries and heart valves. Using a machine like a tape-recorder, doctors play back X-ray spools to examine the clogged portion.

SHYAM TEKVANI

By-pass surgery is now almost as commonplace as an eye operation.

Even for treatment, doctors now have a much wider range of drugs to choose from in order to reduce anginal pain, dissolve blood clots, expand narrowed arteries and even halt a heart attack in its tracks. The latest of drugs to come to India are the calcium blockers. Calcium ions influence the electrical impulses and contractions of the heart, and the new wonder-drugs that block the flow of calcium ions help reduce anginal pain and even lower blood pressure.

But the most exciting developments are in the field of cardiac surgery. Using a heart-lung machine that is now standard equipment, doctors can stop the heart from pulsating, and then operate on it. If the heart muscles are damaged after an attack, they remove the dead tissue. If the crucial valves in the heart are malfunctioning they replace them with metallic valves. If the coronary arteries are blocked they remove a vein from the patient's leg, suture one end to the aorta and the other on the artery, "by-passing" the blocked portion like a traffic fly-over, making open heart surgery almost as commonplace as an eye operation.

But several factors have prevented a more rapid development of heart surgery in the country. For years, Indian surgeons have been by-passed by people (including VIPs) who prefer to go to the US or UK for surgery, even though they can have the same surgery done at hospitals in India, and that too for a fraction of the cost abroad (some Rs 4 lakh in a typical case). In 1983 alone, as many as 197 government officials went for by-pass surgery to the US, spending a hefty $40 paid heed to his doctor's advice to give up smoking after his first heart attack six years ago. Swarup had instead continued to smoke 60 cigarettes a day. Two years later he had another attack, more serious than the first. Tests revealed that many arteries in his heart were severely clogged. Swarup had to choose between cigarettes and life. He chose life.

But while cigarette smoking figures high among the list of causes, cardiologists do not regard it as the heart of the problem. They argue that the rise in heart attacks is a result of the new life-style evolving in India, especially in its cities. "There's a fast buck and fast-food culture that's gaining ground. It's a highly competitive world and there is plenty of stress and tension," says Professor M.L. Bhatia, chief cardiologist at the AIIMS, which treats five people suffering from heart attacks every day. Doctors believe that stress and tension release certain chemicals in the bloodstream that tend to speed up the heart-rate and make it beat irregularly, weakening the arteries as a result.

P.N. Kumar, 55, a regional director of Indian Airlines, knows the results of high living only too well. For Kumar, working as an engineer meant touring a lot, keeping late hours, million (Rs 5 crore) of public funds.

Indian cardiac surgeons also complain that patients postpone surgery till it is almost too late. Even today, 90 per cent of those who come for treatment have as many as three to four arteries clogged, needing at least four by-passes. "People treat the hospital as the last stop before the graveyard," says AIIMS's Chief Cardiac Surgeon P. Venugopal.

NEVERTHELESS, with improved facilities Indian surgeons have, in many cases, brought down the mortality rate of heart operations to just three deaths in a 100, from as high as 15 to 20 a decade ago. They have also drastically reduced the cost of a by-pass operation to as little as Rs 20,000 in a government hospital and Rs 40,000 to Rs 50,000 in private hospitals. Typically, AIIMS has a sophisticated set-up, with four operation theatres and a special 18-bed post-operative care unit.

But surgery is not the final solution. Says M.R. Girinath, chief cardiac surgeon at Apollo, who has done 500 open heart operations in two years: "By-pass operations only help the patient live a better life. They do not cure him of what originally caused the narrowing of his arteries."

Meanwhile, for those who have only one artery blocked and would like to avoid major surgery, Indian cardiologists are now experimenting with a sophisticated operation called balloon angioplasty. A catheter similar to the one used in an angiogram is introduced through an artery in the patient's leg. When it reaches the narrowed artery in the heart, a fluid is introduced that inflates the tube, making it inflate like a balloon. The fatty tissue clogging the artery is flattened, resulting in a smoother flow of blood. Angioplasty is also used for opening out blocked heart valves. "We are robbing surgeons of part of their bread," says Professor M. Khalillulah, chief cardiologist at New Delhi's G.B. Pant Hospital, who has so far done 40 such operations.

HARI OM GULATI

RANJAN BASU

Nuclear scanner (top) and an angiogram: improved diagnosis

But these heartwarming developments in treatment are far from adequate. Currently there are barely 350 specialist cardiologists in the country: one for every 2 million people. And though every year 2,000 heart operations are being done, AIIMS doctors estimate that the demand is for around 50,000. As Devendra Saksena, cardiac surgeon at Bombay Hospital, says: "Right now we have only five-star hospitals that are like islands of treatment in a vast ocean of neglect." With cases of rheumatic heart disease showing no decline, the existing centres are already overloaded and have long waiting-lists for surgery.

The Government is planning to fund five specialised cardiac centres by 1990. But with surgical equipment being costlier than the surgeons themselves, any government effort is unlikely to keep pace with the rapidly rising number of patients coming for treatment. And even the existing centres face daunting problems like lack of manpower and poor equipment maintenance. Apart from more surgeons, the country needs skilled anaesthetists to handle the new equipment, and trained nurses specialised in post-operative care. Also, despite what Saksena terms the five-star facilities, even ordinary ambulance services are often not available. Most general hospitals lack the basic facilities for quick diagnosis and treatment of heart attacks. "What we see in cardiac centres are only a third of the victims. The rest either don't get to hospitals in time or are not diagnosed properly," says C. Lakshmikanthan of Madras Medical College Hospital. Without improvements on all these fronts, there is little chance of bringing down the death rate among heart patients.

Kuldip Rai Gupta, 38, a Bhatinda farmer, exercised regularly, hardly ever smoked and led a tension-free life. Yet last June he felt a shooting pain in his heart and thought he was going to die. Tests showed that he had suffered a heart attack. Like Gupta, one out of every four people who have heart attacks shows no precipitating symptoms.

eating greasy food at hotels and chain-smoking 80 cigarettes every day. Relaxation meant going to the club and playing rummy late into the night. And then one day when he was 43, there was a burning sensation in his throat, followed by breathlessness and sweating. His family doctor told him he had suffered a heart attack—a term he would become very familiar with in the years that followed.

But stress and faulty lifestyles are not confined to the well-off. Last June, 35-year-old N.S. Pillai, a stenographer in a private firm in Bombay, had his third heart attack in four years. At office Pillai had to deal with five bosses and was overworked. At home there were tensions too. Commuting every day meant suffering an hour-long ride in a jam-packed train. He began smoking two to three packets daily. Four years ago, while typing out a letter, he felt his heart was being "hit by a hammer". Ever since then, he has lived in constant fear of death.

Cigarette smoking and stress are not the only villains. Indians may not be great chocolate or ice cream eaters, but they make up by gorging into oily sweets and greasy food that are high in cholesterol. An excess of cholesterol in the body too is known to cause thickening of the arteries. In fact, some surgeons have even noticed that people in north and south India have different degrees of arterial blockage. At the New York University Hospital, which has a large number of Indians coming for bypass surgery, Naresh Trehan a highly experienced cardiovascular surgeon, who is now involved in setting up the Rs 15 crore state of the art Escorts Heart Research Institute, said: "Just looking at X-rays of the arteries I could tell which part of India they came from. North Indians usually have only one or two arteries blocked because they tend to eat red meat, processed milk products and hydrogenated cooking oil (vanaspati). South Indians, in contrast, use coconut or groundnut oil that seem to show up as fat in their arteries in a very diffused manner, causing blockages in several arteries."

Cardiologists say that Indians are rarely conscious of what they are shovelling into their arteries when they stuff themselves with eggs, meat, sweets and snacks. While doctors say that a person's daily intake of cholesterol should not exceed more than 250 to 300 mg, with all their over-eating many Indians easily take in at least 500 mg into their system. What few Indians

MEDICAL TERMS

Heart Beats

MEDICAL terminology takes the romance out of the heart. Here is a ready reckoner for the uninitiated:

Coronary arteries: The arteries that supply blood to the heart muscle.

Atherosclerosis: Narrowing of the arteries, due to build-up of fatty tissue.

Angina pectoris: The pain due to inadequate blood supply to the heart caused by narrowing of arteries.

Coronary Thrombosis: Obstruction of a coronary artery by a blood clot that may cause a heart attack.

Heart attack: The death of a portion of the heart muscle as a result of a coronary artery being blocked, denying it blood supply. If a large part of the muscle is damaged, the person dies.

Myocardial infarct: Myo refers to muscle, cardial to heart and infarct means an area of dead tissue that is caused by interruption in blood supply.

Heart failure: An inability of the heart to pump adequate blood, resulting in an accumulation of body fluids in the lungs or in the feet.

Fibrillating heart: Irregular and disorganised heartbeat. Rectified with either an electric shock or drugs.

Pacemaker: An electronic device placed under the skin covering the chest that stimulates the heart with a small electrical impulse to start each heartbeat in patients whose natural initiating system is faulty.

Hypertension: This is simply high blood pressure and is measured with a sphygmomanometer which records the systolic (the pressure when the heart pumps blood) and the diastolic (the pressure when the heart rests for a moment).

Electrocardiograph: A recording of the electrical events that occur in the heart during each heartbeat, giving information regarding the speed of the beat, injury to the heart and the presence of myocardial infarct.

Angiogram: An X-ray of the coronary arteries done by introducing a catheter or tube into the heart and passing an opaque dye that is seen by X-ray cameras.

Echo cardiograph: Investigating the heart by using high frequency sound waves.

Bypass surgery: An operation in which a vein or artery is removed from the body and one end sewn into the aorta and the other at a point beyond the clogged artery in the heart, thereby "bypassing" it, resulting in better flow of blood supply.

Cholesterol: A type of fat that is found as a normal part of the body. The danger comes when abnormal amounts of cholesterol accumulate in blood vessels, especially the arteries feeding the heart.

P.N. Kumar, 55, an Indian Airlines regional director, suffered a heart attack and is now living a saner life. Out went his favourite mutton curry and parathas, as did late night card games. He now exercises regularly and does not smoke. Kumar, who had his first attack when he was 41, says: "I feel fitter than at any other time of my life."

realise is that an egg yolk itself contains 275 mg, a piece of mutton around 77 mg, beef liver around 372 mg, a cup of ice cream around 60 mg, a small chocolate bar 20 mg, a buttered slice of bread 30 mg, and a packet of chips 20 mg. And depending on the cooking medium, every laddu or jalebi can contain anything from 10 to 20 mg.

The number of cups of tea and coffee that Indians gulp down every day has been indirectly contributing to high cholesterol levels. Most beverages contain large amounts of caffeine that is known to cause a rapid heart rate and palpitations, apart from raising blood pressure. Caffeine also stimulates the adrenal glands and increases the cholesterol levels in the blood.

A study done by Victoria Hospital in Bangalore recently showed how serious, high levels of cholesterol in the blood, could be among the young. At least a quarter of the patients with heart attacks had exceeded the normal limit of 250 mg of cholesterol in their blood samples, and some even had more than 300 mg. Says cardiologist Chinniah: "Indians probably have one of the most imbalanced diets anywhere. And all those sweets that are essential to most of our meals are the real killers."

Aggravating this is the high salt content noticed in most Indian diets. While Indians need around three grams of salt every day, most consume around five to 15 grams liberally sprinkled over their curries. Snacks like salted biscuits, chips and groundnuts that are now TV-time favourites in most urban Indian homes have also increased their intake of salt. Salt is known to raise the blood pressure, and already studies done in the country show that people living in cities have a high rate of hypertension. A survey by the Indian Council of Medical Research recently showed that one out of every 16 Indians is hypertensive (suffering from high blood pressure), making them susceptible to heart attacks.

While people gorge unhealthy food, they rarely exercise enough to burn away the excess calories. "These days people even complain of walking to the parking lot," remarks Dr M.S. Valiathan, director of the Sree Chitra Tirunal Institute for Medical Sciences in Trivandrum. Excess body weight makes the heart work harder to pump blood to the rest of the body, putting it under constant strain. Unlike the West, Indians hardly count their calories when they stuff themselves, and the fitness craze

HEART ATTACK

Danger Signals

IF you are highly competitive, extremely time conscious, insist on doing several things simultaneously and find no time to relax, you may move up the executive ladder. You may also be the next candidate for a heart attack.

Cardiologists are not very sure why such personality traits are known to cause heart diseases. But they do know that under stress, adrenalin concentrations in the blood increase and the cholesterol content in the blood rises. An excess of these chemicals may lead to irregular heart beats and greater pressure on coronary arteries. And either of these aberrations can result in a heart attack.

Most people do not know whether they are susceptible to heart attacks. The danger signals to watch for, are all too numerous: high levels of cholesterol in the blood (doctors recommend periodic checks), excess weight, diabetes, high blood pressure, smoking, lack of exercise, history of heart disease in the family, and stress and tension.

While doctors advise people who are exposed to such risk factors to go for periodic check-ups, they essentially advocate "normalcy" in whatever one does, be it eating, working or sleeping. As AIIMS Professor M.L. Bhatia says: "Anything done in excess is bad. A well-balanced life is the key to a good heart."

Generally a diet that is full of red meat (beef, pork, mutton), processed milk products like butter, cheese, chocolates and ice cream and extremely greasy foods are known to increase cholesterol levels.

Doctors say that a majority of the people who have had heart attacks are not even aware that they are having one. It is common to dismiss chest pain as "gas trouble".

The chest pain that patients experience during a heart attack has variously been described as "a wrenching pain", "a hundred needles being poked in my heart" and as if "my heart was being compressed by book binders".

Some may just feel a mild burning sensation in the gullet or just a fleeting pain in the chest. Doctors regard these as warning signs of a major heart attack to follow. But an important feature about chest discomfort is that it is an absolutely new experience and many people who get it usually feel a sense of impending doom.

Sweating, nausea or vomiting may accompany a heart attack. A person may also fall unconscious without even feeling discomfort in the chest. The other symptoms are extreme shortness of breath, rapid heart beat and sudden shooting pains in the legs and the arms. The only advice in such circumstances: get to the nearest hospital.

has not caught on either.

In fact doctors think that the rise in heart attacks has a great deal to do with Indians' apathy towards the high risk factors. Most of them look upon heart attacks as an old age disease and seldom go for check-ups of either their blood pressure or cholesterol levels. Complains Parulkar of KEM: "People neglect their health at every stage. They eat too much of the wrong things, don't come for check ups and even if they do, they don't listen to us." Adds Mehta of Jaslok Hospital: "Apathy seems to be an Indian characteristic."

In Delhi, Lajpat Rai Khetrapal, 41, a printing press owner, did everything that would lead to a heart attack without knowing it. He worked from 8 a.m. till midnight, chain-smoked, rarely exercised and was grossly overweight. Yet he never fell ill. Till one day while at office he felt a strange pain in his chest. Just as he reached a doctor he collapsed and died.

BUT even those who are quite unlike Khetrapal and do not indulge themselves, need not feel lighthearted. Kuldip Rai Gupta, 38, a wheat farmer in Punjab's Bhatinda district, was regarded by his friends as "a model of good health". He exercised regularly, ate a balanced diet and rarely smoked. Having a 100-acre farm gave him a reasonably tension-free existence. But two months ago he felt a severe pain in his heart and tests confirmed that some of his arteries were mildly clogged. Like Gupta, one out of every four people who have heart attacks do not show any precipitating symptoms. But Gupta need not be disheartened, because doctors feel that in most of these cases it is a "benign attack" and they have excellent recovery rates.

Doctors also find that people with a family history of heart attacks are more prone to heart disease. Ashtaf Hussian, a former MP from Gorakhpur, had a heart attack at 42 and apart from his close relatives two of his brothers too are suffering from heart problems.

Cardiologists are unable to explain why women are not as susceptible to heart attacks. Curiously, it was found that women after menopause had the same rate of heart attacks as men in their age group. Doctors refer to research abroad which tested the thesis that the female hormone, estrogen, cast a "protective shield" over a woman's heart. To test this they actually gave several male heart patients large doses of estrogen. Those who took it lost the hair on their bodies and even developed breasts, but it did not seem to improve the condition of their hearts.

While facilities for treatment of heart diseases have improved in many ways (see box), basic shortcomings continue to exist as the problem takes on the character of a national health crisis. There are too few doctors—barely 350 trained cardiologists, far too few specialised cardiac treatment centres—less than two dozen, no proper emergency care facilities, and worst of all no public health campaign to prevent heart disease.

A patient on a Treadmill Test

SHYAM TEKWANI

While Indians are getting more "heart conscious", cardiologists despair at the lack of preventive care and the continuing ignorance about heart problems.

And what is even shocking is that there are hardly any recent studies done on the prevalence rate of heart attacks in the general population. The Government does not even have estimates of the number of cardiologists needed to tackle the problem. "We are in a mess. While heart attacks are showing signs of reaching epidemic proportions, our research on the problem is completely blank," admits Professor Bhatia of AIIMS.

Cardiologists emphasise the need for preventive measures that include launching a mass programme to teach people about the risk factors like smoking and imbalanced diets that precipitate heart attacks. And to wipe out misconceptions like "chubby babies are healthy ones" although it is known that plump children are prone to heart disease. They also point out that the survival rate in heart attacks has improved dramatically abroad because of outstanding emergency treatment—some 15 million Americans are trained in cardiopulmonary resuscitation, while smoking is on the decline, unlike in India.

But despite the dramatic rise of cases of heart attack in the country there does not seem to be any sign of a preventive campaign on the horizon yet. "If we don't launch a preventive programme against heart attacks, it could reach catastrophic proportions in the country," warns Chinniah. But with India already claiming as many heart attack deaths every year as the US, the catastrophe that Chinniah is talking about seems to be already here.

CAR CRAZE

THE rush into the automobile business continues. While Hindustan Motors now wants to manufacture the Isuzu Gemini model in India, Gujarat Industrial Investment Corporation (GIIC) has applied to the Government for permission to manufacture 10,000 two-seater 'micro-cars' in collaboration with Deanneau of France. The two-seater car, with a fibreglass body and a kerb weight of 230 kg (compared to the Maruti's 610 kg), is expected to give 25 km per litre of petrol.

The Government's initial reaction has been negative, arguing that it would like to sanction fresh capacity only by broadbanding existing licences, but the GIIC is still optimistic and has asked the Government to reconsider the matter on the grounds that the car will be a genuine people's car, the investment will be small and the outflow of foreign exchange only around Rs 13 crore. But like all other car manufacturing proposals, this too will have to wait for the formulation of the new automobile policy by the Government.

PENAL PLANS

THE Government has finally decided to get tough with companies that delay the implementation of projects. It has asked the fertiliser firms that are setting up units on the HBJ pipeline route to pay a penalty if their projects do not come up on time. The details are yet to be worked out, but the penalty could be a lumpsum payment for each month's delay.

The pipeline-laying consortium led by France's Spie-Capag already has a penalty clause built into its contract, and the Government's move may be prompted by worries that delays will merely swell the fertiliser import bill further.

TOUGH TACTICS

FAR from being on the defensive following criticism of the tax raids and arrests of businessmen, the Finance Ministry has now gone on the offensive. Incensed by the fact that industrialists are hiring the highest-priced lawyers to fight their cases, the ministry has written to the Industry Ministry and the Company Law Board, suggesting that businessmen arraigned on charges of tax evasion be asked to pay their own legal expenses, and not bill them on their firms. There is only one precedent of a businessman paying his own legal costs: H.P. Nanda of Escorts, during his battle with Swraj Paul, the Government and financial institutions.

RISING REACTION

THE Industrial Development Bank of India (IDBI) seems to have taken to heart recent government pronouncements that ailing units should be identified before they fall sick and not after. Ironically, the villain of the piece in the first IDBI ante-mortem study has turned out to be none other than the Government itself. About 50 licences have been issued for the manufacture of electronic push-button telephones for a total capacity of 10 million units. But the Department of Electronics' (DOE) projections show that demand will be only 2 million by the end of the seventh plan. In the unlikely event of all the units coming up, industry will be graced with another very sick sector. Fifteen licences have, however, been cancelled and the DOE is going around with a chopper among other units which are dithering over the implementation of their licences. Evidently, someone has pressed the electronic panic button.

PRIME POINT

PRIME Minister Rajiv Gandhi has a point when he complains that Indian big business has performed poorly on the export front, and that small-scale industry has often done better. Figures compiled by the Government for 1983-84 (no details are available for subsequent years) show that most large companies export minuscule proportions of their total turnover—and this includes some of the public sector giants. The best companies export barely a tenth of their total turnover, and the worst among the giants do only a fraction of 1 per cent. Even among the foreign-owned companies that sometimes have a better record on the export front, their imports usually are far in excess of the export earning, so that the foreign exchange balance is negative.

AMBITIOUS AIMS

THE newly created Mahanagar Telephone Nigam (MTN) has decided to follow the example of many developed countries by not only getting the telephone directories of Delhi and Bombay free but also making some money on it. MTN has floated a tender for a five-year contract for publishing telephone directories; the successful bidder will have the right to sell space for advertisements in the yellow pages, from which he is expected to meet the expenses of producing the directories annually and pay a royalty to MTN. Eleven potential bidders have been short-listed, including several leading newspaper groups, prominent printers and publishers and even a soft drinks company. Several international telecommunications giants are also interested to collaborate in any way they can.

Forest of Interests

FOR more than one year now, the Madhya Pradesh Government has been locked in a grim struggle with the Department of Environment (DOE) in New Delhi to gain the Centre's clearance for the Bodhghat hydel project in Bastar district. In its bid to get the Rs 900-crore project cleared, the state Government has left no stone unturned: it has even named the reservoir-to-be the Indira Sagar! The project also has the blessings of the World Bank. But the DOE has dug its heels in, and its doubts are shared by the prime minister.

These led to the appointment of a committee of experts from the Central Forest Institute, Shimla, to assess the precise damage that the project would inflict on the environment. The team's findings show that the Madhya Pradesh Government, in its anxiety to get the project cleared, had underestimated the likely damage by a significant amount. While the Madhya Pradesh State Electricity Board (MPSEB) had claimed that only 2.8 million trees would be submerged, the team found that more than 10 million trees would be lost. It also found exceedingly optimistic the MPSEB's estimate that only one-eighth of the trees were sal trees.

But the damage to the forests is only a small part of the project's social cost. Thirty-two villages will be submerged. Their 15,000 tribal inhabitants will lose their livelihood and way of life. The compensation they are paid is a poor substitute for their land. With no one to advise them on how to invest this money, they will soon spend it and become paupers. Many will drift into towns seeking work that doesn't exist.

But even this is not the worst of the fate in store for them. If the experience of a hydel project in Mandla district, not far from Bodhghat, is anything to go by, the lands will be taken away but compensation will not be paid for years. The dispossessed will thus become destitute.

What will Madhya Pradesh gain from this project? Bodhghat will provide hydro-power which can be used for meeting peak demand from an installed capacity of 500 MW. It will, however, deliver an average of only 106 MW throughout the year. In 1982-83, the state had an installed power generation capacity of 2097 MW, but in addition a number of the National Thermal Power Corporation's superthermal power plants are coming up in the state, and it will get a handsome slice of their power as well. Since the project will take 12 years to complete, and Madhya Pradesh's power generating capacity is rising at 9.5 per cent a year, Bodhghat's actual contribution around 1998 is likely to be minuscule.

Stumps of felled trees in Bodhghat

> "Is there any case for a hydel project that destroys more than 10 million trees, renders destitute 15,000 tribals in 32 villages and then delivers power that can be supplied by thermal plants?"

Is this worth the damage that it will inflict? Is there any case for a hydel project that provides only electricity and no irrigation, when thermal plants can deliver even peak power although at the cost of a drop in their efficiency?

The answer to a layman is obvious. Why then is the Madhya Pradesh Government so keen to go ahead with the project? Why, for that matter, did the Kerala Government fight tooth and nail to implement the Silent Valley hydel project, in the face of world-wide protests and Mrs Gandhi's own repeatedly expressed reservations? The answer may lie in a totally unexpected area: perhaps we should stop looking at what the state will gain after the power starts flowing, and see what its minions will gain even before the project gets off the ground.

All hydel project documents talk about the amount of land, including forests, that will be submerged. But this is a convenient euphemism. While the land is submerged, the trees on it are not. The first act of the project authority or the state Government, even before the project authority is set up, is to clear all the trees on the land to be submerged. The trees are then sold.

Some idea of the value of the timber may be had from the fact that sal commands as much as Rs 250 to Rs 300 per cubic foot. Given the thickness of the trunk and the height of the mature trees, the final value of each tree is at least Rs 10,000 as sawn furniture-wood, and another Rs 2,000 to Rs 3,000 as firewood. In fact it may be a good deal more, for deodar trees in Himachal Pradesh are being auctioned for Rs 35,000 each.

At only Rs 15,000, the two million or so sal trees in Bodhghat are worth Rs 3,000 crore—more than three times the estimated cost of the project. Madhya Pradesh can therefore build at least two Bodhghats out of the slaughter of this one forest, without asking for a paisa from either the Centre or the World Bank. But as experience with past hydel projects has shown, the state itself will get a tiny portion of the sale proceeds of the "submerged" trees. The balance will be shared by politicians, officials, engineers, timber contractors, an army of wholesale and retail traders and the entire timber and furniture industry of the country. That is the true lobby behind hydel projects. Taking it head-on requires more than pious expressions of concern for vanishing forests or immiserised tribals.

TAMIL NADU INDUSTRY

Changing Gear

FOR years, they were widely viewed as citadels of conservatism. And rightly so. For Tamil Nadu's corporate heavyweights rarely assayed the new frontiers of business, preferring instead to stick to their traditional turf. But the times are a-changing in the south too. Throwing overboard the stifling caution of yesteryear, big business in the state is testing the waters of enterprise.

Corporate entities such as the TVS group and the Murugappa Chettiar-run Tube Investments (TI) are diversifying into an impressive range of greenfield areas, investing fat sums in major projects, and tying up prestigious foreign collaborations. Notes S. Viswanathan, managing director of Enfield India: "The business scene in Tamil Nadu has suddenly become dynamic, highly competitive and hi-tech."

Viswanathan's 31-year-old company, which had confined itself to two-wheelers and farm engines, is now making a sortie into television sets and microwave ovens. The TVS group, which had doggedly remained in the automotive components business for decades, is moving into computer peripherals, refrigerators and washing-machines. Rane, which also has been in the automobile components industry for the last quarter century, is busy putting up a five-star hotel in Madras. And the Murugappa Chettiar group is braving the audio tape and cassette market, while Southern Petrochemicals Industries Corporation (SPIC) is readying to leap into industrial electronics. Madras Rubber Factory (MRF) is entering the toy market and has tied up with US giant Hasbro.

"It looks as if the industrial houses of Tamil Nadu have begun to look forward to the 21st century," says a senior Tamil Nadu government official. He is right, of course. Anxious not to be left behind while the business community elsewhere sallies forth onto the fast track, the state's big companies are eagerly scouting for opportunities to grow. Explains A.C. Muthiah, vice-chairman and president of SPIC: "The diversification plans of these companies are the result of firms wanting to cash in on the new growth areas of electronics and chemicals." Adds Sundaram Clayton Managing Director Venu Srinivasan: "Computer use will explode in the 1990s and in the 21st century. So it is only natural that we should have identified computer peripherals as our new business area."

"The diversification plans are the result of firms wanting to cash in on new growth areas of electronics and chemicals."

A.C. MUTHIAH
vice-chairman and president of SPIC

The desire to get in on the ground floor of new growth areas is not, however, the only factor that is propelling the current diversification drive. As Enfield's Viswanathan argues: "Industrial houses in Tamil Nadu are generally exploring new areas of business because there are new people heading these organisations. Also every line of business, however successful, reaches a saturation point."

The old order has yielded place to the new in more ways than one: a younger, more ambitious breed of industrialists is at the helm of companies. At TVS, Venu Srinivasan is 33, his brother Gopal, a Sundaram Clayton director, is 29, as is Srinath Ratnam, the joint managing director of Sundaram Industries. At Tube Investments, M.M. Murugappan, president of Murugappa Electronics, is 31. Indeed, Rane Managing Director L. Lakshman at 40 may well be among the oldest of the new tribe.

"The business scene in Tamil Nadu has become dynamic, highly competitive and hi-tech."

managing director, Enfield India

Then, the diversifying business groups have evidently read the market signals correctly. The demand for traditional products is tapering off in a fiercely competitive market, and offering a wider range of wares obviously makes sense. Enfield India has reached a point where further investments in two-wheelers will result in diminishing returns. Even firms whose fortunes are flourishing in the market-place are hedging their bets. Says P.R. Sundaravadivelu, chairman of SPIC Electronics and Systems Ltd (SPEL), the new electronics firm that SPIC has launched: "We are diversifying because we don't want to put all our eggs in one basket." Also, companies such as SPIC are flush with funds and so can invest in capital-intensive projects. For good measure, the Kothari group has diversified into processed foods and has tied up with General Foods of the US.

Certainly, the TVS group is investing substantial sums of money: Rs 90 crore in new projects and Rs 150 crore in modernising existing plants. Over the next five years, the group will add nine new firms to its existing stable of 19 companies. The scorching pace of growth is expected to push group turnover from Rs 702 crore to a staggering Rs 1,230 crore. Among the new companies are: TVS Electronics which will turn out computer peripherals (tape drives, disc drives); TVS Chemicals (engineering plastics, resins, polymers and surface coatings at Pondicherry); and the consumer durables enterprise. Last fortnight, Gopal Srinivasan winged his way to the US to sew up collaboration deals for washing-machines, dishwashers and refrigerators.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

THE new spirit of enterprise at TVS is, however, tempered with caution. In keeping with the group's practice of not turning out four-wheeled vehicles because this could affect the group's components business from automobile manufacturers, computers are similarly a no-no. Explains Venu Srinivasan: "We will never go ahead with computers because then we would be competing with other computer firms who will be our customers for peripherals."

Such dilemmas are, of course, peculiar to the business enterprise that T.V. Sundaram Iyengar founded some 50 years ago. And if electronics is the buzzword among many of the state's industrialists, it is because it offers them market opportunities that they cannot afford to ignore. Says SPEL Executive Director M.N. Sivamoney: "The demand for integrated circuits in the country is expected to touch 100 million by 1990; less than 10 million are now made in India."

Electronics grips the attention of others too. The TI group's Murugappa Electronics was scheduled to begin trial production this month in Mysore of audio-magnetic tapes in collaboration with a Japanese company, and company President Murugappan unhesitatingly claims that his venture can take on its five competitors—even though its products will be more expensive. Arguing that the demand for cassettes will triple from 90 million to 270 million by 1990, Murugappan says: "We can market our product because the audio tape market can be expected to be quality conscious."

If that displays the new mood of confidence in Tamil Nadu, there is more. Enfield has jumped into the cluttered TV market—and believes it can hold its own against the competition. Reason: at well under Rs 2,000, the Enfield Electronics' black and white sets will enjoy a price advantage. "They can wind up as a second television set in many homes," maintains an Enfield official. Even its 20-inch colour model will be comparatively cheap at Rs 6,750 because the firm will be buying the kit from the state-owned Electronics Trade and Development Corporation of India. Such calculations have still to be tested in the market-place, but Enfield reckons that branching out makes sense when break-even levels are low and little capital is required. The bill for a washing-machines, vacuum cleaners and microwave ovens venture in collaboration with Magic Chef of the US will be just Rs 2 crore.

"Computer use will explode in the 1990s. So we have identified computer peripherals as our new business area."
VENU SRINIVASAN
managing director, Sundaram Clayton

Unensnared by the electronics rush the Rs 50-crore Rane group is treading other trails. It is making an ambitious foray into hotels. Rane has floated a new company called Pleasant Hotels which will set up by early 1987 a deluxe hostelry near Madras' international airport in suburban Meenambakkam. Says Rane Managing Director Lakshman: "We were looking at a number of areas, but the hotel business seemed very attractive. There is a serious dearth of five-star hotel accommodation in Madras and our study found that the city attracts a lot of business traffic. The tourist traffic in the state is also said to be growing at the rate of 15 per cent or more a year. So we decided to take the plunge."

"There is a serious dearth of five-star hotel accommodation in Madras. So we decided to take the plunge."
L. LAKSHMAN
managing director, Rane

With almost everyone who's anyone taking the plunge, the outcome of the new rush of projects will almost certainly be faster industrial growth in Tamil Nadu. Till a little over a decade ago, the state ranked third in industrial terms. That pride of place has long been yielded to rivals like Gujarat, and Tamil Nadu now does not even find a place among the top 10 industrialised states in the country. But, as Rane's Lakshman says: "The business houses of Madras which are embarking on large-scale diversification plans will take the state back to near the top of the country's industrial table." All the projects and hopes may not materialise, but there is little doubt that Tamil Nadu is witnessing some form of industrial resurgence.

MARKET RESEARCH

Boom Time

IT is open season for hunting wives this month. Not, however, with connubial aspirations. Pathfinders, the market research arm of advertising agency Lintas, is hot on the trail of over 10,000 housewives nationwide in what may be the first ever comprehensive syndicated psychographic survey in this country.

The survey of the urban housewife's mental make-up and consumption habits marks just one more milestone in market research's triumphant progress over the years. Long regarded by industry as one of those new fangled management tools which had no place in a developing economy, market research is now being embraced with gusto by both the private sector and the Government. The predictable result: more market research firms are springing up (Consumer Focus, for one), outfits already entrenched in the business report phenomenal growth rates (an average of 30 per cent annually), and the competition in the still small market is hotting up. Equally significant, money is now being pumped in to radically change research operations. The recently launched television programme rating scheme, for example, will cost Rs 50 lakh in meters alone.

Market research in India hasn't yet descended to the level in the US, where people get asked whether they put water on the toothbrush before squeezing out the paste or after, or not at all. But it's getting there. "People have come to realise how important research is. There is more consciousness of its value," says Ranjit Chib, chairman-cum-managing director of Marketing Research and Advisory Services (MRAS).

Certainly, private companies are shelling out more on research than ever before. Tobacco colossus ITC, for instance, spends Rs 40 lakh a year just to keep tabs on the market and recently pioneered a lifestyle study along the lines of the Pathfinders' survey. Hindustan Lever forks out upwards of Rs 80 lakh annually on research, most of it on in-house work—and the money is regarded as well spent. Lever's Vice-President for Marketing Siddhartha Sen, points to Lyril soap as one of the triumphs of market research: "We took two-and-a-half years to put the package together. We had to position the product carefully, find out consumer perceptions and it cost us a huge pile. It was worth it."

All the research may not, of course, get the right results. Hindustan Motors once hired four agencies to independently project the demand for Ambassador cars in the face of competition from new models. All four said the Ambassador wouldn't sell. The company consigned their reports to the dustbin and the Ambassador continues to coast along. Undaunted—and indicative of the new mood—Hindustan Motors continues to rely on market research.

But growth is also coming because of a new interest in market research on the part of the Government, and its role in liberalising the economy. "Competition means that you cannot just sell what you want," contends Chib. "You have to find out what the consumer wants—and that needs research."

Indeed, the Government itself is spending much more on research. The health, tourism and finance ministries have commissioned studies on a host of subjects. One example: a Rs 24-lakh study on family planning by three research agencies was handed over to the Health Ministry early this year. Says Marketing and Research Group (MARG) Chairman Titoo Ahluwalia: "This Government feels we can forecast almost everything. What is more important, there is a genuine open-mindedness. More work has been done for the Government in the past year than in five years put together." Adds Ramesh Thadani, general manager of Indian Market Research Bureau (IMRB), the grand-daddy of the country's research outfits: "Government spending these days is about 7 to 8 per cent of our turnover. A few years ago, it was insignificant."

Predictably, then, outfits like Pathfinders believe they can easily hawk their information, the stiff price notwithstanding. A Pathfinders report will cost Rs 30,000 apiece for early bird clients. "Many companies have shown interest already," insists General Manager Pranesh Misra.

And so the hunt for housewives is on. And if some time this month your afternoon siesta gets disturbed by a seemingly inane "Are you more relaxed than other people?" or "Do you wear perfume at home?", don't yell for a strait-jacket. After all, remember you are helping to build up a profile of the Indian psyche.

Long regarded by industry as one of those new fangled management tools which had no place in a developing economy, market research is now being embraced with gusto by both the private sector and the Government.

on't make history.

It all began with a lone F-27 taking off from Guwahati on January 26, 1981. Three years later, Vayudoot was still the favourite subject of the sceptics.

But a job had to be done.

And aviation history was made.

Highest operational growth — worldwide.

Amongst the airlines in the world, Vayudoot's network has been growing at a phenomenal rate.

32 stations in one year—an unparalleled achievement. By 1988-89, Vayudoot's network will have grown from the present 67 stations to 130.

What is remarkable is that expansion has taken place alongside profitability. The current year's operation will not only wipe out losses totalling Rs. 1.76 crores, but will in fact achieve a healthy profit-objective of Rs. 75 lakhs.

10 new Dorniers. Highest fleet utilisation.

The Vayudoot fleet of Dorniers, Avros and Fokkers is flying day and night across the network. The fleet will soon be augmented by larger-capacity aircraft, to meet future demands of flying over 5,00,000 people in 1987.

Customer Service — the accent on quality.

Statistics alone don't make headlines. And Vayudoot is conscious of the fact that customer service demands priority. The whole operation is being geared up to fulfil this task.

Cabin crew personnel have been recruited. And an all-station communication link-up is on the cards to facilitate quick reservations and service.

Modern management ethos.

Vayudoot is more than just a flying operation.

The organisation has successfully launched innovative ideas, such as the highly imaginative night-mail service, the 'Rent-a-Plane' scheme and the holiday packages.

A crucial aspect of the ethos is the constant striving for high productivity and low overhead costs. And a team of dedicated personnel is geared to customer satisfaction and corporate excellence.

The whole operation runs with clear, planned strategies. To fulfil a very definite task.

Of airlinking remote, inaccessible places.

Of saving time in transportation.

Of opening up the country for tourism.

Of boosting trade and business.

Of bringing India closer to Indians.

It's the very idea behind Vayudoot. And it's making history.

FARM COMPANIES

Bitter Harvest

ROUND one to the Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices Commission (MRTPC). The Delhi-based Marudhar Services Ltd, one of a new breed of farm investment companies, has owned up to its sins of omission and commission in its advertisements.

Round two has just commenced. Lawyer S.S. Kumar has filed a caveat before the MRTPC on behalf of another of the farm investment outfits—United Land and Housing. He wants to stop the commission from giving an interim ruling prohibiting United's promotion campaign.

Rounds three onward could involve several other similar outfits that have been promising astronomical returns on tree-growing projects. "Money grows on trees," the banners have been screaming. "More than triple your investment in six years—zero risk, tax-free."

The MRTPC may or may not be able to separate the wood from the trees, but the new breed of agricultural companies have been making hay, and think the sun will continue to shine on them—MRTPC or no MRTPC. These companies with the self-proclaimed Midas touch had been coaxing investors to chip in sums ranging from Rs 2,000 to Rs 2 lakh. The companies are then supposed to set up plantations, mainly for timber, with a few cash crops thrown in. The land (in some cases only the trees) will be formally transferred to the investor so that the returns qualify as tax-free agricultural income.

"We are not making tall claims," says Jamshed Ali Syed, chairman-cum-managing director of the Bombay-based Gold Valley Agro-Development. "We have agricultural experts on our board. They and others have looked at all our plans. Our cultivation mix consists of pineapples, eucalyptus and teak. On each acre the pineapples will fetch between Rs 15,000 and Rs 20,000 annually, the eucalyptus Rs 1.2 lakh every seven years, and the teak Rs 7 lakh every 10 years."

Gold Valley is the most lucrative of the schemes on offer: Rs 12,101 invested today is supposed to bring in average annual returns of Rs 20,000 from the third year onwards. This is apart from the far more substantial teak and eucalyptus bonuses. Over the 23-year-period that the plantation programme is scheduled to last, individual takings could top Rs 20 lakh. Small wonder there are so many eyebrows raised.

The astronomical returns promised by farm companies in advertisements for tree-growing projects have aroused the suspicions of the MRTPC.

Others in the line seem tame by comparison. Though Marudhar has an upmarket plan, it is focusing mainly on its one-acre units, which sell for Rs 30,000 and are worth Rs 90,000 after six years or Rs 2.7 lakh after 12 years. Green Acres in Bombay has stuck to the same lines, though its initial asking price is a shade lower at Rs 25,000. But United is only handing out its eucalyptus trees. For Rs 2,000 you can own 50 of them.

Such bounty was bound to raise suspicions. Marudhar, which had made a Rs 20 lakh advertising and marketing splash, was the first to feel the heat of the MRTPC's Directorate-General of Investigation and Registration. The sleuths discovered that the company's advertisements failed to mention an extra Rs 5,000 in processing and registration charges. Furthermore, Marudhar's use of the logos of banks and an insurance company in the advertisements seemed to suggest that the company had their backing, which was not strictly true. These and sundry other peccadilloes, including the use of the slogan "money grows on trees" found it in the MRTPC dock. After suitable rectifications and a new brochure, it was let off the hook. Now the eagle eye has turned to Asian Townsville, which has already been told to suspend its present advertisements. Some others, like United and Gold Valley, are also under scrutiny.

Marudhar Chairman Ashok Mehta, however, is quick to point out that "the commission has not debarred us from doing business, and has only told us to rectify certain points". And an Asian Townsville official says: "The commission did not give us a chance to be heard, which was very unfair. Its ruling has affected our business and our reputation." In turn, Lawyer Kumar adds that the schemes are safe, that investors have entered into legally enforceable agreements and accuses the MRTPC of sloppy investigation.

But the moot point remains: Can these companies deliver the goods? "Where is the doubt?" asks Mehta. "Each acre will have 2,000 trees which, even given a 25 per cent mortality rate, will be worth Rs 3 lakh after six years. The investor will get his Rs 90,000 and we will clear Rs 2 lakh." But investigative wing lawyer B.B. Ahuja was equally certain when he declared before the MRTPC that "there is absolutely no asset-backing for the promise of such an amount as profit". The companies counter with the fact that agricultural experts have testified to the viability of the schemes. Kumar produces a report by an independent agency which suggests even higher profits.

The rub, however, is that if the plantation does fail through an "act of God" the company is not liable to pay off, an aspect which has been glossed over in the publicity blitz. "One has to take these risks," says Gold Valley's Syed. "But unlike most other companies, we make this point very clear in our brochures." But Green Acres is so confident of success that it wants to do away with this too. "We are working out a system in which we can give iron-clad guarantee," says Chairman S.W. Sangamneheri.

The other debatable point is whether this will indeed qualify as agricultural income—the tax-free aspect being as big a draw as the handsome returns. Though Mehta argues that there is a strong body of case law to back up such claims, not everybody is so sanguine. While that is a matter for the courts to eventually decide, the shrewder operators like Gold Valley and Green Acres have set themselves up as cooperative societies, which will make obtaining tax exemption much easier. "We have done our homework," claims Sangamneheri.

That may be so. But if this is such a lucrative area, and the shortage of wood for paper is a perennial problem, why didn't others get in before this? While Syed feels that people tend to look down on agricultural income as something reserved for the poor, Sangamneheri says that it was putting the idea together that took so long. Now that it has caught on, adds Mehta, "everybody is getting in". It does not need much money to start with—the investors' funds are used for even the land purchase. It does not need much expertise either—not for those who are interested in making a quick buck. Now, however, with the MRTPC initiative and the publicity it has generated, the quick buck may not come quite as quickly.

FASHION INSTITUTE

Designers' Mark

IN the shopping arcade of New Delhi's Samrat Hotel, an institute is slowly taking shape which could alter the entire character of the Indian garment industry. The National Institute of Fashion Technology (NIFT), which when it opens in January will be India's first fashion institute, does not look like much at the moment. But if things go according to plan, it could one day produce an Indian Kenzo or an Issey Miyake.

Indian garment exports have multiplied tenfold in the past decade, but the country's garments enjoy the sort of world-wide reputation that goods marked 'made in Japan' once had: cheap, tacky, low-end. NIFT has come about because the Government and the garment industry realise that things do not have to be this way.

NIFT does not as yet have premises of its own, but most of the 6,000 members of the Apparel Export Promotion Council have already received an elegant brochure announcing the first four-month course for senior fashion design coordinators, starting January.

And the man overseeing every minute detail is Richard Streiter, dean of the Fashion Institute of Technology (FIT) in New York, who will be in India for two years to set up NIFT. Streiter has great faith in India's ability to throw up "talent and artistic brilliance", but slightly less faith in its ability to insist only on the very highest quality, which is why he is involved in every last detail: "What I am going to try and create is an institute as good as FIT, of the very highest international standards." So when he and an FIT team selected only two instead of six Indian faculty members, it was because they felt that nobody else in the short-list of 41 was of top quality.

NIFT will begin by offering three basic courses. But Streiter hopes that it will eventually, like FIT, be able to offer courses in everything to do with fashion technology. Even in its initial stages it will have facilities that are now unavailable in India. There will be a fashion library, a western and Indian garment collection, and a record of every little detail connected with the apparel industry so that buyers and manufacturers know exactly where to find what they are looking for.

The initial investment in NIFT (Rs 9 crore in the seventh plan) has come from the Government, but the idea is to get industry involved. V.K. Agnihotri, development commissioner (handlooms), who is vice-chairman of the NIFT board, said that the Government had been thinking about creating such an institute since 1979. "We feel that the way to beat the quotas that western countries have imposed on our garment exports is to produce higher quality garments rather than quantity." According to him, the Government turned to FIT in New York for assistance mainly because it had set up similar institutes in Israel and Japan.

The National Institute of Fashion Technology, coming up under the guidance of Richard Streiter of New York, plans to provide facilities unavailable in India.

But exporters feel that although such an institute is needed, it should be run by industry rather than the Government. Said Deepak Seth of Pearl Agencies: "We have been asking for such an institute for years, but frankly I am worried about the fact that the Government seems to have taken it over. I don't feel that they can understand our needs or the conditions under which we work." Amit Judge of Januck, also said that NIFT needed to have courses even for those exporters who wanted to expand and develop their businesses but did not know how to.

Streiter is confident that the garment industry will be as involved in the running of NIFT as the Government. Says Streiter: "Without that it couldn't run. If the industry does not become involved my work here would be a waste."

THAPAR CASE

Saving Face

IN the end, it was nothing but a search for a face-saving formula. And a compromise was eventually reached. But perhaps both the concerned parties—the Finance Ministry and the man whom it had summarily jailed for violating foreign exchange regulations, industrialist Lalit Thapar—lost some face. Thapar had to apologise and plead guilty to charges that he had vigorously denied earlier; the Finance Ministry had little choice but to drop criminal proceedings in the aftermath of direct criticism from the prime minister, no less.

Nevertheless, Finance Minister V.P. Singh proved a point. Any doubts on this were quickly settled with the second apology in a week—this time from FICCI President R.P. Goenka, who hastily expressed his regret about having complained of a "raid raj". Most important, the finance minister stayed undisturbed in the Cabinet reshuffle.

But this was not achieved without virtually unprecedented back-room manoeuvring. The mandarins of the Prime Minister's Secretariat and the Finance Ministry struggled to work out a strategy that would make a compromise not look like a compromise. And after a series of closed-door confabulations between Revenue Department officials and Thapar's advocates, a compromise was worked out. Thapar, the dapper chairman of a Rs 600-crore industrial empire, sent a three-page letter to Bhure Lal, the now-dreaded head of the Enforcement Directorate, saying: "It is now realised that there has been a violation of the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act" and that "we hereby tender unconditional apology for the above violations of the FERA and assure you that this practice will not be repeated in future."

That apology was not wrung out of Thapar without some arm-twisting. Immediately after Thapar's sensational arrest in early September, the charged atmosphere had been filled with anti-Finance Ministry sentiment. However, Singh is nothing if not a fighter, and he ordered his officials to dig further. Initially, the enforcement officials had been following only cases relating to the non-remittance of foreign exchange from Seychelles and Indonesia. Now they spread their net to other countries and eventually confronted the group with a list of 18 charges. At the same time, Bhure Lal and his investigators (some of whom were annoyed by the pressure on them) subjected half a dozen senior Thapar executives to gruelling interrogation. Bhure Lal himself spent a few days in Bombay scrutinising RBI files on the Thapars' overseas dealings. He then sent a 20-page report to the finance minister, which was finally forwarded to the Prime Minister's Secretariat.

When the Thapars got wind of the scope of the prosecution case, they quickly changed strategy and sued for peace. The group not only offered to accept its guilt, it also mobilised leading industrialists close to the centres of power to intervene on its behalf. Once it was known that the company was willing to negotiate, Singh directed his officials to extract an unconditional apology. And it was left to Revenue Secretary Vinod Pandey and Bhure Lal to prepare a draft listing all the charges, and to recommend that the Government could decide against criminal proceedings if the Thapars agreed to adjudication of the cases by the directorate.

BHAWAN SINGH

Though V.P. Singh wrung an apology from the Thapars there was no doubt that L.M. Thapar had been let off lightly due to pressure from many quarters.

HARI OM GULATI

The Thapar group, after consulting its advocates, duly submitted a letter of apology to Bhure Lal. Singh now swung into action. As soon as the letter landed at his desk, his officials summoned a press conference where copies of the letter were handed out, while Bhure Lal sat in a corner twirling his moustache. Said a combative Singh: "This apology is evidence that the Government does its homework well before it strikes. All those who pooh-poohed the raids must be feeling ashamed of themselves for their irresponsible utterances against the Government." FICCI's Goenka came in for a special tongue-lashing, and details of his group's tax cases were disclosed to the assembled journalists. Goenka's apology quickly followed. Thapar was not available for comment.

Still, Singh was hard put to defend his decision to drop criminal proceedings despite having a cast-iron case. Over 500 FERA cases—many of them involving big business houses—are pending either in the courts or for adjudication. And though Singh asserted that all the foreign exchange that was due would have to be repatriated, and that the Thapars would have to pay up fines that would be imposed, his promise of an amnesty scheme for FERA violators had all the signs of a hastily-conceived offer designed to suit the circumstances.

The Thapar apology also made it clear that the group continued to contest three of the more important charges against it. The letter also said the violations were unintentional, and that there were "a number of mitigating circumstances...In most cases we had sent information to RBI or Ministry of Commerce."

Though Singh was putting up a good public performance, there was little doubt that Thapar had been let off lightly because of pressure from a variety of quarters. Said a Delhi-based industrialist: "All of us are crooks according to the finance minister; but why does he spare some and hang others? Obviously he yields to some kinds of pressures and tries to cover it up." Corporate circles also pointed out that the voluntary disclosure scheme for excise evaders was similarly drawn up after a raid on a Bombay-based refrigeration company led to a furore. So Singh may have got the upper hand in the Thapar skirmish, but he has not emerged unscathed.

LIGHT RAIL SYSTEM

Future Moves

DELHI'S broad boulevards are the envy of virtually every other city; but they are no longer a motorist's delight. The capital city already has a quarter of all the motor vehicles in the country's 11 largest cities, and the vehicle population is growing 10 times faster than the human population. The predictable result: bumper-to-bumper traffic snarls that clog the city's main arteries and make life increasingly difficult for its 2.5 million commuters.

But there is hope round the corner. Last fortnight, the Government accepted an official report by a nine-member committee recommending for Delhi a light rail transit (LRT) system, a cross between an underground and the suburban systems found in Calcutta and Bombay. Work on the Rs 520-crore project could begin in a year's time, and be ready four years after that.

While the final verdict on the venture awaits a report by an inter-ministerial committee on metropolitan transport systems, the signals right now read go. Says Madhavrao Scindia, minister of state for railways: "The route has been accepted in principle. I'm very keen on the project." Adds Prakash Narain, chairman of the Railway Board: "The inter-ministerial committee has already said that the LRT is one of the options." Indeed, the Government appointed a task force last fortnight to examine the type of LRT system. One possibility: an M-Bahn, or a magnetic levitation-based system, that will float on an air cushion above the rails.

Clearly, the LRT decision marks a major milestone for the country's traffic-choked cities. As a Delhi Administration official puts it: "This is extremely important because a number of other cities will soon become metros with populations of one million or more. All of them will need transport systems with higher carrying capacities than buses."

In the capital, the LRT is to snake its way above the surface, on the surface and possibly even underground along a 36-km-long stretch from east Delhi across the Yamuna river to the western outskirts. It will converge with Delhi's existing circular rail system at four points and have 36 stations. Says the report: "Wherever the LRT is elevated, sleek and sensitive designs will have to be thought of and adopted."

Map by B.K. SHARMA

The Light Rail Transit System is to snake it's way above the surface, on the surface and possibly even underground along a 36-km-long stretch from east to west Delhi.

Scindia: go signals

The proposal is in fact part of a more ambitious 200-km-long network that the Delhi Administration had submitted to the Planning Commission a couple of years ago. The commission proved lukewarm because money was scarce, but the Government now seems determined to go ahead. "The east-west link is the first phase. Phase two will be a north-south link," says Scindia. "The east-west corridor has the maximum volume of passenger trips," explains a member of the railway board-appointed committee. "In 1981, the number of passengers moving through the corridor varied between 10,000 and 40,000 every hour. The figure must have gone up since then," he says. (Buses can carry at the most 8,000 passengers an hour.) The system can ferry 20,000 passengers hourly each way and will take a great deal of pressure off the roads.

But the bill could be a cool Rs 800 crore if the project has to go underground for 8 km, as some committee members had proposed. Even if just Rs 520 crore is required, where will the money come from? One suggestion doing the rounds is that the railways, the Urban Development Ministry and the Delhi Administration chip in 2 per cent of their annual or seventh plan budgets for city transport systems, each of the four metropolises getting its share of the kitty. But this may not be enough to fund a rail transit system. And Narain admitted that "plan funds cannot meet this requirement. We will have to look for unconventional sources of money". At least one of the options being considered is to rope in the private sector to contribute the equipment and run the LRT. Scindia says that the idea is "very, very nebulous at the moment". Adds Narain: "We can avoid a monopoly situation."

Another question is who will run the system? The railways may be reluctant because they already lose Rs 85 crore every year on running the country's existing suburban systems. Another option: metropolitan transport bodies for various cities. Yet another committee is now studying the various alternatives.

Then, the project's four-year deadline seems optimistic. A shortage of funds and land acquisition problems have delayed Calcutta's metro for years, and delays can exact their own toll in the form of cost and passenger traffic estimates going awry. But the alternative is utter chaos on the roads. As the Delhi Administration official said last fortnight: "If the transport system doesn't work, it can paralyse a city. We have to do something before it is too late."

RELIANCE INDUSTRIES

Badly Bruised

THE Bombay stock exchange (BSE) buzzed with the rumour that Reliance had been raided, and the company's share price dropped. Eventually it was the exchange which was raided, but Reliance dropped further. For a scrip which was tipped to touch Rs 500 this Diwali, the Rs 218 it is being quoted at is very evidently a sign of hard times.

"Investors have lost confidence. Many of them are getting out," says BSE President R.L. Dalal. That is a plausible enough explanation for the dramatic drop in the price of a high-flying scrip which, at one stage, gave the impression that it could defy the law of gravity. And behind the lay shareholders' new perception of a flamboyant company is a host of factors, not the least of which is the fact that the company has apparently lost its clout with the Government. Several people in government who are supposed to be friends of Reliance have moved out, or been shifted to places from where they can be of little help.

But the place where it really counts is the bottom line. Reliance turned in handsome profits of Rs 71 crore last year, and the lion's share of this was from its polyester yarn operations. But yarn prices have since slumped, from a high of Rs 182 in March last year to a mere Rs 158.50 today. So Reliance's pickings will be substantially less than last year. Says the former president of the All India Crimper's Association, Jamnadas Moorjani: "The company will have virtually no profit." Moorjani is almost certainly over-stating the problem. But there is little doubt that Reliance's profits could be affected in the same manner that the rival Orkay's have been. "Orkay's latest results were a big disappointment," says Dalal candidly. "Reliance's fate may be similar."

Adding to the company's woes is the fact that the product from its new polyester staple fibre (PSF) plant at Patalganga ran into initial quality problems. For a stock-market that is already on tenterhooks because of the recent Rs 1 crore payment crisis and the raids, the spread of such information may well be reason enough to push the share down further.

Reliance itself is unfazed. "These are the teething troubles you face with a new plant," says Executive Director Anil Ambani. "We can't just throw away our initial production: things will improve very soon."

But things, ever since the Indian Express campaign against the company started early this year, have not been improving. Reliance had sought an issue of convertible debentures at a premium of Rs 190. But bear battering forced it to bring down this premium to Rs 115. The Government is yet to give the go-ahead even at this reduced level. Any further fall in the share price means that it will have to settle for a still lower figure. And the company is yet to hear from the Centre on its long-pending application for the share issue of its leasing venture.

To top it all, the Reliance plant for making purified terephthalic acid (PTA), expected to come on stream later this year, suffers from an excise disadvantage—despite intense lobbying by Reliance. Thus, while the alternative raw material for polyester production, di-methyl terephthalate (DMT), has no excise burden, PTA has been saddled with a 15 per cent impost. The Government is in the process of reviewing the matter, but the skeptics already feel that Murphy's Law has overtaken the company—anything that can go wrong will.

The stock-market is now rife with reports of internecine quarrels, and of a fight for control—since Chairman Dhirubhai Ambani has taken a back seat for health reasons. As a leading sharebroker says: "The market operates on rumours, and the rumours aren't good."

But rumours apart, it is the polyester price which is really going to make the difference. Reliance is the single biggest producer of polyester yarn. In July, for instance, of the total production of 7,440 tonnes, the Reliance contribution was 3,241 tonnes. The next on the list was Orkay with only 802 tonnes. The total 1985 Reliance production of 24,764 tonnes of partially-oriented polyester yarn is likely to be stepped up to 30,000 tonnes this year, and this should bring in an additional profit of Rs 6 crore. Besides, the PSF production of 80 tonnes a day—which started in August—should contribute another Rs 10 crore to the kitty. But given the fall in prices, leading stockbrokers estimate that the company's polyester operations should net some Rs 34 crore less than last year.

Reliance itself feels that its large production range is a cushion against the price fall. By suitably adjusting the product mix it can keep its head above water, which other, smaller companies are not in a position to do. Besides the PTA route to polyester is some 17 per cent more cost effective than DMT, neutralising the excise disadvantage. And in any case the company has written to the Government for the removal of excise duty. If a so far unfriendly government obliges, it should find Reliance very comfortably off by the year-end.

But at the moment, Reliance has taken a beating, and every day brings a new rumour to replace the last. Yesterday, for instance, the market wondered when the share would reach Rs 500. Today it ponders on whether it will drop to Rs 150. The crucial question is whether today's pessimism will prove as unfounded as yesterday's optimism.

THE MARKETS

Bear Hug

IT has been a cheerless Diwali for the stock-markets, with the fireworks being provided by tax raiders and brokers who have not been able to pay up when asked to. The Cabinet reshuffle didn't help matters: V.P. Singh remains where he was, in a position to bear down on the business and trading community, and the bulls don't like it a whit.

Reliance, whose fortunes have taken a bit of a beating, somewhat predictably led the retreat, losing Rs 50 in the space of just a week. By the end of the fortnight, the high-flying company's share price, at Rs 220, was barely 55 per cent of the year's peak of Rs 391. Smaller fortunes were lost on other counters too: Lakme, Larsen and Toubro, Ponds, Atlas Copco and others lost more than 10 per cent of their market value in just seven days of bear hammering. Even such favourites as Premier Automobiles and Kinetic Engineering lost heavily, as did J.K. Synthetics. And TISCO dropped below Rs 1,200 for the first time in several months. Inevitably, The Economic Times share price index plunged from 509.4 in early October to 484.2 three weeks later, most of the fall coming in the last week.

Chart by B K. SHARMA

With memories of payments problems to be erased, the after-tremors of the tax raids likely to last for some time, and the market already lacking in optimism without these unexpected setbacks, it will take a brave man to forecast another upturn for some time.

Meanwhile, questions were inevitably asked about the seeming lack of control over trading in the ring. The default by a broker who had accumulated over a million shares of Modi Rubber seemed to have caught the market authorities unawares, and their failure to declare him a defaulter and their decision to effect a compromise whereby he paid up less than his full dues did little credit to the market. Similarly, there was excessive speculation in Orkay and Premier Automobiles, with charges of insider trading surfacing yet again. Premier, in fact, crashed from Rs 990 to Rs 775 in just a few days, following leaked reports that the company faced a problem in selling its vehicles. With shenanigans such as this going on, it was small surprise that the taxmen decided to strike for the second time this year.

There might be a partial recovery in the immediate future as a natural adjustment process following the bear hammering of the last fortnight, but the outlook beyond that is none too good. The industrial growth rate has been dropping, the foreign exchange crunch gets increasingly obvious, and the next harvest will be poor because of the disappointing monsoons. The corporate sector can hardly remain unaffected by these macro-developments, and at some stage company results will begin to reflect the broader economic realities.

Conservative monetary and credit policy, a steady rate of inflation, a somewhat mild recovery in the price of gold and a relatively worsening balance of trade seem to be the highlights of the current economic situation, as seen from the events of the last fortnight .

All data are seasonally adjusted. The current trends are computed on the basis of six-months (weekly data) or two-years (monthly data) figures. Quarters in text refer to the calendar year quarters.

Stability in wholesale prices, customary in the last two years, continues. The inflation rate in 1986 will be just above 4 per cent.

Consumer prices were steady. The second quarter of 1986 showed a much smaller increase of 1.2%, compared to 3% in the first quarter.

Monetary policy reamins conservative. The RBI should take a more expansionary stance, given the remarkable stability in prices.

With commercial bank credit growing only at 11.6% p.a., the genuine needs of industry and trade may not be fully met.

With imports growing at 11.5 per cent p.a. and exports at 1.9 per cent, the balance of trade is affecting an otherwise healthy economy.

The decline in foreign exchange reserves was reversed in August and September, with an increase of 1.1 and 3.4 per cent respectively.

Of the 139 series considered, 102 of them with a total weight of 65.65 had a positive growth and 37 of them with a total weight of 20.976 had a negative growth.

The large drop in share prices between April and May has been arrested, but the future seems uncertain, especially due to the tax raids.

The fall in gold prices in September was shortlived. The yellow metal is back in business, with the festival season round the corner.

Unwed Mothers

IT is a theme as ancient as time itself: the chain of sexual misadventure, betrayal and denied motherhood. The tragedy of unwed motherhood in India harks back to Hindu mythology with the legend of Kunti who, made pregnant by the Sun God, ultimately had to abandon her first-born, Karna. For modern-day Kuntis, fate is no different—if anything, it is even more cruel. In the legend, Kunti goes on to marry and becomes a queen. But for the overwhelming majority of contemporary Indian women, unwed motherhood signals a catastrophic severance from traditional society and normal filial aspirations. Such women are too traumatised to want to be women again. Even worse is the fate of the children: unwanted, abandoned and more often than not, consigned to the garbage heaps of society. In short, nobody's babies.

But there is a flicker of hope in this scenario of despair. Social service organisations, like the Calcutta-based International Mission of Hope (IMH), are for the first time beginning to tackle the trauma of unwed mothers. The IMH has opened two centres—in Calcutta and Madras—to shelter unwed mothers and arrange for their children's future. The aim, as IMH founder Cherie Clark Prakash says, "is to restore the self-respect of these women and make them realise that they remain human beings capable of living life as any other woman."

That is no easy task. Progress is slow, and the results are often uncertain. But at least a beginning has been made in IMH's Calcutta home—Asha Kendra: each woman housed in this nondescript three-storeyed building tucked into a bylane in the city's Lake Gardens area is a testimony to the process.

Saba, 30, was taken in with the first batch of unwed mothers for the IMH programme launched this year. Abandoned by her sisters in an ashram in the suburbs of Calcutta where she was seduced by a local watchman, Saba found her way to Asha Kendra in May, when she was several months pregnant. Saba existed in a fantasy world where she was a ravishing beauty whom men found irresistible. In truth, she was a deformed hunchback, her half-crazed eyes more frightening than alluring. Recalls the head of Asha Kendra, Mamata Gupta: "Every time the baby moved inside her, she would whimper in terror and retreat into her fantasies." Today, after having finally delivered herself of her terrible burden last month, Saba is gradually gathering herself together, trying to return to normalcy. "I will earn my own living," she declares with striking determination. "And any man who tries to get funny will get a slap."

THE dominant emotion in all the mothers at Asha Kendra is fear and loathing at the experience that led them here. "The girls never talk about their experience directly," says Gupta. "Most of them concoct the most incredible stories to explain their pregnancy—one girl even claimed she became pregnant after swallowing medicine." At the root of this fiction is self-revulsion and a desire to erase memories, obvious from Saba's remark: "I don't know how this happened but I have learnt my lesson and it will never happen again."

Sometimes, the unmarried mothers at the Kendra are not women at all. Four of the girls at the Kendra were 15 years old or less, oblivious of the implications of motherhood but only too aware of being in some terrible trouble. "All four of these girls worked as maid servants and, although they will not talk about it, it is certain that they were sexually exploited by the males in the households where they worked," says Gupta. One of the girls, 15-year-old Basanti Mondal, claimed she had been raped but Gupta found it was the man of the house where she had worked who was responsible. Even after the pregnancy, he wanted Basanti back, but Gupta whisked the girl back to her village.

Debjani, another 15-year-old at the Kendra, senses she has been abused and misused: "I came to Calcutta on my own because I wanted to work instead of studying," she explains in her touching, almost childlike lisp. "Now I will return to my village in Diamond Harbour, I will never work again and only study." Debjani does not even think about the baby growing inside her, and her sole desire right now is to get rid of the unwelcome swelling in her belly as fast as possible and return to the security of her home in the village where, incidentally, her family is still ignorant of her condition.

The thought of looking after their child just does not occur to these young teenagers. "How can I look after a child? I am a child myself," asks Anwara Khatun plaintively. Anwara's is one of the most tragic cases at the Kendra. Believed to have been used as a prostitute in one of Calcutta's notorious red-light districts, this 14-year-old frock-clad girl had learnt of no way of living other than by amusing men and selling herself. "I can dance very well," she would boast, and soon after the delivery returned to her mother in the red-light district, resigned to being a child used by men for their pleasures.

men, the emotional bonds with the baby growing inside them have been long broken. "The girls generally have extremely easy, pain-free deliveries," remarks Gupta. "And they are not even curious to see the babies." The Kendra's workers do not encourage the girls to breast-feed their babies either, in order to prevent mother-child attachment from developing.

WHEN Mona Das, an 18-year-old Oriya girl, arrived at the Kendra, she was weeping disconsolately, unable to believe that she would be able to lead a normal life again. Abandoned at Howrah Station by a boy she had loved and expected to marry, Mona had been rejected by her relatives in Calcutta when they found she was pregnant. But finally, when she was made to understand that life did not end with broken love and an illegitimate baby, Mona recovered quickly. Last month she had a normal delivery and returned to the Kendra the very next day, offering to stay on and work for the Kendra's programme.

Unwed motherhood is cataclysmic when the emotional bond with the unborn baby is strong and the mother has to abandon the baby for economic or social reasons. Every week unwed mothers from all over the city arrive at IMH's offices in New Alipore to leave their babies behind. "For these women who have wanted a child but have either been betrayed or deserted, the final wrench can leave a permanent psychological scar," says Cherie Prakash. These women have felt all the pains of motherhood, the insistent tuggings of the baby and have dreamed of leading a normal married life.

"I keep explaining to people that the majority of unwed mothers are not rape victims or whores or loose women but simply girls who had all the aspirations of their sex," says Prakash. "Even if a woman survives the trauma of having to give up a baby she wanted, what finally destroys her is the inability to return to the society she came from." Some like Pratibha, a convent-educated graduate from Madras, are lucky to get employment in the IMH itself, which is still mainly an adoption service. Pratibha's family refused to keep her after she got pregnant and the man she was living with refused to marry her. Realising that she could not give the baby a proper life, she offered him for adoption and decided to take up a job at the IMH.

An average of 80 unwanted babies are brought to IMH's Calcutta office—and some 90 per cent of the babies are delivered by unwed mothers. "Most of these women come into Calcutta from district towns and admit themselves under an assumed married name," says one of the house staff in the Government hospital in Calcutta. These women deliver their babies secretly and slink back to their mofussil homes, their fates lost in the avalanche of mundane tragedies.

Baby with nurse: alone in the world

BUT at least the unwanted children today can get a better life than anything their unfortunate mothers could provide. A number of adoption services in the city, including the IMH, have now organised placement services for these unwanted children (for a price, of course—and it is a paying proposition). Most of the children are sent to the United States and Europe—of late even to a few Indian families. When the IMH was started in 1978, most doctors and hospitals were suspicious and babies trickled in ones and twos every month. Today, the IMH alone sends more than 300 babies abroad.

The babies, many of whom are premature (suspected late abortion cases), are kept in a well-maintained nursery for a few months and offered first to Indian couples for adoption. "Just keeping some of the babies alive is a problem as they are incredibly small and undernourished when they come to us," says Prakash. Protected in cabins with ultra-violet light and watched over by doctors, the babies at the Mission of Hope have an amazing survival rate and grow up healthy and uncomplicated.

But the problem of unwed motherhood remains and grows as sexual relations become freer in society. "The principal sufferers unfortunately are the poor, the uneducated lower class girls, most of whom have no scientific notion of what menstruation is all about," points out Gupta. Adds Mrs V. Dutt, counsellor at the Marie Stopes Abortion Clinic in Calcutta: "The educated middle class girl today has no problems about pregnancy—95 per cent of them arrive in time and have an abortion without any psychological side-effects." While abortion cases have risen considerably—from 974 in 1979 to 15,024 in 1985 (at the Calcutta Marie Stopes Clinic)—so has unwed motherhood in the slums of Calcutta and the district towns of West Bengal. And it is only the lucky ones who find their way to places like the Asha Kendra.

KEOLADEO BIRD SANCTUARY

Fired by Drought

HARI OM GULATI

Forest guards engaged in fire-fighting operations

THE fire was sudden. Its origins mysterious. A total of 108 hectares of verdant grassland at the world-famous Keoladeo Bird Sanctuary near Bharatpur in Rajasthan was reduced to a blackened and scarred ruin in a matter of hours. But as forest officials took stock of the damage last fortnight, there was some cause for relief. Wildlife had escaped unscathed, no lives were lost and the area affected was negligible—far less than similar fires that cut a swathe through 3 sq km of the sanctuary last year.

How it started and where exactly it began will have to await the findings of two inquiries currently underway. The first alarm was sounded by a forest guard in the Koladhar area at 11.30 a.m. on October 15, alerted by the pungent odour of smoke. Initially, it appeared the blaze would be quickly brought under control. Using asbestos sheets attached to long wooden poles to beat the flames with and fire extinguishers, the fire-fighters worked with clockwork precision till the weather decided to play a hand. High velocity winds turned the flames into a raging inferno and when it looked like crossing the fire-lines—carefully laid to prevent such an eventuality—and spreading to other areas, the local administration called in fire tenders from the Bharatpur ammunition depot of the army and units from as far away as Agra, Jaipur and Alwar.

Fortunately the fire-line was not crossed and by 6 p.m. that day, the fire had been put out. Welcome rains on October 17 eased fears of another conflagration but Rajan Mathur, deputy chief wildlife warden, confessed he was puzzled by the whole affair. As he pointed out: "October is much too early for a fire. The season is normally December-January when the grass has completely dried up. The problem is that nobody has come forward to give any evidence which would help us in our investigations."

Park officials were not discounting the possibility of the fire having been deliberately started. Suspicion centred on the 12 villages lying all around the park—there have been recurrent instances of villagers climbing over the 5-ft high wall which encloses the park to cut grass for their cattle.

While a parallel investigation by the state development commissioner is underway, the park officials are now strengthening fire precautions throughout the 29 sq km area of the sanctuary. Besides round-the-clock patrolling by forest guards, bore wells are being dug all over the park to obviate the need for fire tenders to make the arduous trip over dirt tracks to the centre of the sanctuary to draw water.

A more immediate problem, says Mathur, "is the worst water crisis we have had in years". For the first time in recent history, the sanctuary runs the danger of its marshes drying up by the end of December or early January. Poor rainfall around Jaipur and Sawai Madhopur, from where the Banganga and Ghambir rivers drain floodwaters into the Ajan reservoir in Bharatpur, has reduced the water levels in the 11 sq km of lakes to dangerously low levels.

The Irrigation Department is being asked to provide more water but they have none to give. Artesian wells are being tapped to provide water in areas where the birds are in need but as Mathur helplessly admitted: "You can fill a puddle or two artificially, not an entire marsh." Plans have been mooted for bringing in water from the Pachna dam, 100 km away in Karoli district, but its feasibility remains in doubt.

Barely 300 egg-laden nests have been spotted compared to 1,500 in 1985 and over 200 varieties of birds ranging from egrets to storks and cormorants have postponed breeding. The showpiece of the sanctuary—the Siberian crane—is due only in early December but forest officials say the birds might fly away by the end of January when the water table dips to its lowest level. Worse still, most of the migratory birds that come here are vegetarians. They feed on a particular kind of grass found in the marshes and once this reed dries up, they are unlikely to stay. The Department of Environment in New Delhi has been informed of the gravity of the situation but no solution has been forthcoming. Bharatpur is giving more than its share of sleepless nights to ornithologists.

NATIONAL CULTURAL FESTIVAL

Ethnic Extravaganza

IF the people ask for bread, give them a mela. The greater the hunger, the bigger the mela. The three-week orgy of festivity—an overflowing smorgasbord of culture called the National Cultural Festival—begins in Delhi on November 8. With a budget of Rs 5-crore and a performing cast of over 4,000 artistes from all over the country ("the budget of a multi-starrer", says one of the cultural impresarios), India's ethnic Woodstock will either be a magnificent success or a magnificent failure.

Culture to the galis of Delhi is the theme song of this festival. Quite simply: take culture to the people. The folk artistes from India's seven newborn zonal centres (three of them yet to be baptised) are going to be lodged in an army camp at Khanpur, on the outskirts of Delhi. For the performers, the festival is a quantum leap into the 21st century—data concerning each of them and their respective arts will be fed into a computer and constituted into a "resource bank" to be drawn upon in future.

The best focus on the festival is the rather mystical number of seven. The country has been carved into seven cultural zones. Each zone has been given Rs 30 lakh for the grand manifestation of Delhi chalo, part of the roughly Rs 70 crore that has been earmarked for the seven centres in the current five-year plan. Since culture has gone to the maidan, there are going to be seven mukhya (chief) maidans in November, and seven gates to get to them. The festival has seven themes and the seven colours of the rainbow—one colour for each zonal centre. Delhi, appropriately enough, has seven parliamentary constituencies.

The extravaganza is supposed to take off catalysed by each of the cultural cauldrons of the seven zonal centres (Udaipur, Shantiniketan, Allahabad, Patiala, Thanjavur, Dimapur and Nagpur). But it appears that the cultural cauldrons are not yet on the boil; the fires not quite lit under them in the hurry to have the November festival, which will be an annual feature in Delhi.

Still, the zones may yet blossom. Lucknow has had a mini-manifestation, as has Faridkot with the Baba Farid Festival. But headed as they are by bureaucrats, there are no great expectations from these places. The big bash may end up more like a Republic Day pageant in slow motion. In fact, the ideal time would have been near Republic Day, when the performers would have been in Delhi anyway.

The national cultural festival and the zonal centres are the brain-children of the prime minister who, according to the report of the committee of the National Cultural Festival, has emphasised the need for "awareness and participation at the grass-roots level and the need to involve the people in a sense of cultural commonality". In other words, culture should be brought out of the museums. J.P. Aggarwal, MP and chairman of the organising committee of the festival, says: "We have forgotten the poor. What is their life apart from roti-rozi?" And so to the banks of the Jamuna, the neon-lit capital beckons.

The magician for the occasion is Rajeev Sethi, the director-general of the festival, who has an all-purpose wand which can conjure manifestations of culture, and dazzle. Says Sethi: "There should be a 20-point programme for culture." He believes that the festival "should be looked upon as a training centre, a shaking-up exercise for the zonal centres which are too new. We do need a certain amount of preparedness to catapult us into spontaneity. Spontaneity as an excuse for the lack of organisation is not spontaneity".

Imagination has certainly been given a long leash. The festival opens with a big bang. The prime minister is supposed to visit each zonal centre, following which each zonal group will form into processions and become "a stream of lit torches converging on the lawns of the Red Fort around twilight". The seven zonal centres will then form a rainbow. The climax of the evening: 4,000 white pigeons will be released, one each by the 4,000 participants. Inside the festival ground, a forest of lamps, symbolic of the tree of life, will come alive with each participant lighting a lamp. There will be food pavilions, handicrafts and textiles from each state. Mingling in the grand moving bazaar will be acrobats, jugglers, magicians and puppets. The overture to the festival is called Bharat Milan—Dilli Mein Desh Ka Pravesh (India comes to Delhi).

And the curtain rings down with Manthan: Dilli se Desh Tak (From Delhi to the country). The Indira Gandhi Indoor Stadium will resound with music, even its expansive lawns. The grande finale: all the participants will move towards the Jamuna River, on which they will float lighted lamps. The absolute end: an all-night concert on the banks of the river. Some of the special events sound unique. Goonjte Pathar (echoing stones) brings together ancient monuments and forgotten maestros, albeit with a message: Birju Maharaj dancing at Abdul Rahim Khanekhana's tomb followed by an audio-visual on the monument; action painting by the peripatetic M.F. Husain in the south Delhi colony of Hauz Khas; the Calcutta youth choir singing Gospel rock in front of old churches; Madhavi Mudgal dancing in front of Jantar Mantar, "showing the measure of the cosmos—the sun, the moon, and the stars—against the measure of man". There will also be an all-night concert in Suraj Kund, across the border in Haryana. Yet another original concept is the Khas Bagh (special garden). There will be four cultural Hyde Parks where poets and players will share the platform.

The festival is also a big birthday party; in fact two. The two special days are the birth anniversaries of Jawaharlal Nehru and Indira Gandhi. November 14 each year is for children, and this year even more so: kite-makers will make and fly kites and then present these to the children. Communal cooking follows with a contribution of ek-ek-muthi (individual handfuls) of grain from each home. The children's brigade will take a pledge against child marriage and dowry and be given a certificate for their participation in the event. Each child will be given a green khaki jacket for a Haree Sena (green army) which will be launched on November 19, Mrs Gandhi's birthday—which from now on is Environment Day. Spic-Macay, which has been taking Indian culture to students, will also be active.

Culture is on the move, but the engine has a political make. The division of the country into seven cultural zones, a cultural map super-imposed on the linguistic one which has been straining at its boundaries, might in concept be a good idea. But the line between populism and culture easily blurs. Says Sethi: "It would be populism if the elite was handing down. But seeing the energy coming up from all our mohalla maidans, I would say that it is an elitist remark to say populist."

Some 10,000 letters have come in response to the advertisement for a name, theme and slogan for the happening. Most are about unity in diversity. Says Sethi: "If we can have logos for Pepsi and Maggi, why not culture?"

Whatever happens in November, culture has become a buzzword for our politicians. A few years ago, Ranjit Singh Gaekwad, MP, had asked all the members of the Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha to send two entries representative of culture in their constituencies, for an exhibition to be inaugurated by the prime minister. Only three entries came in. Would they now dare?

Erotic Feast

LOVE, SEX AND DANGER
by SUDHIR KAKAR & JOHN M. ROSS
Oxford University Press
Price: Rs 140; Pages: 249

YOU can have sex without love but there can be no love without sex. Denis de Rougemont maintained that both unalloyed sex as well as sexless attachment become tedious; the one degenerates into pornography, the other into parable. Psycho-analyst Sudhir Kakar (The Inner World and Shamans, Mystics and Doctors) and John M. Ross accept this assumption as well as Freud's assertion that fear is an essential ingredient of love. "Our book title tells it all," they affirm, "the inevitable triad: love, sex and danger."

Isn't every sexual intercourse a repetition of much the same sort of exercise performed in bed by two parties? No, assert the authors: "each erotic act and actor is unique." The novelist Milan Kundera explains this unquenchable thirst for new sexual experiences in The Unbearable Lightness of Being. He says that in every sexual encounter "there is always the small part that is unimaginable. When he saw a woman in her clothes, he could naturally imagine more or less what she would look like naked.... And then the pursuit of the unimaginable does not stop with the revelation of nudity: it goes much farther. How would she behave while undressing? What would she say when he made love to her? How would her sighs sound? How would her face distort at the moment of orgasm?"

To illustrate their theme the authors have chosen 12th century love epics from three cultures: Indian-Hindu, Perso-Islamic and European. They start with stories of adolescent love: Romeo and Juliet. Laila and Majnu (with Punjabi folk tales Sohni-Mahiwal and Heer-Ranjha thrown in), Radha and Krishna. Thereafter they deal with adulterated love of mature men and women in which wives cuckold their husbands, fathers seduce their daughters and siblings engage in incestuous intimacy.

Shorn of the psycho-analytical jargon there is a lot of fascinating information in this book which will shock prudes and wound the susceptibilities of the devout. Though lawmakers condemned adultery as a crime punishable with death, the adulterous liaison between the older, married Radha and Krishna, and Krishna's dalliance with countless milkmaids roused Indian poets and painters to ecstatic heights. In the Indian poet-dramatists' world women were divided into three categories: courtesans (veshyas), wives (svakiyas) and "others" (parakiyas). The last category was further sub-divided into young girls (kanyakas) and married women (parodhas). Of these only one, the parodha i.e. another man's wife, could give love its full expression, mingling illicit passion with danger of discovery. They quote a Sanskrit poet in support:

So there are women who attract with their loose ways prostitutes and there is the deep shyness of one's own wife the most beautiful and most graceful showing her love opening flower
but who in this world can fill one with joy like another man's wife loving with naked breast.

Despite censors of morals it was the love of Radha and Krishna that became the driving force behind the Bhakti cult. Bhaktas visualised themselves as females longing to be ravished by their lover god (Pritam). The devotee found fulfilment in the same way as a woman in orgasmic ecstacy. Krishna became the paradigm of Indian lovers because his love-making never ended in an orgasm; he was Acyuta, the one whose seed does not fall. He gave continuous (nitya) pleasure to Radha and the gopis none of whom got impregnated by him.

The book ends with an attempt at a synthesis and summary of the different kinds of erotic love spelt out in the epics. The authors have chosen Russo-American novelist Vladimir Nabokov's autobiography Speak Memory to trace its development through the life of one man whose passion was collecting butterflies—from the caterpillar to the silken butterfly flitting among flowers before it is pinned on a board for preservation.

The layman may find the analytical part of the authors' treatise somewhat far-fetched and indigestible. Nevertheless, he will thoroughly enjoy the feast laid out for him. It is informative, thought-provoking and unputdownable.

COMMERCIALS

The Golden Voices

THEY are truly the hidden persuaders. The anonymous voices on radio and television commercials enticing listeners to buy the products they are plugging. But even in the cacophony of commercial jingles, there is one voice, rich and authoritative, that dominates the rest, selling everything from Marutis to Johnson's Baby Powder. Awe-struck advertising executives, as usual, have a phrase for it. They call it 'The voice of God'.

In a sense, Partap ('Pat') Sharma is a god—of the air waves. Virtually every English language commercial currently being aired on Doordarshan is signed off by a voice that has now become as familiar to television viewers as their own—the voice of Pat Sharma. Already, in Bombay's booming television commercial industry, Sharma has acquired an unmatched reputation. "His is one of the best voices in the world. I don't think there will be anything comparable to him for a long time," says the creative head of a large advertising agency.

To millions of television households, Sharma is just a familiar voice on the box. But to a vast majority of advertisers, it is a voice in a million. Most advertisers insist that their agencies get Sharma for their commercials at any cost. So heavy is the demand for his time that the commentator, sometimes exhausted from zipping from one recording studio to another in his Mercedes, has been forced to book a studio himself and ask the clients to show up at appointed hours. Once, a desperate advertiser armed with a tape-recorder even pursued Sharma to Mahabaleshwar where he was holidaying with his English wife Susan and their children.

Sharma, almost single-handedly, has given commercial commentating a new elevated status and financial independence. Sharma is paid a minimum of Rs 1,000 for a 30-second commercial spot. For 10 months' work, recording commercials and audio-visuals, he grosses a tidy Rs 2-lakh annually, half of which goes, he says, in travel, telephone bills, research and the cost of maintaining a fully-staffed office near his sea-side flat in Bombay.

"Initially I would be exhausted emotionally and mentally," confesses Sharma, "but I wanted to give social status to commentary. Before my time commercial commentators did not command so much respect." But his work on commercials and audio-visual slide presentations by companies also allows Sharma to pursue his other interests—writing, acting and in the last few months, producing an ambitious television serial sponsored by BBC's Channel four on the Raj, seen through Indian eyes.

Success, however, has not come all that easily. Sharma has always been something of a non-conformist. His first full-time job was as a junior executive at Esso where he lasted exactly 12 days because, as he says, he found a nine-to-five job too constricting. Having rejoined the freelance circuit, he was once asked to read the prologue to a Tennesse Williams play in Bombay where pioneering commentator Ameen Sayani was present. Sayani, impressed with the voice and presentation, sent Sharma off to Films Division for an audition where he began his career as a commentator. "Those were tough days. Often my monthly income used to be Rs 75. But I was determined to make it on my own," he says.

Sharma soon established himself as a leading films division commentator while also pursuing his other interests like theatre, the odd film role (he played the hero in Phir Bhi), modelling and writing plays and children's books.

With the kind of success that has made Sharma an advertising legend in a comparatively short period of time, and despite the increase in the number of commercials and audio-visuals being made in recording studios mushrooming all over Bombay, it is surprising that the world of

LOUIS BANKS

Hot Tracks

FROM the smoke-filled night-clubs of Calcutta to the sound-proofed recording studios of Bombay has been a lengthy, if lucrative, transition for Louis Banks. In the '70s, playing with his band at the Blue Fox in Calcutta, pianist Banks had rapidly acquired a reputation as a jazz musician of great promise, who made international inroads when he toured Europe and cut the fusion record Sangam in West Germany.

Banks, stroking his trademark goatee and recalling those heady, jazz-filled days, says: "It was impossible to survive playing jazz in Calcutta, what with the power shortage and the political situation. So I packed my electric piano and came down to Bombay." That was in 1978, and Banks ended up like other struggling musicians in the orchestra pits of the Hindi film industry. He soon became a full-time member of R.D. Burman's film music ensemble.

But his talent and originality ensured that it couldn't last. "Jazz is my first love and Hindi film music is basically very restricting," he says. "So I put my band together again and we started playing at the Sea Rock. But the pace was too hectic, playing nights at the hotel and during the day at a film studio, so I gave it up after a year." By now, however, Banks had begun to acquire a sizeable following from his concerts and the Jazz Yatra. To move on to the advertising world was only natural.

Today, Banks is the most sought-after composer for commercials, anonymously providing the lilting tunes that invade countless homes. Composers earn between Rs 6,000 and Rs 8,000 per commercial. Banks can demand upto Rs 10,000 per composition. Says Suresh Mullick, Creative Director of Ogilvy, Benson and Mather: "It is musicians like Banks who have brought a modern flair to advertising music."

"I am really into advertising commercials, TV serials and film shows," says Banks. "In the beginning I had problems but now I relate to visuals a lot. I can think of a story-line and the action when I score music." Victor Banerjee's August Requiem marked his debut as a music director in cinema. Its moving, semi-classical score brought Banks his second film score—for Ramesh Sharma's New Delhi Times, and led to his most widely acclaimed film compositions—for Amal and Nissar Allana's TV serial Raj Se Swaraj.

Even as Banks bashfully acknowledges his liking for "these arty films", he is fast acquiring repute in scoring background music in Hindi films, which he has already done for Kala Dhanda Goray Log and Hukumat. HMV will soon release an album of Hindi songs, sung by Alisha Chinoy with music by Banks.

But Banks still has one hand firmly on the jazz chords. "Composing music for commercials is challenging and, of course, quite lucrative. But I must not lose myself," he says. "I must stay active writing and playing the kind of music I enjoy. That's why I do a lot of stage musicals—Paper Dolls, Bottoms Up, Tarantula Tanzi, and now Pearl Padamsee's The Wiz."

Banks is best known, however, as India's foremost jazz musician and it can't be long before Jazz reclaims its prodigal son. "Wait and see, I might soon be able to get a jazz club and another workshop going," he says spooning spaghetti hurriedly from a little tiffin box. But jazz fans will have to wait. To advertisers, Banks is 'hot' and his popularity spells, well, money in the banks.

television commercials is still largely under-populated. In English commercials, Sharma is the dominating figure with Nirmala Mathan and Sarita Sethi being the most commonly heard female voices. In Hindi again, it is mainly the ubiquitous voice of Brij Bhushan that dominates most commercials.

Versatile veterans like Ameen Sayani and Vinod Sharma offer two main reasons for the lack of new talent—the general standard of affinity with languages is dropping in India, and young people are not prepared to put in the hard work and training required to develop a good commentator's voice. "Once, I had started classes in my home in voice training," says Vinod Sharma (Vicks ki goli lo, kich kich door karo), "but after a few months the students would imagine they had gained enough proficiency and drop out."

THAT also explains why Partap Sharma is the reigning king of commercials. A thorough professional with limitless energy, Sharma says that he will not record a commentary even if there is one word in the script which he does not understand. "This means a little more preparation, but a commentator must love and understand the subject to speak with authority," he adds. Sharma feels that many good radio voices have not been able to adapt to the visual media, where the voice demands greater use of the imagination. He also believes that many young people do not have what he calls "the courage of their talent"—a successful commentator has to freelance, and not everyone, he points out, is prepared to take that risk.

One young commentator who has taken the plunge is Nikhil Kapoor, 23, who recently threw up a job with Mudra Videotech to strike out on his own. "It's a very tough profession to break into," he says, "Partap is first class and has all the advertisers by the short hair. But three months ago when he left town to work on his TV serial I suddenly started getting a lot of assignments. Now some advertisers keep coming back to me, and on a good day I average about six commercials and audio-visuals."

Besides Kapoor, the other promising young voice in English commercial commentary is that of Uday Mathan, son of the well-known commentator Nirmala Mathan. Then there are the older professionals from theatre and TV—Homi Daruwala, Ronnie Screwwala, Keith Stevenson and Harish Bhimani. But all the other commentators are usually paid much less than Sharma, with the lowest earning around Rs 350 for a spot.

Despite the increase in the number of commercials and audio-visuals being made, it is surprising that the world of television commercials is still largely under-populated.

The Hindi commercial scene is more competitive even though Brij Bhushan, like Sharma, is the dominating deity. Bhushan, however, maintains that it is not that easy any more to stay on top and bag all the plum assignments. With the boom in commercial TV, he says, there are now 67 active male voices in Hindi in Bombay, of which at least 30 are full time professionals.

Like other veterans in the profession, Bhushan is also a man of many talents. Having started his career as a radio announcer at the age of 14, he has acted in Hindi films, been a music director, runs his own recording studio and has just produced a film with his wife Madhur, younger sister of Madhubala, as the heroine. "All these youngsters are breathing down our necks now," he says candidly, "but anybody new coming up should take care not to copy me or Partap. They should try and evolve something of their own."

Curiously, despite the variety of products advertised through commercials, the medium continues to be male-dominated with only a handful of women, like Nirmala Mathan and Sarita Sethi, being able to establish themselves. "It is an outdated feeling that only a male voice has authority," says Mathan. "If a voice has conviction you can sell a product. How can a male voice ever be suitable for baby powder or lipstick?"

Despite the discrimination, and the stranglehold exerted by people like Sharma and Bhushan, the television commercial scene is gearing for even bigger things. More than 30 per cent of agency budgets for brand advertising are now being spent on TV commercials, and the share is expected to go up to 50 per cent by 1990. With the boom have emerged more demanding advertisers, classier productions, and more money for commentators. But the nature of the work is such that the voice must perforce remain anonymous—unless of course, it is the voice of god.

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

Body & Soul: bare cause

◆ For the hungry, the deaf-mute, the disabled and half-clothed children of Maharashtra, Manna descended from the heavens last fortnight in a swirl of petticoats and a swish of silks—bearing such creme de fashion labels as Dior and Cardin, Saint Laurent and Nina Ricci, Givenchy and a score others. Choreographed by Floid of Hot Gossip and produced by Natalia Maxim of England for the PRIDE of India—Planning Rural-urban Integrated Development through Education—Body and Soul swept through Bombay, Delhi, Calcutta, Madras and Bangalore, baring lots of body but precious little soul. There were striped and sequined blondes with their slips showing, pigeon-chested males who handled them like rag dolls and brazen hussies wanting to walk the wild side. Explained PRIDE India Vice-President Sunil Dutt: "We want to draw the urban elite into rural growth. And this is the best way to do it." By baring the body and sparing the soul?

◆ The picture is cute: one prime minister on the back of another. And the foreword reads: "She was full of games and puzzles. She knew a great deal about history....and about trees and birds." So it goes on, with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi chatting up the readers: all strictly below 14. Released recently, Indira Gandhi is a book for kids by one who knew her: her information adviser—and now her son's—H.Y. Sharada Prasad. "I never really planned it," says the author. "The publishers, Ladybird, asked me and I did it." It isn't a biography, he says. "It's just a story for kids who don't really know her—as a little girl, as a mother and a leader." So after Chacha Nehru, it's Indira Aunty.

NAMAS BHOJANI

Aman: Zeenie's baby

◆ She was seen waddling around in a smock, knitting needles in hand, in that notorious Irma la Douce remake of the '70s, Manoranjan. After so many years, two marriages and a sagging career, Zeenat Aman finally delivered last fortnight. The bonnie little baby boy, all wrinkles and 6 lb 9 oz, burst into the world squealing at pa Mazhar Khan, who had held the mother's hand throughout. "It was a normal delivery. She was very cooperative and did not make a fuss," said the doctor at the private clinic. The nurses were thereafter kept on their toes, tending to the baby and keeping snoopy reporters at bay. Pestilence, however, paid off when through the mists of the very next morning, the lady could be seen taking a stroll on the lawns, cooing and humming to her baby boy. "It's a dream come true," whispered Zeenie baby in a trance, and quickly walked back indoors, taking her baba away from the prying paparazzi.

◆ No wings for the 'Flying Fairy'. No wands either. No sir, nothing less than a Standard 2000, all sleek and blue and gift-wrapped. For P.T. Usha, October will from now on mean the month of bubbly and flowers. And congratulations and cars. When India's golden girl returned from the Seoul Asiad with four golds around her neck and hundreds of Korean hearts in her pocket, it was to a heroine's welcome. The first bouquet came with a Standard 2000, a gift from the Kerala Government, along with Rs 3 lakh in cash, besides Rs 6.5 lakh from the Government of India. And the laurels kept streaming in: a lakh rupees here and ten lakh there, a three-tier promotion from the Railways, and roses roses all the way. "All thanks to Lord Guruvayurappan," beamed India's ray of hope, as she went round Guruvayur lighting oil lamps and offering her weight in sugar. Success, of course, has no other taste but sweet.

The Second Honeymoon

The Indian Government pulled out all stops for last week's highly publicised visit by Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. The timing was significant. Events concerning regional security in recent weeks have given India added impetus to reaffirm its ties with the USSR.

COVER STORY 90

On a Slippery Slope

Last fortnight when the Congress(I) lost its fifth consecutive by-election in Orissa, it left Chief Minister J.B. Patnaik weaker than ever before. Already under attack from half his legislators, many ministers and MP's, Patnaik has battles on many fronts ahead.

CURRENT EVENTS 24

Suspended Animation

SPECIAL REPORT 79

Enigmatic First Lady

For the first time since Independence, the country has a visible First Lady in Sonia Gandhi. And of late, curiosity about her role in Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's life is growing. What status does she enjoy? Does she advise and influence her husband's politics?

SPECIAL FEATURE 82

Institutional Muscle

The crucial meeting of shareholders in Shaw Wallace turned out sensational results. While the adversaries were company boss S.P.Acharya and the Chhabrias, who were attempting a take-over, it was the Government's financial institutions that won the day.

BUSINESS 135

The Male Migration

Perhaps no other part of India has seen migration on a larger scale than the hills of Kumaon and Garhwal in Uttar Pradesh. So dramatic is this phenomenon, spurred by unemployment, that, in village after village, there are few able-bodied men to be found.

STRANGE BEDFELLOWS

Your report on Jammu and Kashmir ("Coalition Government: Will it Work?", November 30) was both informative and forceful. It seems that the Congress(I) and the National Conference(Farooq) alliance is going to be another fiasco, notwithstanding the present euphoria of their new friendship and their audacious proclamations of unity, fraternity and goodwill.

Deogarh — M. KANTI

■ Politics is a strange game. It turns arch rivals into chums overnight, backbiters into sycophants, and people of dubious integrity into great nationalists. This is at least evident from the deal struck between Rajiv and Farooq. However it is doubtful how far the (noble) intentions of the two leaders will help in restoring stability to the state.

Lucknow — NARENDRA M. PANT

■ If anything, it is the yearning for power which has tempted Farooq Abdullah to come to terms with the Congress(I), which was previously responsible for toppling the democratically elected government of the former in 1984. The contention of the two parties that it was the spurt of anti-national and secessionist forces which has forced them to come to terms is flimsy and specious, as it was their political skullduggery and dithering which had caused instability in the state.

Ahmedabad — M.V. RAVINDRAN

■ The joining of forces between Rajiv Gandhi and Farooq Abdullah has come as a whiff of fresh air. Though the accord doesn't guarantee the much required political stability in the state, it will definitely suffuse the air in Kashmir with hope and infallibility.

Bangalore — K. CHIDANAND KUMAR

TRUE GRIT

If Arun Nehru ("Arun Nehru: Life Without Power", November 30) had to be relieved of his portfolio because he could not see eye to eye with the prime minister and many others in his coterie, he deserves admiration for the courage he displayed in sticking to his guns. In a country where politics is simply the game of being a yes-man to the prime minister, Nehru's "hardline approach" and unwavering stance on political issues is a welcome change.

Delhi — RITU SAHAI MATHUR

FINDING FAULT

It is a pity that such an important religious leader like Shankaracharya ("Shankaracharya: "Rajiv is a Good Raja", November 30) holds such narrow views on religion. He should have accepted the fact that the Hindu religion has many drawbacks and talked more about their eradication instead of finding faults in other religions.

Ludhiana — PRABHIJEET SINGH

SOFT POLITICIAN

I agree with your contention ("Comment: Pining for Mrs Gandhi", November 30) that Indira was a good politician but not a good statesman. I also agree that nobody can be perfect. Yet Rajiv Gandhi should acknowledge some of the mistakes that his mother made and make efforts not to repeat them.

Delhi — PRABHAKAR S. HARSOLE

■ It is true that Rajiv Gandhi is a soft politician. However, the general mood in the country is that one can do anything and get away with it, given either power or money. Rajiv must understand that soft options to the myriad problems facing the country do not in the long run have a lasting value.

Delhi — MANOJ KUMAR GUPTA

CULTURAL MELA

Your article ("Apna Utsav: Mixed Success", November 30) gives only a fleeting view of the variety of programmes that were going on in different parts of Delhi. Viewing the programmes on TV, one feels that in the effort to bridge the gap between the performers and the audience there was hardly any attempt to plan out the programmes in an orderly fashion.

■ In spite of its numerous detractors, Apna Utsav provided an opportunity for the dancers and other performers from different parts of the country to interact and understand each other.

Jamshedpur — B.N BOSE

■ Apna Utsav has been the greatest cultural event of the century. What little could be seen on Doordarshan has left a lasting impression on the viewers: a veritable feast of song, dance, and music. The mela should be a permanent event in the cultural calendar of the country.

Pune — D.B.N. MURTHY

SORRY VERDICT

Your report on the judiciary ("Controversial Appointments", November 30) was commendable. If merit or meritocracy becomes the first casualty in political manipulations we have come to a sorry state. But the article might act as a corrective and stop the spread of the rot that is setting in.

Chandigarh — MANGU RAM GUPTA

■ The disclosures are very revealing and show that when the chief ministers, chief justices, prime minister and the chief justice of the Supreme Court view each candidate's appointment from different angles, the result is the present state of affairs. Judges' chairs remain vacant for years together.

Basantnagar — S. RAGHOTHAMA RAO

■ It is shocking that political considerations decide appointments of judges. How will these judges be expected to uphold the traditions of their position after having manipulated themselves into the post.

Patna — ASHUTOSH GUPTA

UNIQUE GAUGE

Opinions Today ("Clear Preferences", November 30) was a unique experience. For the first time we had an opportunity to gauge where we stood in relation to the opinions of the thinking majority with reference to policies and issues of vital importance.

Delhi — IQBAL AHMAD

REAL THREAT

Pakistan's proposed acquisition of AWACS and M 1 tanks ("Danger in the Skies", November 30) from the US does cause much concern, but neither are invincible. The AWACS can also be countered by acquiring either the AEW Nimrod or the TU-126 Moss. But Pakistan's nuclear programme is more disturbing. If they are 'two screwdriver turns' away from making a nuclear bomb, India should reconsider its nuclear options.

Bombay — SANJEEV S. MEHTA

PLOTTING POLITICIANS

Referring to the article on Ahmedabad ("A Wounded City", November 30) it is plotting politicians who do their bit to heighten feelings of communalism. Underneath all the madness, a feeling of oneness and brotherhood continues to exist between Hindus and Muslims in this city.

Ahmedabad — KETAN YAGNIK

LOVING TEACHER

In your article ("Teaching in Tihar", November 15) you have left out the names of some of the donors. I am so deeply grateful to all of them that unless I correct the error, I would feel very bad. Those left out are listed: chief of the army staff, chief of the navy staff, Convent of Jesus and Mary, and retired air marshal M. Barker.

Tihar Jail, New Delhi — K.H. LARKINS

■ The story of Tihar classes is good. Classes are good games. We love Uncle Kenneth. He loves us. Uncle Frank is also very good. He distributes milk in the morning. He distributes egg, butter and bread. He takes sick boys to hospital. He gets medicines. He is loved by all boys.

Tihar Jail — SARBJIT SINGH BAJAJ

HEARTY NEWS

Your special feature on heart disease ("Hitting the Young", November 15) was informative. It is heartening to know that more sophisticated treatment facilities are becoming available in India.

Illinois, USA — DEEPA CHATURVEDI

■ Congratulations on a very informative article on heart disease. Though a complex subject, it was very lucidly presented, bringing out the causes and the non-availability of medical aid. However, I do wish the article had mentioned the harmful effects of saturated fats and the beneficial effects of relatively unsaturated fats like sunflower, corn and soyabean oil. The other causes are avoidable.

Faizabad — Dr A.N. MEHROTRA

VISA HASSLES

Your article ("Passport to Peril", November 15) was excellent and balanced, showing clearly the state of affairs in this country. The harassment and humiliation of Asians at Heathrow, was played up on British television and newspapers gave the issue front page coverage. The media projection unfortunately gave the average person living here the impression that England was being invaded by undesirable Asians. It is ironic that though South Africans can enter the United Kingdom without a visa, Indians are humiliated.

Bedford, UK — Dr SATISH BALI

SIGNIFICANT SHUFFLE

Your cover story ("Cabinet Reshuffle—Shock Treatment", November 15) was well timed. Arun Nehru's exit apart, the reshuffle was significant more for the demotions and dismissals than the promotions. As for Arjun Singh, he has prospered in the past two years despite several changes in his assignments. Nobody should now be in a hurry to write him off.

Sidhi, Madhya Pradesh — B.N.S. TIWARI

■ If anything, the cabinet reshuffle will come as an eye-opener to the wheeler-dealer members of the Congress(I) that they cannot take the prime minister for granted. The shock treatment meted out to Arun Nehru and the adroit paring of Arjun Singh to size proves that Rajiv Gandhi can play his cards well in the political arena. Every move made has been well thought out and executed.

Ahmedabad — M.V. RAVINDRAN

LIVE AID

In response to your photo feature ("Unwed Mothers", November 15) we can grant total credit to the International Mission of Hope for the service they offer to unwed mothers. Yet it is probably this service which is able to keep their adoption programme alive. I feel that welfare agencies who are gearing themselves to work with unwed mothers need to alter their orientation to include the preventive and educative aspects of this social problem. Their areas of work should extend to sex and family education, instead of working only as reception centres for unwanted children.

Did you know ... 8

In 1980, the President of India heralded a golden era for Vysya Bank and in 1985; the Bank topped the list.

Marking the Golden Jubilee Celebrations of the Bank a novel scheme—"Golden Jubilee Cash Certificate" was launched. The public response to this scheme was tremendous and overwhelming.

In fact, the public trust in Vysya Bank is showing over 25% increase every year, year after year. In the three years ending December 1985 the deposits recorded almost 100% growth.

The secret of this continuous success of Vysya Bank is explained in its outlook, approach and dynamism.

Today, if Vysya Bank is topping the list of private sector banks in the country it is due to its philosophy to innovate, adopt and excel in every sphere.

Started as a 'small man's bank' in 1930, Vysya Bank still upholds this outlook with emphasis on service and stress on achievements. Vysya Bank is growing rapidly leaving firm imprints in the country's banking scene.

Vysya Bank's over 3 million clientele, its over 4000 staff—spread over 268 branches in 9 states and 3 union territories; its carefully crafted need-based saving schemes, its growth oriented advance policies, and its adherence to national priorities have all contributed in making its history a remarkable success story.

Vysya Bank's past is glorious. It's present position is envious. It's future is brighter still, with prospects for better growth. Vysya Bank is surely emerging as a force, in the service of its customers, in the service of the country.

Vysya Bank— from a glorious past towards a brighter future.

Come, let us grow together

A Question of Culture

SUDDENLY, culture is important. And it's everywhere: in Apna Utsav, on the TV screen, in the prime minister's rhetoric. And basic questions are being asked: how important a role can culture play in cementing a fractious country together? Should culture come with a Rs 5-crore bill, as it did in Apna Utsav. Can a government shove culture down the people's throats, like another official programme? How do you take culture out of musty museums and involve the people? How do you make a people in transition conscious of their roots? How important are those roots?

Man, of course, does not live by bread alone. There ought to be more to life than roti, kapda aur makaan. But in the afterglow of Independence, culture was put on a backseat as Nehru gave shape to his dreams of modern temples at Bhakra, Bhilai and Tarapur. But industrialisation, urbanisation, commercialism and other elements of the national transition have been at a price. The plastic sandal has replaced the embroidered shoe. The alienation of man from his roots and the end to the certainty of inherited values has resulted in the culturally dispossessed. The Hindi film fills the vacuum.

But any civilisation in control of the process of change preserves its past and uses it to give meaning to the present, even to shape its future. Japan has done it: respect for elders survives with super-computers, for instance. Even in India, over the years, the effort has increased to preserve old monuments, protect art treasures, foster the crafts. And as the mental hang-over of colonialism fades, classical music and dance find infinitely wider acceptance.

But none of this is enough, as anyone familiar with the coarsening of India must realise. There is something radically wrong if a mud-hut in a village is cleaner, more aesthetic and more psychically harmonious than what the housing bureaucracy calls an MIG (middle income group) flat that costs a hundred times as much. The transition from 'underdeveloped' to 'developing' brings other unwelcome changes: there is a new violence in the air, ordinary civilities become rarities, people who rigidly observed caste barriers in the villages don't seem to recognise traffic barriers in the cities, and as society goes into a churning, greeds come to the surface. What has been left behind was whole; what we now have are broken parts of something new.

Illustration by AJIT NINAN

When a government realises this, what results is a cultural blitzkrieg fired by a certain desperation. The organisers of Apna Utsav have painted dark scenarios of a disintegrating India unless culture is used as some kind of glue to hold it together: if flowers can stop tanks, such manifestations can paper over dissensions, they say. To an extent, that is true. But culture, after all, is not a tray of hors-d'oeuvres to be passed around. Nor is it something that looks seemly when adopted by the Government, even though the state must in some respects be the natural successor to the maharajahs of yore as patron of the arts.

Nehru and Mrs Gandhi tried it. There were the akademis that quickly became fossilised, politicised bureaucracies that failed to achieve their objective. Committee after committee came and went. And perhaps inevitably, the whole effort became export-oriented: even the ethnic culturewallahs like a foreign junket. So what if the price is an injured yakshi?

After all that, Apna Utsav is—for all its faults—a change for the better. It was hastily tacked together, was predictably Delhi-centric and bordered on being patronising to the suddenly important lumpen. But at least such a festival recognises that the bureaucracy has its limitations, that the akademis and bhawans cannot be repositories of any living culture, and that if culture is to breathe, the people are unavoidable. Indeed, the repositories of India's living heritage, the continuity of our civilisation are the socially and economically deprived. The Bhagalpur silk or the embroidered shoes and woven shawls—all that constitute the uniforms of the ethnic chic today—would disappear had it not been for them.

So the best part of the cultural awakening, of course, is that a great deal of it has been quite autonomous of the Government. If it is fashionable to sit all night and listen to Mallikarjun Mansur, the akademis become irrelevant. If this process is taken further up the road, the Government too can stop organising Apna Utsavs. Private trusts and organisations can take that over, like the Indian National Trust for Art and Cultural Heritage and also generate fresh debate on alternative coordinates for building new cultural bridges that link the past with the present, the heritage of an ancient civilisation with the pulse of a young nation. Without this, even sufficient roti, kapda aur makaan will not be enough.

Image Making

● A high-level search is on once again for a powerful public relations outfit to lobby within the US for India's trade and diplomatic causes. During the last few weeks several meetings have taken place within the Prime Minister's Secretariat in order to assess how effectively India has been able to sell its case in Washington. The preliminary conclusion is: very badly. Whether it's a question of textile quotas, trade preferences, soft loans from the World Bank, or arms to Pakistan, India always seems to come out on the losing side. A New York public relations firm, which was hired last year to publicise India's image, was assessed to have performed only marginally well. South Block is now believed to be seriously considering the possibility of looking for a powerful industrial group with top level connections for the job. It is not uncommon in the US for large corporations which make heavy campaign donations and command solid influence on Capitol Hill to assign senior executives to lobby the cause of foreign countries—for a price, of course. And it's all above board. A giant multinational, for example, effectively champions the interests of the Arab state of Morocco. And the nation, notwithstanding opposition from the US's "Jewish lobby" gets pretty much what it wants. The review in South Block is still not complete but the powers that be seem to favour a change in the style of operations abroad.

Speechless Act

● The gap between Sikhs and Hindus appears to be widening everywhere. And New Delhi is no exception. It reared its head last fortnight at a meeting of the International Women's Club. Several foreign bigwigs were also in attendance. One of the key speakers was author-designer Patwant Singh, whose crisp churidar outfit won the admiration of those present, including the former maharani of Jasdhan state. But that is where the admiration stopped. When Singh took the dais he began to deliver a speech about communal relations in which he was ruthlessly candid in a description about the 1984 riots in Delhi. And the screaming started. A group of Hindu members, incensed that Singh was politicising the meeting, demanded that Singh stop his peroration. When the author remained adamant the group walked out of the room threatening to complain to the Home Ministry. Singh refused to budge. Several members then dragged in a hotel manager and demanded that he evict Singh from the speaker's platform. Unwilling to take such drastic action the manager devised an alternative strategy. He pulled the plug on the microphone and Singh's intonation was quickly silenced. Singh described this demonstration as "barbaric".

Cartoons by AJIT NINAN

Files Pile

● This is a tale from the corridors of the Government that works faster. It was almost a year ago that the prime minister decided to split the Ministry of Social Welfare by putting the subjects of women's and children's welfare under one ministry and welfare for scheduled castes and tribes and social defence under another. The result was a free for all in which bureaucrats were left wondering about their responsibilities. There also ensued a complete mix-up of files, and several officials in Shastri Bhawan spent months sifting through them.

The sorting is now done, but it will need some effort to transfer hundreds of files meant for the scheduled castes and tribes welfare department. The dusty, overstuffed files are now lying in gunny bags in the corridors. At the moment there seem to be no takers for the challenge and the files lie there, stacked up to the ceiling. And bureaucrats wending their way in and out of their offices in the building have to play hop-skip-and-jump over the overstacked boris of paperwork.

Vicious Whispers

● Among several young rising stars in the Congress(I) firmament is Salim Sherwani, 35, a "fresh face" member of Parliament from Badaun. His family of industrialists hails from Allahabad and has old ties with the Nehru family. But his detractors have started a vicious whispering campaign claiming that his career could take an unfavourable turn because of an upcoming family tie. Salim's younger brother Saeed who is himself active in his brother's politics and has managed his campaign in the past is shortly to have an arranged marriage—in Pakistan. The baraat is expected to travel to Lahore for the nuptials. Sherwani's supporters are inclined to brush the issue aside as yet another example of political foes trying to erect a mountain out of a molehill.

Tailpiece

● Suddenly prime ministerial aide Mani Shanker Aiyar was all over television—looming large from the screen and behind it nearly as often as the prime minister. So much so that the joke doing the rounds of Doordarshan last fortnight was: "At least in Doordarshan you get your Mani's worth."

STAYING ALIVE

■ A conscientious resident medical officer (RMO) on his evening rounds at a Hyderabad hospital stopped dead in his tracks—the three still forms on three regulation beds told their own tragic tale. Not one to waste his time on formalities, the worthy peremptorily ordered two sweepers, looking on with ghoulish interest, to dump the corpses in the mortuary compound.

And there the matter would have ended but for medicos from the Forensic Department who arrived to do the post-mortem the next afternoon. In a scene harking back to blood-curdling tales of Edgar Allen Poe, two of the 'dead' began to stir and show signs of interest in their surroundings. It was as though the zombies had arrived. Both patients, it turned out, though quite sick were alive enough and were promptly shifted back to the hospital ward.

Hackles rose and voices were raised against the callousness of the RMO and cries of criminal negligence rent the air. What still remains a mystery is why the three were dumped in the mortuary compound instead—as is the rule—of being handed over to the mortuary duty officer where the "bodies" would have received the requisite certification.

SNAIL'S PACE

■ It was truly a case of better late than never. In the year of grace 1971, when Mrs Indira Gandhi led the nation to victory in the Bangladesh war, a Rajkot industrialist was sufficiently moved to pen a few lines to the prime minister. In fulsome terms did he praise her leadership, her vision, her humanity and popped the envelope into the letter-box down the lane. Alack and alas, in vain did he wait for a reply. It arrived, finally in October 1986—15 years later. It was a gracious handwritten thank you note from Mrs Gandhi—for his lavish praise—and he treasures it as a posthumous memory to a great prime minister.

And recently there was a repeat performance of this postal misdeed. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, in his capacity as chancellor of Visva Bharati University, wrote to the vice-chancellor on October 12 regarding plans for the expansion of the university. The honourable gentleman had the singular good fortune of receiving it—25 days later. A tribute—depending on the way you look at it—to the impartiality of the Postal Department even where the prime minister is involved, or its utter inefficiency.

TONGUE TROUBLE

■ Rules are made to be broken goes the saying but not for advocates and certainly not for the Rashtrabhasha. An earnest young graduate in law from Uttar Pradesh—the Hindi heartland—entered the august precincts of the Bar Council of Delhi and sought to be enrolled as an advocate. The members ruled his entry unacceptable because the young man in question had refused to pass a preliminary examination in English, which in good schoolboy tradition, included precis, essay and translation—one hundred marks!

Indignant and upset, he pointed out that it made little sense to have studied law in Hindi if he had to appear for a test in English. And what, he argued, did this imply for the status of the national language. But the council showed little interest in the finer points of the case and upheld their ruling.

With visions of his career coming to a blighted end, the distraught young man then fired off letters to the prime minister and other ministers. But to little effect. With his cry for justice unheard, the young man has resolved—in time-honoured Gandhian tradition—to go on hunger strike outside the prime minister's residence till death or justice does him apart.

KID STUFF

■ Boys will be boys and guards will be guards—that was the theme at Parliament House recently. A gaggle of inky schoolboys, ties askew and dirty fingers clutching dog-eared notebooks, entered Parliament for the obligatory part of a civics lesson. But the holy cow of security does not exempt even schoolboys and a moustachioed guard brusquely ordered them to empty their pockets to the whine of a metal detector.

But there was this little boy who, far from being excited by the goings-on, looked rather worried, even anxious. Stowed deep in his pockets were a handful of toffees and since little boys' tastes run the same, he had reason enough to keep them where they were. But the guard was not prepared to lower his guard and so offered a word of cheer. Take them he would but safe they would remain in the padlocked security of his counter.

When the lesson in practical politics was over and the kid went back to the counter the guard appeared to be missing. But, nay, there he was at the doorway—moustache and all, toffees in hand and smile to match.

BY-ELECTIONS

Ultimately a Draw

THERE were enough reasons for the Congress(I) leaders to heave a sigh of relief last fortnight. For the first time since the 1984 Lok Sabha elections the party had done reasonably well in the by-elections held for 14 Assembly and two Lok Sabha seats in six states. As the verdict of the voters became clear, it was obvious that they still had faith in Rajiv Gandhi's charisma and that the Congress(I)'s hold over the Hindi heartland was intact. Of the 14 Assembly seats, the party won six (a net loss of just one seat) and retained both the Lok Sabha seats of Raichur in Karnataka and Banka in Bihar.

The Janata romped home with four, while the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) got two seats, and the Communist Party of India (Marxist) and Lok Dal won one each. Boasted Nawal Kishore Sharma, one of the six general secretaries of the All India Congress(I) Committee (AICC-I): "The prophets of doom have been belied. It is a clear vote in favour of the policies of the Congress(I) and Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi."

The party had reason to be content. The AICC(I) had been receiving reports of possible reverses in Bihar, Karnataka and Madhya Pradesh. And they did return a poor score in Karnataka and suffer a reverse in Bihar. But it did very well in Madhya Pradesh, and even bested the combined forces of the Opposition in the Banka parliamentary constituency where, for the first time since 1984, the Janata, Lok Dal and BJP unitedly opposed the Congress(I). Their common candidate was none other than Janata Party General Secretary George Fernandes.

After the campaign picked up it became increasingly evident that Fernandes was not able to make a dent in the Thakur-dominated constituency carefully nursed by the late chief minister, Chandrashekhar Singh, whose death caused the by-election. His wife Manorama finally won the seat with a comfortable majority of over 32,000 votes, leaving Fernandes to ponder over his third successive electoral defeat in less than three years. But the Janata Party attributed Fernandes' defeat to rigging by the ruling party.

While the Congress(I) was able to humble its mighty foe in Banka, it also worsted the Lok Dal in its stronghold of Konch, where Irrigation Minister Ramashray Singh wrested the Lok Dal seat by a margin of over 45,000 votes. But as if to maintain political balance, the voters forced the Congress(I) to concede the Banka Assembly seat to the BJP, whose nominee Janardhan Yadav won by a razor-thin margin of 262 votes.

The poll results were particularly reassuring for a shaky Chief Minister Bindeshwari Dubey. In the wake of growing dissidence, reverses at the hustings would have spelt doom for him. Now he can claim that he has been able to reverse the swing against the ruling party, and justify continuation in office.

Motilal Vora, Madhya Pradesh's low-profile chief minister, also survived the attack from the BJP. He was being painted as a non-performing chief minister by his adversaries, who were waiting in the wings to pull him down. Though all the four Congress(I) candidates in the state were nominees of Union Communications Minister Arjun Singh, it was left to Vora to ensure their victory. And as things turned out, the suspension of P.C. Sethi had little effect on the Congress(I)'s fortunes in the state. Despite heavy odds they took the Bhopal seat from the BJP. In 1985, Hasnath Siddiqui had won as the BJP candidate. Later he had resigned from the party and now retains the seat on a Congress(I) ticket. The other Congress(I) candidates, Jaswant Singh and Kamala Chaure, also sailed through with comfortable margins in Bareli and Suansar assembly seats. But the BJP pulled off a surprise when its Murlidhar Maheshwari scored a decisive victory in Pipariya, a Congress(I) stronghold.

The most spectacular result of all the elections was in Haryana's Tosham constituency, where Chief Minister Bansi Lal swept the polls with a record margin of over 80,000 votes without visiting the constituency even once. This was helped by the fact that the opposition parties had boycotted the election in protest against polls not being held simultaneously for other vacant state assembly seats (the Election Commission organised the Tosham poll solely to help Bansi Lal become an MLA and fulfil the constitutional requirement for him to continue as chief minister). Nevertheless, Lal's victory means that the Devi Lal-led Opposition will find it difficult to humble the Congress(I) in the Assembly elections, due next year.

But in sharp contrast to Dubey, Vora and Bansi Lal, another Congress(I) chief minister, Janaki Ballav Patnaik, was in an uncomfortable situation after the election results were known for the only Assembly by-election in Orissa. The defeat of his personal nominee, Rashebati Majhi, from the Rairangpur Assembly constituency was the fifth successive by-election defeat for the Congress(I) in Orissa, and could well spell serious trouble for an already beleaguered Patnaik (see page 24). Said a dissident Congress(I) MLA: "If the party high command still supports the chief minister, Orissa will be lost for the party soon."

In Karnataka, the results of the three Assembly by-elections showed that the Janata had won all three seats, though it suffered a slight decline in its popularity. The victory margin dropped from 16,000 to 7,000 in the Chamaraja constituency. There was a smaller drop of 1,000 votes in the victory margin at Srirangapatna, and none at all in Kallambella. But this was solely because Gundu Rao's candidate S. Lingaiah drew away 11,000 votes that might have gone to the Congress(I). Hegde gave a stronger fight to the Congress(I) in the Lok Sabha election, with the Janata candidate R.A. Naik losing to H.Y. Ghorpade by barely 5,000 votes.

Said M. Raghupati, who was in charge of the Janata campaign in Raipur: "We have not only retained all the seats, which is a difficult task for a ruling party in by-elections, we have also given a tough challenge to the Congress(I). The people of Karnataka have reposed their faith in the leadership of Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde." But Veerappa Moily, former finance minister in the state, retorted: "If Hegde was so popular he should have won with bigger margins."

If all 16 by-election results are taken together, they suggest that this round of the battle between the ruling party and the Opposition has ended in a draw. The country's mood is quiescent. For the Congress(I), that is reason enough to celebrate.

MAIL CENSORSHIP

Licence to Pry

LAST fortnight the Central Government, going back on a public promise, legally arrogated to itself the draconian privilege of intercepting and opening the mail of private citizens and disposing of it in any way it sees fit, without the sender or addressee being any the wiser. That a Congress Government should have legitimised, through legislation, the bureaucracy's power to invade the privacy of the citizens in this fashion was sadly ironical in view of the fact that in the British Raj the country's leading lights had fought a relentless but unsuccessful battle to prevent the empire from doing the same.

"I fail to understand the apprehension in the minds of many members of the Opposition that the Government is going to intercept their mail."

SANTOSH MOHAN DEV
Union minister of state for communications

The legislative surprise was as sudden as it was surreptitious. The Union Minister of State for Communications Santosh Mohan Dev moved a bill in the Lok Sabha seeking to amend the 98-year-old Indian Post Office Act. Its ostensible purpose was to empower the Government to regulate the fledgling courier service business. But the real purpose was to consolidate the Government's hold on the nation's communications system.

Section 16 of the new act which replaces Section 26 of the earlier act says: "The Central Government or the state Government or any officer specially authorised in this behalf by the Central or the state Government may, if satisfied that it is necessary or expedient so to do in the interest of public safety or tranquillity, the sovereignty and integrity of India, the security of the state, friendly relations with foreign states or public order or for preventing incitement to the commission of any offence or on the occurrence of any public emergency by order in writing, direct that any postal article or class or description of postal articles in the course of transmission by post, shall be intercepted or detained or shall be disposed of in such manner as the authority issuing the order may direct."

There is really little difference between the original law and the amended one, except for some sentences which referred to "dominions" and "territories". The real rub is that the newly-enacted law betrays a promise made by the Government that the act would be changed and its scope limited so as to prevent its abuse. The previous law gave the Government the power to intercept mail passing only through the Government postal system. The Home Ministry suggested the amendment on the basis of information that the courier services were being used by anti-national elements to communicate with each other. Under the guise of regulating these private services, the Government put its own stamp on the existing British law. The new law not only consolidates the power of the police over private communications but also fails to restrict the Government's power in this area. And in violation of its 1982 promise that action would be taken to curb police power in this area, the Government has refused to make any categorical statement that it will not censor the mail of political parties or their elected representatives.

Even though the wording of the amendment is unambiguous in the sweeping powers it gives the Government, Dev insisted, despite hostility to the bill from opposition parties, that the Government had no intention of tampering with the genuine democratic activities of political parties or citizens. Said Dev: "We have just replaced a few words from the original law. I fail to understand why there is apprehension in the minds of many members of the Opposition that the Government is going to intercept their mail. I do not think that they are involving themselves in any activity which is contrary to the national security and integrity of the country. Why are they so afraid of it?"

Retorted L.K. Advani, the Bharatiya Janata Party chief: "We have reasons to doubt the intentions of the Government. They have shamelessly used this power against their opponents in the past. And what is the guarantee that the Government is not doing it now?" Added Syed Shahabuddin, while opposing the bill in the Lok Sabha: "I know that it (mail interception) is happening all over the country. Even in times of peace, the police officer goes to the sorting places, stops the sorting work and takes away whatever he likes. Now you are going to regularise it. I am afraid this power is going to be misused. It is going to be another step towards an authoritarian regime which I see creeping up on our land."

Both Advani and Shahabuddin have good reason for attacking the Government. Both the Central and state governments have regularly tampered with and censored mail without any specific guidelines. In the absence of any set rules, it has invariably been left to the local police to prepare the list of people whose mail is to be pried open. In states like Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh, the ruling party has often used this power to intimidate opponents. The practice has been for the police superintendent to post a senior policeman in a post office whose job is to collect the mail addressed to the "listed people" and study its contents. Several chief ministers have used intelligence agencies for collecting information about the activities of not only opposition parties but also of their own party activists and even journalists. According to police sources, the mail of over a 1,000 politicians is being intercepted all over the country. Punjab, Tamil Nadu, West Bengal, Orissa, Kerala and Delhi top the list. In Delhi alone over 200 people, including those associated with the Akali Dal, Shiv Sena, Anand Marg and the All-India Sikh Students Federation fall into this category. In Tamil Nadu, the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK) leaders, all the Tamil Tiger groups, their followers and sympathisers are on the censorship list. An analysis of the lists indicates that various governments have been using this power not for ensuring communal harmony or protecting the country from national security risks but for protecting their political flanks from the activity of party dissidents. According to Home Ministry sources, mail censorship in the past has contributed significantly in finalising the political strategy of the party in power.

Even though mail censorship has been applied for more than 100 years in this country, it assumed menacing proportions just before the Emergency when the Central Government ordered the inclusion of political bigwigs like Jayaprakash Narayan, Morarji Desai, and even senior judges of courts. In Delhi alone, over 1,500 people including trade union leaders, senior civil servants and opposition MP's were put on the censorship list. When the Janata Party returned to power, it pared the list drastically and retained the names of only economic offenders and suspected foreign agents.

But the list expanded with the return of the Congress Party at the Centre (INDIA TODAY September 30, 1981). Said DMK's Rajya Sabha member V. Gopalasamy: "Despite the massive majority both in the states and at the Centre, the ruling party leaders have always felt insecure and have been using the power to spy on its members and on the Opposition. This colonial rule was used by the British against freedom fighters. But now it is being used to stave off any democratic threat to the ruling party."

"The Government has shamelessly used this power against its opponents in the past."

L.K. ADVANI
Bharatiya Janata Party chief

"It is another step towards an authoritarian regime creeping up on our land."

SYED SHAHABUDDIN
Janata Party MP

"It is now being used to stave off any democratic threat to the ruling party."

V. GOPALASAMY
DMK, member Rajya Sabha

Mail interception has been used for several purposes. The Tamil Nadu Government ordered interception of the mail of a DMK Rajya Sabha member only because he was sympathetic to Sri Lankan Tamils. When Gundu Rao was chief minister, the intelligence network intercepted the mail of both Congress and opposition MP's. And now Congress(I) leaders in Karnataka have accused the Hegde Government of tampering with their mail.

The new law does not specify the parameters under which a citizen will be put on a censorship list. Nor does it define what level of government official will be authorised to issue interception orders. Opposition leaders are apprehensive that the new rule will lead to large-scale censorship of both their mail and that of some ruling party leaders. If history is any guide, their fears are amply justified.

J.B. PATNAIK

On a Slippery Slope

ORISSA'S durable Chief Minister Janaki Ballav Patnaik has never had a fight on his hands on so many fronts. About half the members of his 115-strong legislative party openly say that they want him to go; eight of his 23 ministers want a change in leadership; and several of Orissa's 29 Congress(I) MP'S are actively and vociferously campaigning against him. The illusion of invincibility around him has finally disappeared. Principal Correspondents SREEKANT KHANDEKAR and FARZAND AHMED recently visited Orissa to find out why the tide is relentlessly turning against Patnaik. Their report:

A single assembly by-election does not normally make or break governments. And certainly, for a man who has ruled his state for six-and-a-half years—more than any chief minister in recent times—and steered his party to massive victories in two parliamentary and two assembly elections, a by-election should be a routine affair.

Yet, last month Orissa Chief Minister J. B. Patnaik, 59, campaigned at Rairangpur, 350 km from the state capital Bhubaneswar, as if his life depended on it. In a manner of speaking, perhaps it did. From early morning till late at night, for more than 10 days, Patnaik moved tirelessly from one hamlet to another. But it was all in vain and the Congress(I) lost yet again. His party has now conceded defeat in every single by-election—one parliamentary and four assembly seats—in the 20 months of his second term.

Sitting in the Rairangpur rest house, Patnaik admits to dissidence when he says that "perhaps there are some frustrated people who think that after having had me as chief minister for more than six years, there is no hope for them." But he tries to minimise its gravity by adding: "In a democracy it takes some time for these things to sort themselves out."

But his number two in the Cabinet, Finance and Law Minister Gangadhar Mahapatra, disagrees. A prominent rebel leader, Mahapatra demands: "In view of the increasing number of dissidents, the party high command should immediately make a realistic assessment of the situation to see whether they have a valid case or not."

Until April this year, only 11 legislators had come out openly against Patnaik. But the number has risen steadily since. In August, 40 of them went to New Delhi to submit a detailed memorandum to party bosses. Since then, Mahapatra, Harijan and Tribal Welfare Minister Bhanjaman Behera, Agriculture Minister Rasa Behari Behera (all cabinet rank) and Minister of State for Health Hemananda Biswal have jointly met Rajiv and demanded change.

In New Delhi itself, many MP's have been working actively against the chief minister, the most prominent being state party President Nityanand Mishra, who has already addressed a letter to Rajiv Gandhi criticising the Patnaik administration. Significantly, the letter was signed by a dozen parliamentarians.

So aggressive is the mood that last month more than 50 MLA's sent a missive to New Delhi demanding a showdown. They asked for a legislative party meet so that they could express lack of confidence in Patnaik's leadership.

Recent political changes have also given the dissidents hope. Though the death of T. Anjiah, the party general secretary in charge of Orissa, robbed them of a man who at least gave them a sympathetic hearing, other events have been more to their liking. Thus, the dropping of Arun Nehru and the demotion of Arjun Singh, both of whom the dissidents believe backed Patnaik, have been greeted with delight. And the induction of Chintamani Panigrahi, 64, as minister of state for home, is also being read as a factor that will help them.

The dissension within his Cabinet was also exposed in another way. The chief minister had initiated a move for government agencies to offer sal seed, a vital commodity in the state's economy, to local units at prices five per cent lower than what ruled in the market. The quotas of various units were decided and the new policy declared in the state government gazette, in anticipation of cabinet approval. But Patnaik's cabinet colleagues refused to fall in line, opposed this step, and brought about an extraordinary situation when the earlier notification had to be nullified.

The allegations about the chief minister's sex life in a prominent English weekly have also hurt him: it has shattered what remained of the halo around Patnaik. Indeed, in the last assembly session, members of the Opposition—whose strength is pitiable—refused to let proceedings continue for three full days because they said he had lost the moral right to continue. Although his party MLA's could have easily outshouted the Opposition, they chose to remain amused spectators.

If today Patnaik is in serious trouble, it has a lot to do with his style of operating over the years. Working through a coterie, he centralised all real power. The rest of the ministers got crumbs. But resentment accumulated gradually and now looks to be getting out of the chief minister's hands.

It is somewhat ironical that the political mood has swung against him so sharply in just 20 months of his being sworn in as chief minister for the second time on March 10, 1985. After all, most of the 115 Congress(I) legislators elected, in a House of 147, were handpicked Patnaik men. The trouble-makers had been thrown out of the party or denied tickets. There was no leader left in Orissa who could challenge him. And yet, today he is a beleaguered man.

When Patnaik came to power for the first time in June 1980, it had been a commendable rise because he came from a lower middle class family. He started as a journalist, editing the now-defunct Eastern Times and the popular Prajatantra for 15 years, and used his profession to develop a wide range of contacts. Besides, he was a first-rate orator.

Patnaik's first venture into elections in 1967 as an independent—he lost his deposit—failed. But Nandini Satpathy, later to become chief minister, got him a party ticket for the 1971 parliamentary elections, which he won, and by 1973 he was Union deputy minister for defence. His rise to minister of state status and the fact that he caught Sanjay Gandhi's eye during the Emergency, upset Satpathy. But the tide was turning against her.

When the Congress(I) was demolished in 1977, Patnaik, as Orissa unit president, toured the state relentlessly, rebuilt the party apparatus almost single-handed, and established his personal base. So when he became an MP again in 1980, it surprised no one that the Gandhis, mother and younger son, wanted him as cabinet minister for tourism, civil aviation and labour. Six months later and logically enough, he was sworn in as Orissa chief minister. Even his adversary, Biju Patnaik then in the Lok Dal, had grudgingly admitted: "Janaki Ballav is the best of a bad bargain."

There was hope in the air in the Orissa of 1980. The chief minister enjoyed considerable personal popularity: he was not only seen as scholarly, urbane and devoutly religious; he was also perceived as a man in a hurry. "A thousand industries with an investment of Rs 1,000 crore in 1,000 days," he promised.

But by 1983, the image of the Government had dimmed considerably. Ministers were involved in cases ranging from theft to rape. And graft charges against his colleagues became common. A mustard oil procurement deal raised such a stink about Patnaik's own involvement that the chief minister went the full way to prevent the Assembly's Public Undertakings Committee from tabling its report. (INDIA TODAY, May 15, 1983). "All the same," says a minister now opposed to Patnaik, "in the early years there was a feeling that the Government was ushering in progress. That is absent now."

Nevertheless, many of his problems today have to do with the kind of style Patnaik chose to adopt right at the outset when he took over as chief minister in 1980. Because of either insecurity or the desire to hold all real power, he operated through a tight coterie. His failure to truly decentralise over the years is a major fuel for his detractors' resentment today.

But most important, Patnaik's style of working through a closed group brought to the fore two men who profoundly affected, and still do, Patnaik's career. One was a relative, Niranjan Patnaik, brother of the chief minister's son-in-law, Soumya Ranjan, who now edits the Oriya daily Sambad. The other was Basant Kumar Biswal, Congress treasurer for the state unit since 1979, but otherwise a contractor and a non-entity until Patnaik took the chair. Both entered the Assembly for the first time in 1980, both were already controversial, and yet the troika, in effect,

Productivity curves every engineer ought to study

Productivity is often an index to performance. The performance of a very basic, yet essential component,gear drives—an integral part of power transmission which determines industrial productivity profiles.

Take worm reduction gear boxes. Shanthi Gears Limited manufactures a wide range of worm gear reducers. Designed for maximum efficiency, each component complements the other for dependable performance and long life.

Here are some more reasons why Shanthi gear reducers are so popular:

* Rugged finned housings for maximum strength and heat dissipation.
* Case hardened worm shaft accurately profile ground.
* Centrifugally cast phosphor bronze worm wheel.
* Unique hand changing facility without dismantling the assembly.
* Shafts supported on taper roller bearings.
* Wide range of h.p. ratings and mounting systems.
* Positive splash lubrication with oil wipers and oil trough.

Insist on Shanthi whenever you buy gear boxes.

ruled the state. Jayanti, the chief minister's wife and an MP, was also in the inner circle.

If today the tide of resentment among legislators looks dangerous, it is because for the full first term, nearly all the big money departments were in the grip of this troika. Patnaik held industries, irrigation, power, home, and general administration, among others. Niranjan was minister of state under him looking after irrigation and power. Biswal, also minister of state, had public works, housing, mining and urban development, and later got public health engineering. Most of the remaining 14 ministers got crumbs, and they knew it. But such was Patnaik's power and influence that there was little they could do. Dissidents never numbered more than a dozen.

NIRANJAN and Biswal constantly tussled to play Patnaik's right hand. "Jealous co-wives", says a partyman disdainfully. While Niranjan was subtle in his manoeuvres to build support, Biswal had no time for niceties. He could do as he pleased and he let everyone know it. Although only a minister of state, he regularly attended cabinet meetings. It wasn't for nothing that he was called Super Chief Minister, a label that has stuck.

Seated today in his home, adjacent to the chief minister's, Biswal says of Patnaik, a friend of more than 30 years and a man he has now sworn to destroy: "I supported him till 1984 because he worked efficiently. But after that his family members and relatives started misleading him." But says Soumya Ranjan of his chief minister father-in-law: "Not getting rid of Biswal in time was the worst mistake he has made in his tenure."

Although Biswal is no longer even an MLA, he continues to be a weighty factor. Patnaik had entrusted him with the role of extending patronage to keep stray legislators in line. Gradually, as more and more leaders depended on him, Biswal's strength grew. Today many of them are beholden to him and he is using this to get his former boss. Patnaik still has to find a dependable man to replace him—and this has become his major weakness. Nirajnan, somehow, is unable to fulfill that function. And there is no one else Patnaik trusts enough.

Biswal's decline began when he was first denied a ticket in the last assembly elections. His rival Niranjan was not only elected but was made cabinet minister in Patnaik's second term. Finally, Biswal was given a party ticket for the Kendrapara parliamentary constituency, but he lost. Through this period, he had begun to suspect Patnaik of trying to cut loose. Biswal had a brief reprieve when Niranjan had to resign last year following strictures against him in a graft case, but in mid-1986 the Supreme Court erased them, paving the way for Niranjan's return in a cabinet reshuffle on July 21. That marked the final break between the chief minister and Biswal.

"The party high command should immediately make a realistic assessment of the situation."

GANGADHAR MAHAPATRA
finance and law minister

"Not getting rid of Biswal in time was his (Patnaik's) worst political mistake."

SOUMYA RANJAN PATNAIK
chief minister's son-in-law and editor Sambad

Matters have finally come to a boil now because of excessive centralisation. Says Soumya Ranjan—formerly a lecturer in political science—of his father-in-law: "Congress politics is interest-group-based politics. He has the ability to mediate, which is essential in his position." It would seem that Patnaik is losing touch in that department too.

Meanwhile, if several legislators have began to doubt their leader's methods, they are not entirely to blame. Patnaik has over the last year-and-a-half made every attempt possible to prevent his adversaries from contacting the prime minister. For many months, their memorandums never got to Rajiv because they were intercepted by a functionary in the party office who sent them back to Patnaik. When more than 80 MLA's signed a statement that Oriya sentiment had been hurt by the magazine report on Patnaik's sex life, the chief minister used it in Delhi to establish the support he enjoyed. This the MLA's came to know only later.

Inevitably, uncertainty now reigns in Bhubaneswar, and bureaucrats have returned to practising their old art of keeping an eye on the door while dealing with files. Laughs a senior official: "The bureaucracy and the legislature are so closely interlinked that you can't expect us to remain unaffected." Now a considerably weakened Patnaik gives in readily to recommendations of transfers, to mollify partymen. Indeed, at a departmental review recently, a minister told Patnaik that he could not meet targets if senior officials were constantly shuffled.

The dissidents seem to believe that their quarry's strength is failing and they are willing to use whatever ammunition is available—even Biswal, the very man they had attacked not so long ago. Biswal's ability as a fixer goes to their advantage though how many MLA's he has personally recruited in the campaign is a matter of dispute. There are many among them who distrust him and his involvement is already creating some differences among them. Says a minister: "We know that if we associate with him, we lose credibility. But we need all the help we can get."

Politicians agree that this state of flux is harming Orissa and are surprised over no signals of any kind from New Delhi. Says an MP supporter of Patnaik's: "I think it is high time the prime minister indicated what he wants. The dissidents are turning more vociferous because they have begun to believe that they can get away with anything. Yes or no, at least there should be some decision."

It is Orissa's tragedy that it had to see 10 changes in chief ministership in the 20 years before Patnaik's advent brought stability. But now the movement has gathered such momentum that total calm is unlikely to prevail even if Patnaik manages to continue.

MADHYA PRADESH

Paper Power

AT 54, Govind Lal Vora, the chubby-faced younger brother of Chief Minister Motilal Vora, has emerged as one of the most influential—and controversial—personalities in the state. At his Raipur house and newspaper office, government officials, businessmen and politicians queue up from early morning to seek favours.

The controversy stems mainly from allegations made by his detractors that he has used his brother's high office to promote the interest of their family newspaper, Amrit Sandesh, a charge both brothers deny vehemently. Critics point out that the Amrit Sandesh group has prospered like no newspaper in the state. Not only has it acquired a plot of prime land for a song, but has also been receiving more than its due share of government advertisements.

Apart from his brother, sister-in-law and nephew, Motilal Vora's son is a shareholder and director in the company that publishes Amrit Sandesh. A Raipur daily, Agradoot, has launched a campaign against the chief minister on this issue. The chief minister's supporters, however, detect a sinister political hand behind Agradoot's campaign, which is often scurrilous, poking fun at Vora's humble past. Last fortnight, Agradoot dramatised the issue by complaining that it had been getting calls threatening to blow up its offices if it continued to write against Vora.

Amrit Sandesh has indeed received preferential treatment. Like other newspapers in the state it has received government land at a concessional rate but what places it in a special class, along with the National Herald group, is an extraordinary clause in the sale-deed, showering benefits worth crores of rupees. While other newspapers have been forbidden land-use diversion there is no such condition in the case of these two favourite newspapers. According to reports Amrit Sandesh, which has got a 15,580 sq ft plot in the heart of Raipur's commercial sector, is planning to build a multi-storied shopping complex there.

The plot, considered to be among the most expensive pieces of real estate in the town, was allotted to the newspaper under curious circumstances. The land belonged to the Janapad Sabha, which had resisted all attempts to allot it to anyone else. But when Vora applied for the plot the Janapad Sabha discovered all of a sudden that it did not require the land after all and issued a no-objection certificate. The land was initially allotted to the newspaper on April 5, 1984, at a cost of Rs 149,908 with an annual ground rent of Rs 11,243. But later, on June 22, 1985—after Vora became chief minister in March that year—the state Government issued an order, reducing the price of the land to Rs 35,835 and its annual ground rent to Rs 2,687. The collector of Raipur was asked to refund the excess payment made by the newspaper. The market value of the land is at least Rs 35 lakh.

On September 24 this year, the newspaper applied for an additional plot of 34,500 sq ft adjacent to its office for "expansion". All the concerned departments issued no-objection certificates the same day! Says Motilal Vora: "Is there any provision which debars any citizen from applying for land?" The orders for the initial land allotment as well as price reduction, he pointed out, were made by his predecessor, Arjun Singh. "I've only carried out his orders," he told INDIA TODAY. Vora, who is himself in charge of the Information and Publicity Department, said he had not "spoken to anyone" for giving special treatment to his family newspaper.

This two-year-old newspaper is already getting more government advertisements than its two well-established rivals at Raipur having almost twice its circulation. Amrit Sandesh, with a claimed circulation of 25,000 copies, is getting on an average 4,000 column-centimetres of Madhya Pradesh Government advertisements compared to 3,000 column-centimetres given to Deshbandhu and Navbharat, both with certified ABC circulation of over 40,000 copies each. Recalls Rekhchand Lunia, the Voras' erstwhile partner in the newspaper who sold all his shares to them under mysterious circumstances four months ago: "Business did start picking up after Motilal Vora became the chief minister." For instance, compared to its total advertisement revenue of Rs 726,138 during December 1984-March 1985—just before Vora became the chief minister—the newspaper earned advertisements worth Rs 12,55,517 during the same period next year. Contacted at his Raipur home, Govind Lal Vora refused to talk on the issue. "I don't want to be drawn into the controversy," he said. But he is already neck-deep in it.

ASSAM

Challenging their Own

THE deluge, ironically, came after the floods. Barely had Chief Minister Prafulla Mahanta and his cabinet of political debutants begun to settle down after tackling the most destructive Brahmaputra flood in a decade when breaches began to show where it hurt most. The ruling Asom Gana Parishad's power base among the state's rebellious student community abruptly began weakening.

Suddenly, Mahanta's was a besieged government. Badgered by volatile ethnic backers for not doing enough to implement the 15-month-old accord with the Centre, harried by an entirely new bunch of separatist terrorists who kill political rivals and loot banks with impunity and, worst of all, under pressure to perform from the All Assam Students Union (AASU)—the vehicle on which Mahanta rode to power last December—the AGP Government can hardly look forward to its first anniversary on December 24 with much comfort. Doomsayers have already begun talking in terms of a Barnala-AISSF kind of situation emerging in Assam.

Last fortnight, AASU "revived" the agitation on the foreign nationals issue in protest against the "non-implementation" of the Assam accord which promised the sealing of Assam-Bangladesh border against infiltration, deportation of foreign settlers and economic and ethnic safeguards for Assam. AASU leaders sat in dharna on the Boat Club lawns in New Delhi and threatened to follow it up with a hunger strike. "At this rate we will have no choice but to take to the streets again," said Dr Arun Sarma, the influential party adviser. Kartick Hazarika, the president added: "We have gone slow as we don't want our students missing classes yet again. But we are left with no option."

The party has certainly chosen to return to the centre-stage of Assam politics even if that means challenging the authority of its own state government. The students made this clear with a day's bandh on November 6 in protest against "police atrocities on innocent people".

Even at the height of the agitation, no bandh had paralysed a government so completely. Till afternoon on that day, when they formally gained clearance from the AASU, Mahanta and his ministers were unable to visit their offices in the Janata Bhawan at Dispur. Home Minister Bhrigu Phukan tried to beat the picketeers by going in at 5.30 a.m., but he was pulled out by workers. As a final mark of victory, the picketeers shut the gates of Janata Bhawan and put up their own flag. "AASU gave birth to the AGP. It is impossible for a one-year-old child to fight its mother," said Ataur Rehman, AGP MP, somewhat defensively.

The situation was precipitated by unforeseen problems. For several months now, the Government has found itself faced with the problem of the resurgence of terrorism. The terrorists, claiming to belong to a new organisation called the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA), have killed at least nine political rivals (mainly representing the Congress(I) or the minorities) and have looted several banks. In each of the killings they have used Chinese-made Tuchaarev M-20 machine-pistols, standard issue of neighbouring Nagaland's National Socialist Council. "There is a nexus between the two organisations and the banks are being looted to finance a bigger assault later," said B.C. Sarma, director-general of Assam police.

In the first week of November, the Intelligence Bureau informed Guwahati of a possible ULFA attempt to loot another bank at Nalbari, 50 km west of the capital. In the subsequent "encounter", the police killed Parikshit Burman, a Guwahati student who plays for the state volleyball team. AASU immediately demanded the heads of the police officers involved, and even though the Government bent over backwards to appease them, by suspending the superintendent and his deputy and arresting two constables, the bandh call was given.

Privately, even though ruling party leaders regret this, they plead helplessness in the face of popular pressure. "It is not easy to say that Parikshit Burman was innocent," asserts Phukan. But he avoids mentioning what this kind of surrender to street pressure could mean for his administration, particularly when each case of murder or dacoity is followed up by a letter from the Union Home Ministry expressing condescending concern. "They show great interest in anything that happens here while forgetting all that is happening in Punjab and Delhi," complained Phukan, who is also smarting under attacks at home. The All Guwahati Students Union, the most powerful unit of AASU, has been demanding his resignation. "He must pay for his police's total failure on the law and order front," said Rupjyoti Baroloi, general secretary of the Guwahati unit.

This sudden onset of hostility has led to some mediatory efforts, but the relief is at best temporary. AASU insists on returning to the forefront of state politics and that can only mean a revival of the agitation. The ruling party's best hope is some good news on the accord implementation from Delhi, failing which it too might have no choice but to add voice to AASU protests. Said Phukan: "We came to power to implement this accord. If that does not happen we will have to go back to the people."

But tied down as it is by Punjab and other problems, the Centre has for the moment put Assam on the back-burner. Last fortnight, even the survey work for the construction of a road and fence along the Assam-Bangladesh border was suspended as a Bangladesh Rifles patrol threatened the survey workers near Dhuburi in western Assam. With the Centre in no mood to oblige and AASU unrelenting, the coming weeks could escalate tensions. This is not exactly the kind of mood Mahanta and Phukan would have anticipated when they timed their marriages within the next month, to coincide with their government's first anniversary bash.

BUREAUCRACY

Under Attack

IN Assam, they are playing cops and officers. And the officer on the run in this case ranks no lower than the director-general of police. Last month the Assam Government placed under suspension Gnananda Sarma Pathak, an IPS officer of 1953 vintage, on suspicion of "links" with the terrorist organisation United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA). The main accusation against him is that he has been writing threatening letters on behalf of ULFA to several ministers, politicians and journalists to spread disaffection against the AGP Government, a charge he denies with outrage.

The story began some time in September when over a thousand such letters appeared in the mailboxes of influential people all over the state. Most contained charges of corruption against Home Minister Bhrigu Phukan and said that he was using the ULFA to wipe out political detractors. "We thought it was an inside job and the special branch was asked to investigate," said Phukan. He added that the forensic laboratory has "very clearly stated that the handwriting is his." He pointed out that on "five occasions in the past" the officer has faced similar charges of writing unsolicited letters.

But whether or not he did all that writing as a bitter prank—he had been removed as the head of police to be chairman of the Police Housing Corporation after the AGP came to power—Sarma Pathak is an unlikely suspect as far as the extremist link goes. He is retiring only next month and both he and his wife are seriously ill. "All I wanted in such a situation was to retire peacefully and go to Sai Baba's ashram. I arrested ULFA people and now they could come to kill me, particularly when the Government has withdrawn all my guards and cut my telephone," complains Pathak. After the rejection of his appeal against the suspension by the administrative tribunal, he has now sought the Centre's intervention.

Sarma Pathak has been accused of writing threatening letters on behalf of ULFA, the terrorist organisation.

Both the Centre and the administrative tribunal, however, have their hands full as far as Assam is concerned. Last month the Government faced a piquant situation as the tribunal set aside the suspension of K.K. Baruah, a senior IAS officer who was considered close to Saikia, on charges of corruption. The tribunal called the suspension order "naked and knave, almost despotic". But the state Government was not to be subdued. As Baruah reported for work the following day, the Government put a heavy padlock on his office and issued fresh suspension orders. Baruah too has approached the Centre now.

"The bureaucracy is just not changing with the times," complained Forest Minister Bharat Narah. Lamented a senior bureaucrat: "It is impossible to function with a set of ministers which is guided by the advice of clerks and cyclostyling machine operators belonging to the karmachari parishad which was in the vanguard of the Assam movement."

With such mutual hostility, a flight of bureaucrats is inevitable. The last three months have seen the departure of nearly a dozen senior officers to Delhi. "We are certainly short of people and are seeking the return of our officers from Delhi," confessed Jyoti Rajkhowa, the secretary in charge of the Personnel Department. But with the distrust continuing, it is unlikely that anyone who has the right kind of backing in Delhi will be keen to return.

Intensive research and development by ILTD assists farmers to evolve improved strains of tobacco, increase crop yield.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The Leaf Tobacco Development Division of ITC introduced virginia tobacco growing in India in 1920. Today it continues to help farmers grow better tobacco, improve crop yield.

In Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka was born 75 years ago a close friendship between the tobacco farmer and ITC's Indian Leaf Tobacco Development Division.

To this day that bond has remained strong and mutually beneficial.

Quality begins in the fields

ILTD works with the farmer providing assistance in agro-technology from seed germination to tobacco curing. Free consultation is offered on grading, seedbed preparation and soil tests. Through Farmer Service Schemes, demonstration plots and literature printed in regional languages, ILTD introduces modern farming methods.

Continuing inputs motivate the tobacco farmer to adopt scientific techniques that have rewarded him with improved quality of crop and higher yields. As a result he is among the most prosperous cash crop growers in the country.

How research leads to development

Studies at ILTD's leaf research centres in Rajahmundry and Hunsur have resulted in the development of world quality tobaccos. The Agricultural Research and Training Centre, also at Hunsur, trains personnel from ILTD, other companies and government institutions in improved agricultural practices.

As one of the largest buyers and exporters of leaf tobacco, ILTD contributes to the well-being of thousands of farmhands and workers employed in processing and packaging.

For ITC, generation of employmen on this scale is of measureless satisfaction.

ILTD DIVISION

ILTD introduced the cultivation of virginia tobacco and the flue-curing process.

ILTD trains and counsels farmers to grow better tobaccos more profitably.

ILTD distributes fertilizer and seeds, conducts free soil tests.

ILTD has adopted village Gavanivaripalam in Andhra Pradesh and spends Rs 1 lakh annually on adult education and self-employment programmes.

AMITABH BACHCHAN

Star Crossed

FEW politicians have been blessed with such advantages. A charismatic superstar with a phenomenal fan-following, a close friend of the prime minister and an MP from Allahabad, the nursery of India's political giants. Yet, the star's political stars are no longer in perfect configuration. Slowly but surely, Amitabh Bachchan is losing his most important fan-following—his fellow Congressmen in Uttar Pradesh.

The growing resentment against the former superstar—mainly on the part of old-time Allahabad Congressmen disgruntled by Bachchan, a political tyro, leap-frogging over them—has now become the hottest topic in the political corridors of Allahabad. In recent weeks, the two powerful Allahabad lobbies—one owing allegiance to Union Finance Minister V.P. Singh and the other to Union Minister of State for Welfare Rajendra Kumari Bajpai—have accelerated the anti-Amitabh campaign.

Already fuelled by the influence Bachchan wields in local issues and the VVIP treatment afforded him during his periodic visits—last fortnight when Rajiv visited Allahabad, Bachchan not only played host, he even left for Delhi along with him, a privilege rarely extended to even Union ministers—the anti-Amitabh camp has been given further reasons for disquiet. Examples:

▶ At a recent meeting of the District Congress(I) Committee, a former state minister pointed out that Bachchan had taken the credit for sanctioning Rs 2 crore for the reorganisation of the Compulsory Deposit Fund Pension Office though the real ground-work had been done by local leaders. Another example was when Bachchan led a delegation of Allahabad citizens to the finance minister's office in Delhi demanding that the Accountant-General's office not be bifurcated, something that V.P. Singh himself had said all along.

▶ Congress(I) leaders allege bungling by some office-bearers of the Amitabh Bachchan Fans' Association, which raised Rs 23 lakh for the Nirman Social and Charitable Trust through premieres of Bachchan's films in Allahabad and Lucknow and an Amitabh Bachchan Nite in Gujarat. According to a former minister, Bachchan has detected embezzlement to the tune of Rs 2 lakh and has decided not to involve the association in any such shows in future and leave the organisation to the Nirman trust.

Bachchan garlanding Rajiv: under fire

▶ The appointment of Shanti Swaroop Bhatnagar as the state's advocate-general, Bachchan's distant relative Jagdish Rajan as a Public Service Commission member in end-1984 and of Arun Kumar Srivastava (who is at loggerheads with Bajpai's son Ashok) as vice-president of the state Youth Congress(I), reportedly at the instance of Bachchan, have drawn a lot of flak.

▶ Bachchan's failure to make an appearance during the riots in the city last September. Though he was ostensibly abroad at the time, his detractors use it to show the star's indifference to his constituency.

Bachchan himself was unavailable for comment and his secretary for political affairs, K. Srinivasan refuses to comment. "All this is happening because he is a simple man with honest intentions," he says. Ramesh Dixit, another political adviser, says that the MP is only trying to develop dedicated young men capable of contributing positively to the Congress(I) and "there are many in the party who obviously do not like it."

Amitabh has kept his customary cool all along but, at a recent public meeting in Allahabad's Chowk, he lashed out at his critics in no uncertain terms. "Why is Amitabh Bachchan responsible for everything which has not been done in Allahabad till now?" he asked, and added: "You have two ministers from this place and both are better placed than me to solve your problems. Why don't you blame them?"

Besides Bachchan's charisma, his proximity to Rajiv is proving to be a double-edged weapon. His audience, as well as his critics, had a taste of it last fortnight at a public meeting during Rajiv's visit. Demanding construction of a bridge over the Yamuna in Naini, Bachchan turned to Rajiv and said: "When I go round my constituency, people ask me to get this done and I will use the same style in making this request to you." Then folding his hands, he pleaded in rustic Allahabadi: "Hujur, Naini ma ek thai pulia banwaey de to bari kirpa hoey." (Your honour, we will be very grateful if you could have a bridge built in Naini.) The result: thunderous applause, an assurance from both Rajiv and Chief Minister Bir Bahadur Singh to get the bridge constructed—and another load of political buckshot for the growing arsenal of his critics.

CITIZENSHIP BILL

Tightening Act

"The mere fact of birth in India invests with it the right of citizenship in India...we have taken a cosmopolitan view and it is in accordance with the spirit of the times, with the temper and atmosphere which we wish to promote in the civilised world."

—GOVIND BALLABH PANT, home minister, while introducing the Citizenship Bill in Parliament on August 5, 1955.

"The time has come to tighten up our citizenship laws....We cannot be generous at the cost of our own people, at the cost of our own development."

—P. CHIDAMBARAM, Union minister of state for home affairs, while introducing the Citizenship (Amendment) Bill in the Lok Sabha on November 10, 1986.

The Government carved deep into the basic legal fabric of the country last fortnight by digging its scalpel into the Citizenship Act of 1956 to change the criteria qualifying a person as a citizen of India.

The Citizenship (Amendment) Bill,

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

1986, passed by both houses of Parliament last fortnight, stipulates that it is no longer adequate to be born in India to be granted Indian citizenship. At the time of birth either one of the parents has to be an Indian citizen for the person to become a citizen of India.

The bill also tightened the screws further on other provisions of the Citizenship Act by raising substantially, the qualifying periods of stay within India for grant of citizenship by registration, marriage, or naturalisation. It also changed the definition of 'Indian origin' by excluding from its purview those people whose grand-parents, but not parents, were born in India.

Expectedly the bill has stirred a hornet's nest, starting from the moment it was moved in the Lok Sabha. "This bill," retorted Syed Shahabuddin of the Janata, "is not only morally and socially obnoxious, it is constitutionally questionable, a legal absurdity, politically motivated and above all, administratively impracticable."

Added Somnath Chatterjee of the CPI(M): "This bill is another sickening instance of surrender to chauvinistic elements and forces of disruption and divisiveness." He said it completely violated Article 14 of the Constitution which states clearly that "the state shall not deny to any person equality before the law or equal protection of laws within the territory of India."

Human rights activists too were perturbed. "This goes against the whole ethos of the country," stressed Gobinda Mukhoty of the People's Union for Democratic Rights. But countering the deluge of criticism, Chidambaram stressed that the bill did not negate any human rights as it would only have prospective effect in its implementation.

He emphasised that it had become necessary to make citizenship laws more stringent as there had been a large influx of illegal immigrants from Bangladesh and Sri Lanka besides those from Pakistan and some African countries. To give an idea of the magnitude of this problem, he said, while the overall increase in population in West Bengal had been 22 per cent, that in the border districts ranged from 29 per cent to as high as 37 per cent—mainly due to the high rate of immigration into Bengal.

The Government's move has received the whole hearted support of the Asom Gana Parishad members of Parliament. Said Dinesh Goswami: "It took the people of Assam six long years to make the Government of India realise that a large number of people were clandestinely entering Assam, and also other neighbouring states from Bangladesh."

But now that it has come to realise the gravity of the problem, the solution is not foolproof. The Government has to strengthen its vigil along the border and spruce up its implementation machinery to make sure the new law does not remain a dead letter in the statute book.

TAMIL NADU

Stunning Blows

Tamil Nadu Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran has stumped his opponents again. He not only managed to nip the opposition Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam's (DMK) ambitious month-long anti-Hindi agitation in the bud, but left them in a state of shock.

As part of the statewide protest, over 15,000 DMK volunteers were to burn copies of Para 17 of the Constitution, which specifies that the official language of the Indian Union would be Hindi. The DMK wanted to incorporate into the Constitution, Jawaharlal Nehru's assurance that English will continue as the associate official language as long as the non-Hindi speaking people desire it.

But on the eve of the agitation, the DMK's thunder was stolen when a government-sponsored resolution, moved in MGR's name, urged the Centre to make Nehru's assurance a part of the Constitution—precisely the demand the agitators were voicing. It left everyone confused about the ruling party's real stand on the language issue. The DMK, caught in a trap, was forced to vote for the resolution which was passed.

Then the agitators were hit the other way when, a few days later, assembly Speaker P.H. Pandian announced that he was disqualifying seven DMK MLA's, including General Secretary K. Anbazhagan, and party leader in the House, from membership of the Assembly for publicly burning the Constitution. While the DMK president bravely said later that "our agitation will go on", there is no doubt that his is a stunned party. After this ruling, their strength in the Assembly of 235 members has been reduced to a mere 15.

MGR's ally, the Congress(I), was also unhappy because it had to vote against the resolution about Nehru's assurance. Grumbled M.P. Subramaniam, former Tamil Nadu Congress(I) Committee (TNCC-I) chief: "It was unfair on the part of the AIADMK to have brought in this resolution all of a sudden. In our party, we did not even have the time to consult our leader as to how to react to it." Fumed TNCC(I) Vice-President A.R. Marimuthu: "By passing such a resolution, the AIADMK is trying to severe itself from the mainstream. It is sacrificing national unity to make a temporary truce with the DMK."

The actions of the speaker and MGR between them, took all the wind out of the DMK's anti-Hindi agitation.

The AIADMK, however, was clever enough to give solid reasons for its stand. Explained Education Minister C. Ponnaiyan: "The amended Official Languages Act of 1968 which gives a certain measure of legal protection to the non-Hindi speaking people was an Act passed by a simple majority in Parliament and therefore can be annulled by a similar majority. It is precisely because of this that we are forced to seek constitutional protection."

This was not all. Ponnaiyan made a categorical declaration in the Assembly last fortnight that the state Government would not allow the establishment of model schools in the state unless the medium of instruction was Tamil. This statement was seen as added proof of MGR's new anti-Centre stance. It did not matter that only a month ago, Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan, the number two man in the state Cabinet, had on MGR's behalf appealed to the DMK to withdraw its anti-Hindi agitation because Rajiv Gandhi had assured the chief minister that the Centre would stand by Nehru's commitment to non-Hindi speaking people.

But MGR was still not through with his quota of surprises. He decided to re-induct into the Cabinet former food minister S.D. Somasundaram, one of the most vehement critics of AIADMK Propaganda Secretary Jayalalitha, and merge his Namathu Kazhagam into the AIADMK. Only a fortnight ago, MGR had dropped 10 ministers belonging to the anti-Jayalalitha camp of former information minister R.M. Veerappan. Speculation was rife that the real reason in the case of at least eight ministers was that they had raised anti-Hindi slogans. But Somasundaram's re-induction had everybody guessing about the exact game that MGR seemed to be playing. Remarked an AIADMK leader: "This is our leader's see-saw to balance the factions in the party.". But just how long MGR's balancing act could go on without a major mishap was just one of the many intriguing questions raised during last fortnight's political jugglery.

Current Satire

THERE was little doubt that he was courting trouble with the censors when criminal lawyer Palayamkottai Shanmugam from Tirunelveli commissioned the veteran satirist and playwright Cho S. Ramaswamy to not only do the story, screen-play, and dialogue, but also feature as the protagonist in a film he wanted to produce on political corruption. But last fortnight, Shanmugam was finally able to heave a sigh of relief when Censor Board Chairman Bikram Singh in Bombay cleared the film Kani Nilam Vendum (Wanted, a Piece of Land) after three long months of uncertainty. A revising committee recommended a "U" certificate for the film, provided 13 cuts were carried out.

The film, a sizzling political commentary with references to identifiable Tamil politicians, was initially refused a certificate by the Censor Board for fear it would cause public disaffection.

Exulted Shanmugam: "I knew I would finally get the certificate. I was prepared to battle to any extent to obtain it. The grant of a certificate is a vindication of the right to free political expression." Shanmugam had, in fact, filed a writ petition in the Madras High Court requesting that the censors be directed to certify the film speedily—he was worried that the file on his film had got stuck with the censor board chairman, notwithstanding a favourable recommendation by the revising committee. Under censorship regulations, the chairman can reverse the ruling of this committee.

Earlier, the examining committee of the Central Board of Film Certification in Madras had refused to certify Shanmugam's film. According to board sources, the committee felt that the film, by showing that the cancer of political corruption had eaten deeply into the current system, would cause widespread disaffection towards the Government. It also felt that there were derogatory references in the film to many identifiable Tamil Nadu politicians.

However, the revising committee which viewed the film a couple of months ago, gave it a 'U' certificate with as many as 18 cuts. Its report remained buried in the office of the chairman of the Film Certification Board.

The film is suffused with native undertones of Tamil Nadu politics and delivers a sizzling political commentary. It is cast very much in Cho's mould of political satire. The irrepressible humorist makes his appearance in the film as a corrupt minister, reverentially referred to as Dr Arivarasan (who can miss the customary reference in Tamil to Tamil Nadu Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran by his partymen as Dr Chief Minister Revolutionary Leader MGR?)

Cho as Arivarasan: present-day politics

Arivarasan's business partner in money-making and social crime in the film is the proverbial industrialist Marudappan exemplifying the nefarious nexus between dirty politics and profiteering business. Marudappan gets hundreds of peasants thrown off their land for his proposed five-star hotel project. But with shrewd Arivarasan's help he is able to present his scheme as a hospital project in the interests of the poor. The whole story is about the fight of these peasants to get their land back.

It is a theme of proletarian crusading. But a pronounced undercurrent of contemporary Tamil Nadu politics runs throughout the film. To wit: a journalist probes Marudappan on his ministerial links and his hotel project. The businessman, like the typical wrongdoer, responds with an angry outburst. He later describes this encounter with the scribe to Arivarasan. The minister counsels Marudappan that it is not wise to show one's anger: "You see our chief minister; if he doesn't like you, he will embrace you at public functions." That piece of sage advice blatantly rings a bell: former matinee idol MGR is in the habit of publicly hugging his political adversaries.

The political gimmickry doesn't end there. To improve his political leverage with his own chief minister, Arivarasan even builds bridges with opposition leader Nagalingam. He later delivers a sermon in which he refers to democracy as a boxing bout: the boxers in the ring have to keep fighting for the collections to keep pouring in. If one knocks the other down that is the end of the show. Not only that: he tells Nagalingam that he will have to help in keeping the attention of the people diverted from the real issues. The moment the people start becoming restive, the two of them should kick up a shindig about the imposition of Hindi. The Government will name a district after periappa (elder uncle): the opposition leader should protest that it should be named after chinnappa (younger uncle). (DMK President M. Karunanidhi had demanded that Chingleput be renamed Anna district).

The visuals also brim with political comment. For instance Cho does election campaigning in the film, wearing dark glasses like MGR and Karunanidhi, and speaking with Karunanidhi's heavy Tamil accent. The bloody bandage on his head shows the violence by his opponents, but to the viewer it drives home the magic of MGR's fur cap.

But Cho insists that the film is not defamatory. "It does not vilify anybody. It only shows corruption at the political level seeping down to the grassroots." As for imitating Karunanidhi's accent: "There are any number of DMK politicians who speak like Karunanidhi." Contends the satirist: "The film is a general comment about the style of politics in Tamil Nadu today."

But the fact remains that Kanni Nilam Vendum is a bold political film rippling with Cho's satirical humour. In his characteristic style, Cho argues that if a politician feels defamed by the film, he must be ipso facto corrupt.

LAST WORD/RAJINDER PURI

Private Moments

WE all know what happens when world leaders meet accompanied by their aides. They issue joint communiques which are splashed in the press. But what happens when they meet alone, without aides or interpreters? That's what the world really wants to know. Well, we managed to obtain the tapes of the Rajiv-Gorbachev private meeting held in New Delhi last week. Excerpts:

Gorbachev: Greetings Comrade! At last we meet alone! Long live the Indo-Soviet Friendship Treaty!

Rajiv: Hi Tovarich, nice to see you! I'm glad you brought up the Indo-Soviet Friendship Treaty. I wanted some clarifications about it.

Gorbachev: What clarifications?

Rajiv: The Indo-Soviet treaty is 15 years old, yet our bonds of friendship continue to get stronger every day! Why is that so?

Gorbachev: Er.... I'm afraid I don't understand.....

Rajiv: You know I have signed several accords recently. After each accord relations have worsened rapidly, so what is the secret of the Indo-Soviet treaty? Why have our relations improved?

Gorbachev: Um.... ah.... well, I must think about it. Meanwhile comrade, there is one matter on which you can help me. We want to know Reagan's mind. Whenever you meet him please assess what he really wants and give us your report. Nobody in our party understands him. Our very future depends on understanding him!

Rajiv: Okay, but we want a quid pro quo. We also want to know somebody's mind. Whenever you meet him please assess what he really wants and give us your report. Nobody in our party understands him. Our very future depends on understanding him!

Gorbachev: Are you talking of Deng?

Rajiv: No, I am talking of Zail Singh. Please inform us if you ever succeed in learning what he really wants!

Gorbachev: Oh... er... ah... of course, of course! Another thing comrade, can't you be more forthright on Afghanistan?

Rajiv: You know how it is, Mikhail. Indians firmly believe that every country's future should be left to its own people, without outside interference.

Gorbachev: But my dear Rajiv, that's what we believe too! As we always say, let Russia be run by us Russians, let Poland be run by us Poles, let Afghanistan be run by us Afghans, let....

Rajiv (hastily): Yes, yes, I see what you mean, let me think about it.

Gorbachev: One last thing, Rajiv. People in Russia look up to you. We want you to be your own master. Please don't let anyone bully you!

Rajiv: I try Mikhail, believe me I try, but sometimes it's impossible to say no! The pressure is too great!

Gorbachev (grimly): You mean Reagan ....?

Rajiv: No, I mean Sonia. If I ever do take a firm stand Mikhail, can I count on your support?

Gorbachev (irritably): How can I commit right away, comrade? First I must ask Raisa....

UTTAR PRADESH

State of Paralysis

LAST month the state's employees achieved what the political bigwigs of Uttar Pradesh could not. For 19 days, before the strike was called off on November 29, they paralysed the entire state and succeeded in rattling Chief Minister Bir Bahadur Singh.

Under the agreement that was finally reached, the demand of 15 per cent interim relief—involving an annual burden of Rs 170 crore—has been accepted. A Wage Committee appointed by the state Government will also consider the strikers' main demand: parity of wages with Central Government employees—but "keeping in view the availability of resources". It will also go into the issue of fixing Rs 750 as the minimum wage. The Government was represented at the talks by Bir Bahadur Singh, Health Minister Lokpati Tripathi, among others. It was a last, sudden twist, for, just a day earlier, with the arrest of about a thousand employees and the alerting of the Army, the scenario had looked grim.

Never had the state seen a work stoppage of this magnitude. The last big strike—not nearly as well organised—occurred in 1966-67 and had caused the then chief minister Sucheta Kriplani's resignation. This time, it involved 15 lakh employees and by the time it was withdrawn, had caused a loss of well over Rs 1,000 crore to the exchequer.

Even though the state employees had been publicly threatening to launch a massive agitation in August, it was only on November 6 that the chief minister first invited employee leaders for a dialogue. As the talks progressed over the next few days, they rejected offers of interim relief. The stands of both sides hardened and employees stayed out of their offices on November 11. Then, the breakdown in negotiations on November 19 proved to be a serious reversal: doctors, engineers, finance and accounts officials, clerks and blue-collar workers in all departments walked off their jobs.

B.N. Singh, president of the Uttar Pradesh State Employees Joint Council which represents 168 associations, said the chief minister's attitude had been too rigid. Added J.P. Awasthi, president of the Uttar Pradesh Sachivalaya Mahasangh, which represents nine associations of Class I to Class IV employees: "No government can fight its own might."

Several politicians chose this chance to embarrass the Government. Lokpati Tripathi, a long-time contender for the chief minister's chair, also jumped into the fray. His intervention, in fact, only served to aggravate the situation.

The show of strength between the Government and the employees was largely in evidence on November 14, the day the chief minister was away in Allahabad to receive Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. Over two lakh employees from various districts collected in Lucknow and started a march towards the secretariat, defying prohibitory orders. Police sympathy for the strikers was evident. They resorted to a mild lathi charge only after interminable prodding by their officers.

Bickering among senior ministers had made matters worse. During a cabinet meeting on November 19, while Tripathi suggested that the employees' demand for parity be conceded, Transport Minister Sanjay Singh pleaded for stern action against them. Most of the other ministers remained silent. In dealing with the crisis, the chief minister was hamstrung by the problem of not knowing which colleague to trust.

So complete was the strike that once the chief minister himself had to operate the lift in the secretariat annexe to reach his office. Another time, he had to wait outside his office for over five minutes as the newly-recruited homeguard fumbled with a bunch of keys to find the one that fit the lock on his door. On November 16, the chief minister used the police escort car to reach the airport because his official driver had joined the strikers.

Bir Bahadur Singh clearly had not expected everything to come to a grinding halt. Even as late as November 14, he told INDIA TODAY: "What do they think, they can fight the Government and win?

In dealing with the crisis, Bir Bahadur Singh was hamstrung by not knowing which colleague to trust.

INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION A STEP IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION

Companies of the ENI Group are always working towards this end in all continents of the world.

Today, over one third of the total revenue of the Group is derived from sources outside Italy through the supply of goods and services, many of which, due to their advanced technology, have been incorporated into the industrialisation and development plans of many countries and which have also helped Italian products to penetrate those markets.

ENI Group companies are involved in all aspects of the energy sector, including the chemical industry, engineering and services, mechanical manufacturing, textile machinery and textiles, along with mining and metallurgy.

In some of the sectors, such as engineering and services and mechanical manufacturing, Group companies are more heavily involved in international projects than in the Italian domestic scene.

Hyderabad is a harmonious blend of tradition and progress. The past, and the present.

Charminar, the high watermark of Indo-Saracenic architecture, stands towering over the bustling bazaars of the old city. A short drive away from Hyderabad are the ruins of the once famous Golconda Fort.

The sheer magnitude and meticulous planning of this fortress still inspires awe. So do the aesthetically designed Qutub Shahi monuments, which contain the mortal remains of the Qutub Shahi rulers.

Salar Jung Museum-perhaps the largest and most fascinating one man collection in the world. The Birla Planetarium which reveals the secrets of the sky. There are numerous picnic spots around Hyderabad. Vast man-made lakes like Himayat Sagar, Osman Sagar, and Hussain Sagar, are favourite recreation spots. Boating and water sports facilities are provided at the Hussain Sagar lake. Then there is the famous Mecca Masjid, the Venkateswara temple sculpted in marble, the Osmania University, Nehru Zoological Park. The list is endless.

Come to Hyderabad, Andhra Pradesh. For a memorable holiday.

We have offered to constitute a committee to consider the demands."

But later there was a change in his attitude. In the past, Singh had argued that the additional burden to the exchequer, if parity was granted, would be Rs 700 crore annually and would plunge the state, which already spends 45 per cent of its Rs 4,000-crore revenue on salaries, into a deficit. But on November 19, he altered his stance and announced an interim relief of 12.5 per cent with a minimum increase of Rs 65 and a maximum of Rs 250—involving an additional expenditure of Rs 135 crore. Employee leaders flatly turned down the offer. "A 15 per cent ad hoc increase in wages for the interim period is the only choice left with the Government now," B.N. Singh had warned.

The employees had valid reasons for being stubborn. The recent recommendations of the Central Pay Commission have created gaps ranging from 10 per cent to 88 per cent between the salaries drawn by Central and state employees. While the lowest grade at the Centre is Rs 750-940, in Uttar Pradesh it is Rs 305-390. Similarly, the highest grade at the Centre is Rs 9,000 while in Uttar Pradesh it is Rs 4,500. Though state employees get 84.6 per cent as dearness allowance, the salary gap is still wide.

According to striking senior Finance officials, fears of a deficit were unfounded. They argue that the state actually has a surplus revenue of Rs 578.97 crore for which it has not shown any expenditure. It has therefore denied itself the benefit of deficit financing under Article 275 whereby the Centre has to plug the complete deficit of the state. The

STATE EMPLOYEES

Cry for Parity

THE year 1986 will be remembered as the year in which government employees fought for—and got—more. Ever since the recommendations of the Fourth Pay Commission were accepted by the Union Government earlier this year, rumblings of discontent have been evident all over.

In the north, Rajasthanis had to suffer as state government employees walked out of their offices on November 10. Their demands: similar salaries, bonus and facilities as Central government employees. The strike was nearly total and the Harideo Joshi Government was left tottering under its impact.

On November 16 Joshi unilaterally announced concessions which involved an additional annual burden of about Rs 80 crore. But unconvinced, employees stayed away. The Government says it cannot afford more for, if the demands are conceded, staff expenses will amount to 60 per cent of revenue receipts.

Meanwhile, on November 5, the state staff in Andhra Pradesh, whose situation largely compares well to people at the Centre, went on strike too. The four lakh non-gazetted employees were protesting against the delay in implementing the recommendations of the state's sixth pay commission with retrospective effect from January 1, 1986. Plus they wanted a minimum pay of Rs 750.

Though Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao had accepted the commission's recommendations—whose implementation will mean a burden of Rs 133 crore annually—formal orders were issued only on November 20 when the strike was two weeks old. But if all the demands are met, the additional annual burden will be not Rs 133 crore but Rs 193 crore. This time—unlike 1983—there was little sympathy for the strikers. At the outset, Rama Rao announced concessions amounting to Rs 20 crore, but he went back on this soon after and offered minor sops totalling just Rs 2.6 crore.

But the government employees in Gujarat were certainly the luckiest. A vocal—but small—section of employees had only begun grumbling at the state capital, Gandhinagar, when Chief Minister Amarsinh Chaudhary meekly gave in and announced pay parity with Central government staff. His surrender—cost: Rs 376 crore annually—surprised the employees themselves. After the hike, expenditure on employees will be Rs 1,150 crore—or more than half the state's annual budget allocation.

In Maharashtra, after a 54-day strike in 1977-78, the state Government had declared that it would follow Central Pay Commissions' recommendations in future. When, this year in August, the employees made clear their intention to go off work, in October a government announcement said that the recent Central Commission's standards would be implemented—but with a 25 per cent cut. The logic for this cut was that state employees already received that much more than at the Centre. But numerous points have not been clarified and another strike notice has now been served.

Indications are, the reverberations of the impact of the Central Pay Commission will be felt for a long time to come.

employees' leaders contended that a commitment to give parity to state Government employees would entail only Rs 326 crore—and not Rs 700 crore as stated by the chief minister—in additional expenditure and that the state would still be left with a surplus.

Employee leaders also noted that while MLAs recently received fat salary increases, they got nothing. From a net salary of Rs 200 per month in 1947, MLAs now take home Rs 3,500. They also argued that the Government was earning Rs 100 crore per year as interest on the money deposited by the state employees under the general provident fund, pension, insurance and other schemes. The accumulated sum of these funds is Rs 954 crore, on which the Government earns 18 per cent interest, while employees are paid 12 per cent.

That the employees' anger was widespread was also evident from the fact that, for the first time in the state's history, medical services virtually ground to a halt. Dr O.P. Singhal, president of the Provincial Medical Association, said that 80 per cent of the indoor patients in the state hospitals were discharged and new ones were not admitted during the strike's duration. Even emergency services were paralysed because Class IV employees and pharmacists in government hospitals joined the strike. Later, power engineers threatened to plunge the entire state into darkness and the Water-Works Department said it would cut off water supply, starting with the chief minister's residence. Primary and secondary school teachers struck work on the very first day. The roadways alone lost income of Rs 60 lakh per day, according to official figures.

The state employees had planned their agitation thoroughly. They collected funds with contributions ranging from Rs 10 to Rs 50 in preparation for the "jail bharo" phase. The employees' rally on November 14 alone cost the association Rs 15 lakh.

In a test of strength and battle of nerves of this kind, public sympathy is a crucial factor for both sides. But this time round, neither won on this count at least. The general mood was neither with the politicians nor with the employees, because both groups are regarded as corrupt, venal and thoroughly inefficient. Who gained to what extent ultimately is bound to be argued in the coming weeks. But one thing is certain: the people of Uttar Pradesh lost.

KARNATAKA

Screen Test

Karnataka Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde was aghast when J.H. Patel, large and medium-scale industries minister, stared him straight in the eye and said in the middle of a distinguished gathering last month: "He has no moral right to continue as the chief minister and I will not sleep till he is removed."

Another move to topple Hegde? No. Patel was only reciting his dialogue for a film he is acting in, as Hegde held the clapboard for the muhurat shot at a Bangalore hotel.

The muhurat ceremony turned out to be something like a Janata Party meeting with all notable partymen present. Their interest in the film, Avasthe, was not surprising: Besides Patel, Abdul Nazir Sab, Janata MLA and rural development minister, former agriculture minister M.P. Prakash; former speaker and Janata Rajya Sabha member D.B. Chandre Gowda too have roles to play in this political film. Director Krishna Masadi said he was even trying to get Rajavardhan, government chief whip in the state Assembly and Janata MLC B.K. Chandra Shekhar, to act in the film. Shekhar's wife is already doing a role. Said Masadi: "It is just apt that politicians should act in the film." And politicians apart, B.V. Karanth, who recently hit the headlines in an alleged murder case, will be the film's music director apart from doing a small role himself, but only if he is allowed to come to Bangalore by the Bhopal police, said Masadi.

The film Avasthe (phase), the shooting of which was in full swing last fortnight, is the brain-child of Director Masadi who conceived of it two years ago. He said the idea of involving politicians "was to give the film a natural effect. Patel was once a close associate of Gopala Gowda, the main character in the film, and so readily agreed to associate himself with the project." Other politicians soon followed. Based on a novel by noted Kannada writer U.R. Anantha Murthy, it chronicles the life of Gopala Gowda, a socialist leader of Shimoga district who played a considerable role in the state's politics in the '50s and '60s.

The story is about Gowda, who started as a small-time politician fired with idealistic enthusiasm but was later caught in the tangled web of political corruption and intrigue. As a small boy, he saw his father being murdered heartlessly by property-greedy uncles. But a roving tantrik Maheshwariah "discovered" the boy and offered to educate him. Gowda later became an MLA and found himself fighting corrupt temptations from greedy contractors and landlords. Later, dissident ministers plotted a conspiracy to oust the chief minister and put Gowda in the chair. But in the end Gowda's personal life—his shaky marriage to a bank employee—as well as his political career landslided to a tragic end.

"The story is a bit complicated and the making of the film a difficult proposition," admitted Bharati Gowda, a sub-editor with The Times of India and a member of the Regional Board for Film Certification, Bangalore, who designed the costumes for the film, her first such assignment. But Masadi—believed to be "obsessed" with Avasthe—who took to films after leaving a local Kannada weekly, is much more optimistic. As he put it: "I am trying to make an art film without the usual hangups." Added Archana, who is playing the girl Gowda falls in love with: "The way the film is going I am sure it will not be a bore and will carry the audience through." Like Masadi for whom Avasthe is the first independent directorial venture, journalism graduate Archana too has landed her first acting assignment.

While Anant Nag is busy poring over all available material including the politician's speeches, Masadi clarified: "The novel is not an exact biography of Gowda and so I am trying to be faithful to the novel but not to what Gowda actually said or did." Prakash, who had directed about a dozen plays and even acted in some till he became a transport minister and later agriculture minister in the Hegde ministry, is playing the role of Maheswariah, the enigmatic tantrik. Said he: "I think more than anything else the starcast might attract audiences."

Politicians are not known for promptness and punctuality—a fact which was evident during the film's production. It was originally planned that Nazir Sab should play Rehman, a dissident MLA, and Chandre Gowda the police officer Joshi investigating the hero's suspected Naxalite links. But since Sab was not available on the day his scene was to be shot, Masadi quickly interchanged the roles of the rural development minister and the Rajya Sabha member. Said an amused Sab: "I am not sure what role I will play finally." He said he had agreed to act because "friend Anant Nag insisted". But with the people's reaction to politicians appearing on television not being very flattering, it is to be seen how their appearance on the cinema screen will be taken.

PENSIONERS

Ray of Hope

THE long-awaited Fourth Pay Commission report on pensions is expected any day in the coming month. Having diligently gone through 500 memorandums, 200 replies to questionnaires, and heard representations of 100 groups and individuals, a much-depleted pay commission office was putting the "final dressings" on the report last fortnight. The pensions report, expected in the last week of October initially, has been considerably delayed due to the demise of the pay commission chairman, Justice P.N. Singhal last month. According to officials, the finalisation work that had already begun on the pensions report came to a virtual standstill during the three weeks that Justice Singhal was in hospital. The pay commission had earlier lost two of its five members, Dr Gopal Das Nag and J.P. Kacker. Despite the fact that the chairman's death has left only Professor M.V. Mathur and Member-Secretary A.K. Majumdar to deliberate over the pension matter, the Government has decided not to appoint another chairman, and has asked the two to complete the report on their own as soon as possible.

Despite the demise of the chairman, Justice Singhal, Majumdar and Mathur have been asked to complete the report on their own as soon as possible.

The work of the commission has been enhanced following the November 8, 1985 resolution of the Government by which the commission was asked to also consider the pension structure (including-death-cum-retirement benefits) of past pensioners besides deciding the packet due to future pensioners.

According to indications available, the commission has made efforts to simplify and rationalise the structure of pensions just as it had earlier revised the pay structure in its salaries report submitted in July. It is also expected to recommend means of removing difficulties presently faced by pensioners at all levels in the settlement of their pension claims and its withdrawal.

In all representations submitted before the pay commission, one common thread running through is that just as there is the principle of "equal pay for equal work" there must be "equal pension for equal quality of service" irrespective of the period during which the service has been rendered.

The Government had agreed to this principle following the historic Supreme Court decision that the Government could not discriminate between pensioners merely by virtue of their date of retirement. But the anomaly has arisen again following the drastic increase in the basic pay of Central Government employees, entailing higher pension packets for future pensioners. The pensioners have been stressing before the commission that the hike in salaries, does not really represent any increase in emoluments but only neutralises the increase in the cost of living. This increase, they emphasise, is equally applicable to pensioners, both past and future, and therefore, all pensions should be computed on this latest level of pay of equivalent rank.

The fact that pensioners were left out from the interim relief granted to serving employees in anticipation of the Fourth Pay Commission report has also generated a lot of misgivings. Pensioners have pointed out that relief against price increase should be the same for all. At present even the level of dearness relief applicable to pensioners is far lower than that applicable to the serving employees.

The recent Judges Salaries Act passed by Parliament allowing 50 per cent of the last salary drawn as pension for judges has also served as ammunition for pensioners. They assert indignantly that this principle should be agreed to as a general governing principle for all categories of pensioners. As of now, the pension is calculated as 50 per cent of the first Rs 1,000 of his last level of emoluments, 45 per cent of the next Rs 500 and 40 per cent of the balance.

The family pension due on the death of an employee is another disputed point since the maximum ceiling is fixed at a ridiculously low Rs 250. The pensioners demand that this should be at least 50 per cent of the pension due to the officer.

The pay commission is also expected to take up the issue of the restoration of pension commutation, a matter being fought in the Supreme Court for the past three years. Despite the fact that the verdict is yet to be announced, and the matter is considered sub judice, the commission is likely to "express a view". Until now employees upon retirement have been allowed to commute and take as a lumpsum one-third of the pension due to them for 10 years, with the balance two-thirds paid to them as monthly instalments. The point of dispute has been that if the pensioner lives beyond the period for which he had received commutation, even after that the amount paid to him is just two-thirds of his pension. The Government has recently agreed in principle in its case before the Supreme Court to restore the commuted value of the pension after 15 years of retirement or the attainment of 70 years "whichever is later". They also want the commuted value of pensions of those taking premature retirement to be restored after 12 years of retirement or at the attainment of 70 years "whichever is earlier" and are waiting for the pay commission's "advice", which going by precedent is generally accepted.

This being the first time the Government has asked a pay commission to take into its fold the allowances given to past pensioners, more than 70 lakh pensioners (including those from the state Governments and public sector undertakings who are indirectly affected) are waiting in the twilight of their lives for small rays of happiness from the pay commission office. —TANIA MIDHA

GUJARAT

Poll Presents

IN a fast changing political culture, some things hold constant. And distributing governmental largesse on the eve of the elections has now got the sanction of tradition. So there was hardly a murmur of protest even from the Opposition when the otherwise shaky and indecisive Gujarat Chief Minister Amarsinh Chaudhary confidently announced a plethora of schemes "to help the poor" last fortnight. The objective was only too obvious. Elections to the state panchayat and municipal corporations of Ahmedabad, Vadodara, Surat, Rajkot, Bhavnagar and Jamnagar are to be held in January next year.

Ever since he came to power 16 months ago, Chaudhary has done little which gives him or the party a headstart in the elections, which is going to be his first major test. Obviously, he does not want to take chances and poll gifts seem to be the best bet.

True to his style of functioning, the details of how much these gifts will cost the state and how the money is to be found are delightfully vague. Chaudhary says he has not worked out the financial estimates but is sure that it would cost "crores of rupees".

The new schemes, which will be started with immediate effect, are:

► Insurance cover to over 2.8 million landless labourers. The Government would pay a premium of Rs 11 per labourer every year and the worker would have an insurance cover of at least Rs 1,000. This will cost more than Rs 3 crore a year.

► Around 5 lakh square metres of government land would be distributed to 2.7 lakh slum dwellers to construct houses with the help of a government subsidy. A 25 square metre plot would be given to each family at just 10 per cent of the market price.

► The Government would build 30,000 tenements in rural areas for the poor at a cost of Rs 6,000 each.

► Subsidised land would be given to cooperative housing societies set up by Harijans or backward communities for constructing houses in urban centres. For this also, plots of 25 square metres would be given at 10 per cent of the market price.

► The minimum electricity charge for 10 HP pumps used by farmers has been abolished. The revenue loss is at least Rs 5 crore.

► The Government would provide support prices to cotton, paddy, groundnut, tobacco and onions.

Chaudhary straightfacedly said that these concessions were decided on not because of the elections but because "this was the only way to pay a tribute to the late Mrs Indira Gandhi, who had tirelessly worked for the uplift of poor masses." He had cleverly timed the announcement to coincide with Mrs Gandhi's 69th birth anniversary on November 19. But the fact that he insisted that all these programmes should be implemented with immediate effect made his intentions clear. newly-devised schemes are just a vote-catching gimmick."

Apart from election considerations, the concessions to farmers have been announced in a bid to mollify the farmers of Mehsana, Banaskantha, Sabarkantha and Gandhinagar who have launched a "no-tax" agitation demanding reduction of power rates.

Chaudhary, moreover, has come up with expensive poll gifts at a time when the state is reeling under an unprecedented financial crisis caused mainly by his quixotic decisions. Just last month, the chief minister played to the gallery by giving in to the demand from a vocal section of state government employees who demanded a pay hike. While most of the employees had not even given voice to the demand, Chaudhary quickly succumbed fearing another state-wide agitation. He announced a hike raising their salary to the level of Central government staff and some additional benefits like medical allowance, encashment of leave travel concessions, interim relief as also two instalments of dearness allowance. This has cost the exchequer Rs 376 crore.

The chief minister is now in for a tough time. The state has just sunk in Rs 400 crore to meet the severe drought early this year. His demand that the Centre should give grants of 80 per cent of this expenditure was shot down with only Rs 86 crore from New Delhi. Major development schemes in the state have ground to a halt due to the shortage of funds. Even crucial irrigation schemes have been suspended. But Chaudhary is optimistic about devising ways to collect funds to meet the whopping cost of his new schemes. He is currently singing the poll tune and who pays the piper is, of course, the last thing on his mind.

ARJUN SINGH

Under Siege

THE place was guarded like Fort Knox. Policemen surrounded every inch of the huge estate. An additional police force was summoned from neighbouring districts and the entire 16-km stretch leading to the mansion was lined with armed policemen, many of them concealed behind bushes. Mobile vans equipped with wireless sets constantly patrolled the area. The police had erected a four-tiered barricade 2 km away from the place to prevent "undesirable elements" from proceeding towards it. Fire brigades, ambulances and water lorries were in readiness. Ignoring the presence of several VIP's in town that day, the Bhopal collector and SP personally camped on the spot. It was as if the authorities had geared themselves to oppose an invading army.

All this was done to prevent a handful of political demonstrators from "forcibly occupying" Union Communications Minister Arjun Singh's palatial mansion at the picturesque Kerwa Dam on the outskirts of Bhopal. The Socialist Party, led by Raj Narain, had decided to occupy the "place constructed from ill-gotten wealth", on Nehru's birthday, November 14, and "dedicate it to the nation".

The police went out of its way to ensure that the threat was nipped in the bud. In a mid-night swoop before the rally, it arrested Kalyan Jain, Socialist Party vice-chairman who had come from Indore to lead the demonstrators, and three other party leaders. Next morning, as they marched along they were stopped at the barricade before the mansion and all 279 of them, including 59 women, were arrested under Section 151 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (to prevent the commission of a cognizable offence) after a scuffle.

The mansion at Kerwa Dam; and (inset) Arjun Singh

Chandramani Tripathi, president of the Madhya Pradesh unit of the Socialist Party, who led the demonstration in Jain's absence, charges: "Arjun Singh is a symbol of corruption in the ruling party." Five months ago, Tripathi had lodged a complaint with the State Bureau of Investigation, accusing Singh of acquiring property disproportionate to his known income. "They have so far taken no action," said Tripathi. Inquiries revealed that the bureau had sent the complaint to the state Government for forwarding to the Lok Ayukta. However, the Lok Ayukta office has not received it so far.

Built on a vast 10 acre plot, the house, guarded by police and privately-hired toughs, has been shrouded in controversy since its construction began two years ago. Singh's critics estimate the cost of the two-storied 9,000 sq ft house to be between Rs 60 lakh and Rs 1 crore. However, Singh claims it cost between Rs 16 to Rs 17 lakh.

But the Opposition points out that in his list of assets submitted in the state Assembly on March 3, 1960, Singh had declared only Rs 2,500 as his bank-balance. "From where has he got so much money to construct this palatial house?" asked Tripathi. "That statement was submitted about 30 years ago and, besides, my two sons have grown up and they are not unemployed," explained Singh.

Some years ago in the state Assembly, former BJP MLA Vikram Verma had demanded to know the assets of Singh and his family before and after he became chief minister. The question was disallowed on grounds that it was "not in the public interest".

Judicial History

THE Karunakaran Government in Kerala faces its most potent opposition from a most unexpected source—the high court. In the four years of the Karunakaran reign, half-a-dozen court verdicts have been embarrassingly critical of ruling front ministers. Moreover, three of them have had to resign following critical judicial rulings. But last week, Justice Sukumaran's interim order on the two writ petitions filed by Priyadarshini Congress Chairman Kallara Sukumaran and N.F. Silvester challenging the appointment and continuance of Balakrishna Pillai, electricity minister in the Karunakaran Cabinet following his seditious speech last year in Cochin, threatens to create momentous judicial history.

The findings of Justice Sukumaran—that Pillai had violated the oath of office and the accompanying strictures passed on Chief Minister Karunakaran—is unique for it is the first time in the country that a minister has been found having "violated the oath of allegiance to the Constitution". It is also the first time in judicial history that a video cassette (of Pillai's Cochin speech) has been used as a piece of evidence. And it is also the first time in Kerala that a minister may have to resign for the second time following critical high court observations.

The Balakrishna Pillai issue surfaced in May last year when, at a Kerala Congress convention in Cochin, Pillai let loose a virulent anti-Centre tirade. Newspaper reports of the speech suggested that Pillai had called for a Punjab-type agitation to wrest whatever was legitimately due to Kerala. Pillai concluded his speech by saying: "If what is happening in Punjab is to be repeated here, then we are also ready." His seditious speech came at a time when the relationship between the Kerala Congress and the Congress(I) had deteriorated, following Congress(I) attempts to wrest the finance portfolio from the then finance minister K.M. Mani on grounds of "financial mismanagement". Pillai later denied his Cochin speech but reporters who covered the meeting issued a statement saying that Pillai had spoken about a "Punjab model agitation".

K.C. Chandy, a Congress(I) activist, later filed a quo warranto petition seeking Pillai's removal for his seditious speech. Justice Radhakrishna Menon, admitting the petition, made the observation "that the minister should have resigned if he had made such a statement". Pillai did resign, after stating that he would return to the Cabinet once the court had given its final verdict. For almost a year, the controversy raged between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary.

BALAKRISHNA PILLAI

The very survival of the Karunakaran Ministry depends on the ruling of the high court's division bench in the Pillai case.

The case against Pillai, which was later referred to a full bench, held that it was for the chief minister and the governor to ascertain whether a person sworn in as a minister had violated the oath of office and secrecy. That ended the legal war, but the political battle continued to rage with the Kerala Congress realising that its political prestige was at stake. Karunakaran tried to pass the Pillai buck to the prime minister who diplomatically said it was for the chief minister to decide.

Meanwhile, K.M. Mani found himself isolated in the party following his efforts to counter Karunakaran's moves. The relationship between Mani and Pillai was also strained following Mani's decision to revamp the state Electricity Board without consulting Pillai. Pillai and Karunakaran made up and a deal was struck whereby Pillai would be reinducted in the Cabinet after a reshuffle in which Mani would lose his finance portfolio. Karunakaran then made a mockery of the law by obtaining a "fitness certificate" for Pillai to be taken back into the Cabinet from a retired high court judge K. Janaki Amma, who was asked to ascertain whether there was any violation of the law by reappointing Pillai. And he was reinducted.

It looked, for a while, that the Pillai problem had finally ended. But out of the blue another petition was filed by Kallara Sukumaran, the video recording of the Kerala Congress Cochin convention was finally admitted as evidence and the subsequent judgement has unleashed yet another political crisis. Says opposition stalwart K. Chandrasekharan, a practising lawyer and Janata Party leader: "The chief minister has violated the oath of office by inducting into his cabinet someone who himself has violated the oath of office administered to him." The Opposition knows that with elections due, they cannot get a more potent weapon than the court verdict to blacken the image of the ruling front. Says Karunakaran: "There is no question of resignation now, since the final verdict in the case is yet to be pronounced by the high court." Meanwhile, Pillai has refused to comment on the judgement and instead flew to Delhi for consultation with legal experts on the high court judgement. But the eventual loser will be Chief Minister Karunakaran since the very survival of his ministry depends on the ruling of the division bench.

Solidaire has always been a honest TV. We only say, it "Seldom fails". It's something for you to think about.

Nevertheless, we've built a strong after-sales service team eventhough you may seldom require service – a strength which we've always used only to our customers' advantage.

Which's why lakhs of people have been buying Solidaire. By now they all know one thing for sure. Ask them they're point blank about it : "Solidaire seldom fails; for that matter is there anything that never fails?"

Now, imagine those people who proved luck otherwise. They bought those 13 Solidaire TVs first, in 1978. Certainly they were being daring and adventurous.

Opposition leaders (top) in Idukki; and (left) Sugathakumari in Thankamani

WHEN Kerala Chief Minister K. Karunakaran took over the home portfolio from Vayalar Ravi last May, he had told his supporters that he wanted to "boost the sagging image of the Kerala Police, which under Ravi had become lack-lustre". But barely six months later, Karunakaran is finding it increasingly difficult to defend the policemen. In the current assembly session opposition members raised so many questions about incidents of police brutality that even a ruling party leader said: "The Opposition has never had it so good."

Karunakaran, however, complains that the reports of excesses by the police force are only aimed at discrediting him. He said: "The Opposition, with an eye on the forthcoming elections, is trying to exaggerate police excesses in the state in a desperate bid to pin me down and blacken my image in Delhi."

But even his supporters believe that he is giving too much of a free hand to the police "who have run amuck". Said Sugathakumari, noted poetess and environmentalist: "The men in khaki are the most dreaded lot in the state today and their excesses have assumed dangerous proportions."

The alleged "excesses" of the policemen include: forcing a tribal group of women to dance for them after consuming country liquor in Appara in Wynad district; wrenching one half of a man's moustache clean in the Nemom police station near Trivandrum; stripping and beating a father and son who had been brought in for questioning in the same police station; lathi-charging a peaceful rally of blind students protesting against the mismanagement of a private school for the blind in Alwaye near Cochin. In the last case the Kerala High Court ordered a compensation of Rs 10,000 to be paid to each of the injured following a petition filed by a blind boy's relative.

But it is the alleged rape of women in the Thankamani village of Idukki district that has sent the Opposition up in arms. The outrage which took place on the night of October 22 had its genesis in a clash between local students and the crew of a private bus. The students were reportedly roughed up by the bus-conductor, driver and cleaner and handed over to the police. Next day the villagers seized the bus and demanded an apology from the crew. The bus owner, a Kerala Congress worker, approached the local circle inspector A.C. Thampan, who is reported to be his close friend, to secure the release of the bus. But the police party which went to get the bus was driven away by the villagers and when a stronger force came back, it was stoned. The police opened fire leading to the death of a 60-year-old farmer.

About 42 vanloads of policemen, assembled from Idukki and neighbouring districts, then descended on the village. According to several accounts, a house to house search was launched; male inmates were beaten up and the women raped. However, after the departure of the police no attempt was made to have the women medically examined.

When the Thankamani issue was raised in the Assembly the chief minister denied that there was a mass rape of women by the police. An identification parade organised by the police in Idukki was boycotted by the villagers. Said Father Jose Kotoor, the local priest: "They had brought outsiders to take part in the identification parade and no woman was willing to testify that she had been raped." A mass dharna was organised in Idukki by the Opposition. Said E.K. Nayanar, the opposition leader: "Forty two petitions were received from women saying that the police had misbehaved in Thankamani." Karunakaran ordered a judicial inquiry and appointed Sessions Judge D. Sreedevi to conduct it. Said Karunakaran in the Assembly: "Your (opposition's) charge is that women in Thankamani will find it embarrassing to speak about their nightmarish experience to others. So the Government has decided to appoint a lady judge to bring out the truth."

And though Karunakaran suspended five policemen, including a circle inspector, on sustained opposition demand, it is unlikely that the people's confidence will be restored in the police, especially after the recent incidents. Seasoned politicians recall the fate of the first Karunakaran ministry which had to bow out just one month after being sworn in in 1977 following court strictures in the Rajan case, a college student who had died in police custody. They fear that Karunakaran's defence of his police force may have an upsetting fallout in the coming polls. How far this fear may be justified remains to be seen.

Drug Decline

AT least there's some good news from Tamil Nadu in the otherwise disastrous nation-wide drug addiction scenario. Heroin's high seems to be wearing out finally in Madras city. The incidence of drug abuse, which had begun to assume alarming proportions in the city's schools and colleges last year, has sharply declined this year according to the managements of these institutions. "Between November 1985 and April this year, 96 drug addicts had come to me for treatment. But after April this year, till the end of last month only 24 patients landed up," said Dr M. Naresh Kumar, 31-year-old psychiatrist and doctor.

Glorying in the good news was the police who believe that it was their policing and pressure on the pushers which has led to the decline. To prove their point, they say that the 21 seizures made by the Narcotics Intelligence Bureau(NIB) this year has yielded less than 1 kg of brown sugar, in contrast to the 26 recoveries made last year which yielded 8 kg of the drug. Also, while the police made five raids for opium both last year and this year, they recovered 56 kg in 1985 and only 17 kg this year. Inspector General of Police, Rajasekaran Nair, chief of the NIB, said: "These reduced seizures are in spite of our continuously stepping up our vigilance on drug peddling. I am convinced that this reduction is not due to any slackness on our part. It is because drug abuse itself has declined."

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

Chasing the dragon

Confirming this decline Father Leo Correya, principal of Loyola College said: "I have heard that there have been earlier instances of drug addiction in the college, but during the last five months I have not directly come across a single case of abuse."

One reason for this dramatic decline is heroin's sudden scarcity. The police trace its disappearance to the fact that Sri Lankan Tamil refugees, who were the major peddlers, have been slowly going back to Jaffna. The new Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Act and the conviction this year of Shivlal, a youth from Madhya Pradesh, to a term of 10 years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1 lakh has also served as a deterrent. The carrot and the stick method seems to have yielded positive results.

Natural Conflict

THE quintessential Indian dependence on whatever nature releases from its Pandora's box was seen in the variety of calamities suffered by Uttar Pradesh this year. Either severe drought or raging floods or both have spelt misery in each of the state's 57 districts: 54 were hit by drought and 45 by floods. And 32 districts were hit by both drought and floods.

PRASHANT PANJIAR

Drought area in Uttar Pradesh: perpetual blight

The resultant damage is an estimated Rs 2,801 crore and the state Government has asked the Centre for assistance worth Rs 882 crore.

In fact, 19 districts in the state have been newly designated "perpetually drought-prone" areas. Even if the rainfall is normal in these districts, which was not the case this year, drought is inevitable. Ironically, each of these "problem districts" has at least one river flowing by. Mathura, Agra, Etawah, Jalaun and Allahabad have the Yamuna, Lalitpur and Jhansi the Betwa, Hamirpur and Banda the Ken, Kanpur and Mirzapur the Ganga. Net loss from drought: Rs 1,698 crore.

Raging floods in mid-September dealt a further blow to a populace yet to recover from the havoc wrought by the drought, and caused water-logging problems in 8,925 villages. Net losses from floods: Rs 1,103 crore.

And now, there are conflicting reports of the extent of damage. According to Revenue Department statistics, the kharif crop faced damage of at least 40 per cent, but the Agriculture Department works it out at 20 per cent. At present, the two departments are in a deadlock on the issue of revising figures. In a state where even nature is in conflict with itself, this is hardly unnatural.

Cause Celebre

AFTER 17 months the Shiv Sena finally got down to publicly honouring the man it considers primarily responsible for its victory in the Bombay municipal elections in April last year. Last fortnight, at an elaborate function at Kamgar Maidan, it hosted a civic reception for Vasantdada Patil, now governor of Rajasthan. In the last phase of his chief ministership, Patil had fallen out of favour with the Congress(I) high command and was not averse to seizing an opportunity to embarrass the party's leadership. Thus, his equivocal response to a question in the state legislature about Bombay's status played into the Shiv Sena's hands. Bal Thackeray proclaimed his resolve to prevent Bombay being taken away from Maharashtra and, in a municipal election marked by low voter turn-out, got the Marathi-speaking vote and control of the corporation.

The party wanted to show its appreciation to Patil soon after he was appointed governor but he turned down the proposal as there were still unresolved corruption charges pending against him. A retired high court judge who inquired into a land scandal in Sangli, Patil's home-town, has submitted his report to the Government. Though it had not been made public at the time of the civic reception—it will be tabled at the Nagpur session—the report is widely believed to have exonerated him. Still, Patil took the opportunity at his reception to proclaim: "All charges against me have now been cleared." Patil also called on the gathering to "not consider outsiders your enemies" and urged the gathering to rally behind Rajiv Gandhi. Bombay Mayor Datta Nalavade presented Patil with a silver rath. Also present was Thackeray. However, Congress(I) leaders were conspicuous by their absence because of the timing of the reception—just a couple of months before the zilla parishad elections in which the Shiv Sena is expected to throw a serious challenge to the Congress(I) in several districts.

Urban Afforestation

THE relatively new concept of the afforestation of cities has caught the attention of the Government with several ministries chalking out plans to implement it in different states. The idea is the brain-child of anthropologists Kailash Malhotra and M. Vijayakumar who, for over a decade, have been travelling along the busy Barrackpore Trunk Road in

Trees bordering the ISI: multi-purpose uses

Calcutta to reach the Indian Statistical Institute (ISI) where they work. They admired the trees that lined the road but that was about all. But recently, they decided to have a more discriminating look at the role the trees played in the lives of the people using the road. This led them to come up with some fascinating findings. Of the 400 trees stretched along the 5-km-long avenue, 142 were used for 205 different activities—economic, social and religious. Some 54 trees were used as parking places for rickshaws, hand-carts and tempos, and also as bus shelters. Another 54 trees (neem and banyan) were used and venerated as places of worship. And the rest provided shade for diverse people like vegetable-sellers, cobblers, motor-vehicle mechanics and barbers. Also, tree cover on the road was totally inadequate and another 400 could have easily been planted. Ecologists feel that Calcutta, like other cities, has an ecologically insufficient area under tree cover. Said Malhotra: "The trees play a vital role in the lives of people, especially those belonging to the weaker sections. While we have been concentrating our efforts on afforesting rural areas, there is an urgent need to have a national policy on urban tree planting."

Cutthroat Competition

MADHYA Pradesh, with its literacy rate of 28 per cent is, at present, right in the midst of a newspaper boom. Papers are opening new editions, installing sophisticated computerised printing equipment, increasing the number of pages in existing editions and even paying hitherto unheard of wages to journalists in an attempt to improve the quality of their products.

SANJEEV GUPTA

MP Chronicle ad and (inset) Editor Maheshwari

The sudden increase in the newspapers' activities has been caused by cutthroat competition among the existing dailies in the state, as well as by the fact that plans are underway by two national chains of newspapers to launch new editions from Bhopal, the state capital. While The Times of India group has already been allotted a plot of government land for the purpose, the rival Indian Express is lobbying for procuring satellite time in order to publish a facsimile edition of the group's English and Hindi dailies from Bhopal. The Free Press Journal is already publishing an edition from Indore, 200 km away, and has also shed its conservative outlook to launch a facsimile edition from Bhopal early next year. The operative question, however, is whether the state capital can, with a population of seven lakh residents, three existing English dailies, seven Hindi dailies and half-a-dozen evening papers, accommodate still more new newspapers?

The Proprietor-editor of the Madhya Pradesh Chronicle, Prafulla Maheshwari, remains confident that the advent of national dailies into Bhopal would not cut into his newspaper's circulation. The launching of an English edition by the rival Bhaskar group in the city has already caused fierce competition, forcing newspapers to fish for journalists outside the state and pay them salaries that even chief editors of these publications were not able to manage until a few years ago.

TAMIL MILITANTS

Suspended Animation

THE fluctuating graph of efforts to end Sri Lanka's ethnic strife took an upswing after the Centre's offensive launched along with a crackdown on Tamil militants in Tamil Nadu. But prospects of a settlement are dim and the Indian involvement could boomerang on New Delhi. Senior Correspondent S.H. VENKATRAMANI and Senior Editor PRABHU CHAWLA report:

THE Rajiv Gandhi Government has literally caught a tiger by the tail. Having dealt itself a hand in Sri Lanka's ethnic strife by periodically raising the stakes for both the key players—the latest example being last fortnight's SAARC summit in Bangalore—New Delhi now finds itself inextricably trapped in an increasingly dangerous and debilitating game. However honourable the intentions, South Block is finding that its desperate attempts to broker a settlement of the Tamil tangle are like performing a trapeze act over a mine-field.

Nothing illustrates this better than New Delhi's curious—and clumsy—crackdown on the Tamil militants in Tamil Nadu immediately before and after the Bangalore summit attended by Sri Lanka President J.R. Jayewardene. Though the Centre has denied a hand in the crackdown, the militants and most observers are convinced that state Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran would not have given the go-ahead without New Delhi's tacit approval.

The pre-summit crackdown was, in diplomatic terms, a viable gambit since public opinion in Tamil Nadu had taken a sharp turn against the militants and there was little negative fall-out from the disarming of key militant groups.

Then, last fortnight, the Tamil Nadu police raided—for the second time—the militant groups, most importantly the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), and snapped their vital links with their counterparts in northern and eastern Sri Lanka by confiscating their communications equipment. Said LTTE spokesman A.S. Balasingham: "We lost all our eight wireless transmitters and receivers in the coastal areas of the state like Rameswaram, Mandapam, Vedaranyam, and Madras." Three transmitters operated by the Eelam Peoples Revolutionary Liberation Front (EPRLF) and one by the Peoples Liberation Organisation of Tamil Eelam (PLOTE) were also seized.

The sudden severance of communication links was a major blow to the militant leaders' ability to get constant information about the Sri Lankan Army and pass on instructions to their cadres on the island. Said Velupillai Pirabhakaran, LTTE leader and military commander, who undertook a highly-publicised 'fast unto death' in protest: "With this seizure of our communications machinery, the most vital link in our armed liberation struggle was broken. We got the impression that all these steps were taken to pressure us to sign a settlement with the Sri Lanka Government."

That was only too obvious. But the Centre underestimated the militants' deep-rooted mistrust of the wily Jayewardene. There was one further crucial misjudgement—the Indian Government's capacity to pressure the militants just did not work this time round, mainly because public opinion in Tamil Nadu had once again swung violently behind the militants. Even the Congress(I) leaders like the aggressive Rajya Sabha member P. Thangabalu sent telegrams to the prime minister protesting against the crackdown.

MGR, who had consistently created the impression that Pirabhakaran was his protege, found the militant leader impervious to his appeals. Soon after meeting key Indian negotiators, Union Minister of State for Home P. Chidambaram and Minister of State for External Affairs K. Natwar Singh, who were en route to Colombo, MGR said: "Pirabhakaran is not prepared to accept any suggestion. Nor is there any unity or consensus of opinion among the various militant groups. One group doesn't accept another's view. How can there be an early solution?"

The anticlimax to the drama came when the state and Central governments began accusing each other of responsibility for the ill-conceived crackdown. In what looked like an orchestrated campaign, the Centre publicly said that the state police had acted on its own. Said a Home Ministry spokesman: "We are shocked by the Tamil Nadu Government's action. We are trying to find out why this action was taken at this juncture." Said Chidambaram: "We are trying to find out the circumstances under which the state police took the action." But police officials asserted that they acted at the Centre's behest. Said a police source: "The Police Department only carried out orders from the competent authority. And you know the state Government wouldn't have given the orders of house arrests and arms seizures without clearance from the Centre."

But even without the crackdown, it was clear that the attitude of the Central and state Government to the militants has been hardening. The Centre is upset that the militants are recalcitrant and have been repeatedly rejecting outright the modifications the Sri Lanka Government has been making to its provincial council proposals without providing concrete counter-proposals. So far, only the moderate Tamil United Liberation Front(TULF) has come up with a set of counter-proposals recommending the formulation of a single Tamil linguistic state in Sri Lanka comprising the northern and eastern provinces. But the militants have been demanding what virtually amounts to an independent Tamil Eelam by reiterating the four cardinal principles they enunciated in Thimpu—the recognition of a unified and territorially contiguous Tamil homeland, recognition of a distinct Tamil nationality, grant of the right of self-determination for Tamils, and grant of the rights of plantation Tamils who are basically Indian settlers.

The Trincomalee corridor is crucial because the Tamils have been touchy about the alleged Sri Lankan ploy to divide their homeland into the north and the east.

The Government of India has been emphasising that it does not support the Tamil militants' demand for an independent Tamil Eelam state and will not even endorse their claim for greater autonomy than what Indian states enjoy. Despite the crackdown however, and the drama during the SAARC summit, when key militant leaders and MGR were flown down to Bangalore, the militants haven't budged an inch. Says EPRLF Secretary-General K. Padmanabha: "We are not against negotiations. We will cooperate with India in its efforts to find a peaceful solution to our problem. But we will not give up our struggle for a homeland."

It is precisely due to the Tigers' inflexible attitude that MGR, ostensibly under advice from the Centre, agreed to get tough. Moreover, the Centre was convinced that it could not allow militant activity to continue from Indian soil indefinitely. Not only was this causing considerable embarrassment to India's international image, it was also hampering New Delhi's attempts to put its views across forcefully enough on terrorism. Also, the hawks in the militant ranks were gaining the upper hand. Pirabhakaran's LTTE now openly says that it will take part in future negotiations only if it is recognised as the sole representative of the Tamil people of Sri Lanka.

Further fuel to the ethnic fire was added during the secret negotiations in Bangalore during last fortnight's SAARC summit. The meetings between Rajiv Gandhi and Jayewardene in fact, overshadowed the summit. MGR and Food Minister S. Ramachandran were summoned to Bangalore to let Central leaders know what kind of proposals would be acceptable to the militants. Reliable sources say that MGR convinced the Centre that he would make Pirabhakaran come round if Jayewardene yielded a little more ground and he went so far as to stick his neck out by getting the LTTE leaders to come to Bangalore. Accordingly, Pirabhakaran and his aides were flown to Bangalore, where Jayewardene unfolded his latest scheme of trifurcating the eastern province into the provinces of Batticaloa, Trincomalee, and Amparai, each with its own provincial council.

Till now, Jayewardene has been offering to make the north and the east two separate provinces. The Tamils have been insisting that the whole of the north and the east should form one united Tamil province. India in its mediatory efforts, has been trying to see if a provision for a linkage between the two provinces would satisfy the Tamils.

But in Bangalore, Jayewardene gave a little more in the east to the Tamils; he offered to form a Tamil-majority Batticaloa province, a Sinhala-majority Trincomalee province, and a Muslim-majority Amparai. He even offered to set up a boundary commission to demarcate the Tamil areas of Batticaloa and Trincomalee and consider if they could be merged with the northern province. Reportedly the Sri Lanka Government had earlier, through its own emissaries, tried to strike a deal with Pirabhakaran—he could become the chief minister of the northern Jaffna province if he agreed to the proposals and TULF leaders could seek parliamentary pastures. Despite all these behind-the-scenes preparations, Pirabhakaran and other LTTE leaders rejected the proposals as being "seriously inadequate" and reiterated the view that the north and the east as a whole was indivisible.

There is a background to Pirabhakaran's intransigence in Bangalore in spite of the Sri Lanka Government's offer of the Jaffna chief ministership. LTTE's regional commanders and cadres in Sri Lanka had reportedly told Pirabhakaran that he could not accept being chief minister after having taken shelter for so long in Tamil Nadu, leaving them to face the Sri Lankan Army all this time.

But in spite of MGR having given up hopes on Pirabhakaran coming round, the Centre is pursuing its mediatory efforts in earnest. The external affairs ministers of India and Sri Lanka, K. Natwar Singh and A.C.S. Hameed, worked out further improvements to the Bangalore proposals in Delhi, and Hameed has taken the final draft to Colombo to obtain Jayewardene's clearance to present it to the Tamils. Rajiv sent Natwar Singh and Chidambaram to Colombo to persuade the Sri Lanka President to accept the modifications worked out in Delhi. Reliable sources indicate that the modifications relate to the formation of a corridor under Tamil jurisdiction in the Trincomalee province to link the northern Tamil province to the eastern Tamil majority province of Batticaloa. The Trincomalee corridor is considered crucial because this strategically important province is the nothernmost of the three eastern provinces and Tamils have been very touchy about the Sri Lankan ploy to divide their homeland into the north and the east. They claim that in Trincomalee maximum Sinhalese colonisation has taken place.

But exactly how the Indian Government can still persuade the Tamil groups to accept any modified proposals is unclear. Rajiv Gandhi said in Bangalore that Jayewardene's trifurcation idea for the east was "a reasonable offer", but that did not prevent the LTTE from turning it down. Natwar Singh reported "progress" in the Bangalore talks and MGR specified in the state Assembly that some broad agreement had been reached in Bangalore on the devolution of powers to the provincial councils to be formed. But the Tamil leadership is still unconvinced. Said LTTE's Tilakar: "Devolution was not discussed at all. We were only sounded out on the trifurcation proposal, and we rejected it." Added EPRLF's Padmanabha: "No settlement can be enforced on us." And Pirabhakaran now says: "Our ambition is made of sterner stuff. And our stand on Eelam remained unchanged."

With the militants in a fighting mood and Jayewardene hampered by powerful local pressures in Colombo, New Delhi faces a diplomatic task of unprecedented magnitude.

New Delhi is thus caught in a delicate position. Popular passions in Tamil Nadu will prevent Delhi from trying to openly cow down the militants. Moreover, opposition parties like the DMK were silent only till the fear persisted that the militants were locally unpopular. And the fact that the recent police crackdowns coincided with the Sri Lanka Government's plans to launch a massive military offensive on the northern provinces has earned the militant groups a lot of extra sympathy. Much, therefore, will depend on the extent of the response from Colombo to the latest diplomatic offensive by Natwar Singh and Chidambaram. With the militants in a fighting mood, MGR threatened with losing political face, and Jayewardene hampered by powerful local pressures in Colombo, the Indian Government faces a diplomatic task of unprecedented magnitude. In trying to play the honest broker, India has found itself saddled with the initiative.

SONIA GANDHI

Enigmatic First Lady

FOR the first time since Independence, the country has a visible First Lady in Sonia Gandhi. And as the mini-centres of power around Rajiv Gandhi crumble—Arun Nehru, Arjun Singh, Arun Singh—the rumour spreads that the new mini-centre of power is none other than Sonia herself.

The result: new curiosity about the prime minister's Italian-born wife. What is she really like? Does she in fact play any role in politics, does she advise and influence her husband, how much does he listen to her, is she pulling the strings from behind the security curtain that envelops her? Indeed, what role should Sonia Gandhi play as the prime minister's wife?

Deputy Editor DILIP BOBB and TAVLEEN SINGH tapped well-informed sources in the capital and talked to some of the friends of the prime minister's wife to piece together this picture of the enigmatic Sonia:

HAD fate—in the form of assassins' bullets—not intervened, she would have probably been quite content to linger in the shadow of her formidable mother-in-law, her assiduously protected privacy undisturbed by the fact that she belonged to the most famous family in the land. But destiny—and dynasty—willed otherwise. Unwarned, Sonia Gandhi was suddenly pitchforked into the position she would have least wanted—India's First Lady.

It is, as the last two years have painfully revealed, a role she is not comfortable in. Compared to the relaxed style of her debonair husband, she appears awkward and wooden. Though impeccably attired and carefully groomed, her face, framed by luxuriant chestnut hair, is an immobile mask. Perhaps deliberately, her public personality has given her the image of a mere ceremonial appendage to the prime minister. She is not a Lalita Shastri, but neither does she seem cut out to be a Nancy Reagan or a Raisa Gorbacheva. And the fate of someone who falls between two stools is not a happy one.

True, the threads of tragedy have knitted her life into a ragged tapestry. She is currently perhaps one of the least envied women in the world. A foreigner flung into confrontation with the complexities of Indian political life, her husband the number one target on terrorist hit lists, her children unable to lead normal lives, her home turned into a grim and forbidding fortress, and heavily-armed security guards dogging her every footstep.

But all that has also seemingly forced Sonia to withdraw even deeper into her shell and inevitably turned her into something of an enigma. Despite all the spice-laden speculation, precious little is really known about her as a person. Her popular public image is her grim-faced vigil beside her husband at public functions or on his foreign trips. In between, she vanishes into her Looking Glass world, accessible only to a handful of friends who are as paranoid about her privacy as she herself. On one of Rajiv's tours, a female aide was asked to wave to the crowds from her car as a stand-in for Sonia. It speaks volumes for her public personality, or lack of it, that the deception was successful.

So there are the rumours, and the speculation. Disparate sections of the ruling party urge her every now and then—albeit unconvincingly—to take the political plunge as an office-bearer of the Congress(I), even party president. And according to one brand of rumour, Sonia is the power behind the throne, plotting the downfall of opponents through cabinet reshuffles (she didn't trust Arun Nehru, after all) and advising her husband on everything from the Kashmir coalition to Pepsi Cola's entry into India.

> It is a role she is obviously extremely uncomfortable in. Compared to the relaxed style of her debonair husband, she frequently appears awkward and wooden.

On all this, Sonia has refused comment, also declining to give press interviews. The only interview she has given in India so far was to a Hindi periodical in June last year. In that, she came across like a mushy Mills & Boon heroine ("When one is in love, that love gives the person an extraordinary strength of mind. This strength wards off any fears. The sole aim is to unite with the lover. Once that is accomplished, everything else is unimportant. I wanted Rajiv...and Rajiv is my greatest security.").

So what manner of woman is the Rani of Race Course Road? The power behind the throne or an ordinary housewife befuddled by events beyond her control? Her restricted circle of friends are the only ones who can flesh out the rigid contours of her being, and they do so reluctantly—and anonymously.

Sonia Gandhi (nee Maino) has of course all the physical attributes of the quintessential First Lady. She is young, has an attractive face and figure and the ability to carry herself with poise and grace. Her deep, husky voice carries faint traces of her Italian upbringing when she converses in English, and she understands Hindi perfectly though she speaks it haltingly. Sonia takes pains over her personal grooming, even when she is at home, and manages to look much younger than her 40 years. She maintains an elegant residence, has excellent taste and is almost a role model for the perfect hausfrau, wife and mother.

Before Rajiv's unforeseen entry into politics, both of them used to go to a fair number of Delhi parties where they would invariably be the centre of attraction, if only because of the Gandhi name. But even then, while Rajiv was relaxed and easy to converse with, Sonia was relatively shy and often preferred to stick by his side rather than circulate.

Friends differ on who is the stronger personality. Some say that it is Sonia, and point out that she has proved quite tough, for she has after all gone through a great deal. Others say that increasingly it is Rajiv who is proving the stronger personality. Whatever the case, Sonia seems to play the lead role when Rajiv is not being prime minister. Thus, it is she who decides who will come to the house, even sometimes who will be invited to official banquets. During the Gorbachev visit, it was Sonia who apparently made sure that Jaya Bachchan came for a banquet although the wives of several ministers and senior officials were told to stay at home because the guest list was too long.

RAGHU RAI

Sonia and Rajiv: close understanding

Those who have known her over the years detect a dramatic change between the Sonia who was Mrs Gandhi's daughter-in-law and the Sonia who is the prime minister's wife. Earlier, she used to laugh more easily and enjoyed meeting friends for shopping sprees, coffee or meals. Her conversations tended to be about things to do with the house rather than serious issues. Now, she is said to be more reserved, worried about the cloistered environment in which her children have to grow up, fretful about the constant security and of chinks in the armour. She only allows herself to be totally at ease and unguarded with her immediate family. In recent weeks, however, she is said to have become more relaxed, more accepting of her fate.

In the last couple of years, friends have advised her on what she could do. Culture was suggested as a possible area, but Sonia felt that as a foreigner there may be resentment if she got involved. There was talk of her participating in issues relating to the welfare of women and children and in the early days of Rajiv's rural tours, separate programmes would be laid out for her. But she did not show any interest in them either, preferring to be by her husband's side. When asked recently why she did not take advantage of her position to make an active contribution to women's and children's welfare, she replied: "I would like to very much, but I feel that if I said yes to one programme then I would have to take on others as well; and then I would have no time at all with the children."

This is in contrast to the days when Rajiv was an MP and she would make regular pilgrimages to Amethi to nurse the constituency as if it were her own. She would travel from village to village, addressing herself to such problems as health care, schools and drinking water. Arun Singh's wife Nina, who used to accompany Sonia, recalls: "Our day would begin at about six in the morning and end after nine at night. All day the women would come with their children, who invariably had eye infections or some other medical problem. And there used to be so much dust that it was quite amazing how Sonia never got one of her asthma attacks." Even during the 1984 elections, Sonia campaigned in Amethi, but she has hardly visited the constituency since.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

If she has withdrawn from Amethi, she shrinks from other public duties too, like speaking to an audience. Though she can talk animatedly in the company of friends, mostly wives of Rajiv's school and college chums, she has an in-built aversion to speaking in public. Since the last election, when she campaigned for her husband in Amethi, she has not made a single public statement. Her only public utterance, if it can termed that, was at the meeting organised by the Indian National Congress during Rajiv's visit to the US when, in response to prolonged shouts from the audience and whispered coaxing from her husband, she stood up to say: "I will say just two words, 'Jai Hind'."

She has obviously not taken very well to being First Lady. For her the stilted formality of official functions is almost painful and what disturbs her most is the sycophants. As she recently told a friend: "I love going with Rajiv into the villages because there at least people are direct and straightforward and only say what they mean. It is such a change to meet people who are not there simply because they have to be."

Bureaucrats in the Prime Minister's Secretariat confirm that she is most relaxed when in the villages. One of their favourite stories is of a trip to a village in Orissa where Rajiv and Sonia had gone into the hut of a poor peasant. A woman was there with a small baby in her arms. As they were about to move on, Sonia noticed that the baby had eye infection and immediately summoned the prime minister's doctor to examine the child. She asked the mother her name as she was leaving, and it turned out to be Sonia.

Sonia's problems stem from the fact that she seems unable to make up her mind about the kind of First Lady she would like to be, and that too in a country which has never really had one. Had she been a Lalita Shastri—unseen, unimportant, unknown—she would have been ignored. But her dilemma appears to be that she wants to be high profile without making the contribution that goes with it. In a land where there is no dearth of worthy causes, her 'decorative doll' public image has been of no help.

Her close friends say that stories about her influence really disturbed and irritated her in the beginning. But she has learned to ignore or accept them as part of the price she has to pay. When stories about her being the alleged power behind the throne were repeated to her recently, she commented to a friend: "Don't they realise that if I had that much influence over my husband he wouldn't have been an MP, leave alone prime minister?"

When asked about another related story doing the rounds—that she had managed to have her former Hindi tutor given a Rajya Sabha ticket from Madhya Pradesh—she retorted that although she did remember someone who had taught her Hindi in 1968, she neither remembered his name nor was she aware of how tickets were given or when. Friends admit, however, that because she and Rajiv are so close, he does often use her as a sounding board, trusting her gut reaction about certain people or events. In the US, for instance, Sonia sat up till 5 a.m. with Rajiv while he was giving the finishing touches to his speech to the US Congress because he wanted her reaction to it. But apart from that, friends say she is totally apolitical, and wouldn't know the portfolios of many of the Cabinet ministers.

In fact, her aversion to politics is the one thing about her that her friends are willing to talk about and recall that she tried very hard to dissuade her husband from becoming an MP. In fact, Sonia became eligible to vote only as recently as 1982 when she gave up her Italian passport and became an Indian citizen, and she has only voted once, in December 1984. Even after Rajiv became prime minister, her distaste for politics has not left her and she has tried to keep political matters as far from her home as possible.

The result is that although only a wall separates Number 5 and Number 7 Race Course Road, the two houses are so different that they could almost be in separate worlds. Number 7 represents the political side of Rajiv's life and consists of the usual series of sparsely furnished rooms and government-issue portraits of Mrs Gandhi and other leaders. Number 7 is reserved for meetings with politicians, Number 5 is strictly Sonia's preserve, where only family and close friends have access. This is as Sonia wills it, but as Rajiv wills it too.

BHAWAN SINGH

It is a beautifully-decorated home that perhaps is the only visible window to her personality. The objets d'art have been collected over the years from different parts of India. There are glass paintings from Tanjore, tribal art from the East and old wood carvings from the South. There is almost nothing European about the house and friends say that this reflects a conscious decision on Sonia's part to put Italy behind her when she came to live in India. When asked about this she once said: "I was so happy here that I had no reason to miss Italy. I missed the food so I learnt to cook but other than that I never felt like an outsider here. I learnt the language quite quickly so that helped and also I took to the customs very easily. I never thought of them as being strange."

She enjoyed visiting villages with Rajiv because "there, people are straightforward and only say what they mean".

The extreme privacy of their home has meant that the prime minister is cut off from the kind of informal political contact that is invaluable and which was a regular feature of the household that Mrs Gandhi ran. Indeed, it is because the household is open to only a few old friends, who make for an exclusive club, that there has been so much rumour-mongering about Sonia wielding surrogate influence, and of her friends using their privileged access to get things done for themselves and their friends. Asked about this, someone close to the Gandhi duo countered: "So what should they do? Stop seeing all their friends?"

Nevertheless, the Gandhis' inability or unwillingness to distance themselves from friends who have taken advantage of their friendship has resulted in at least some of them doing very well in their fields of enterprise (whether it is contracts for interior decoration or export deals with the Soviet Union). Some of the friends have even managed to dramatically alter their standards of living.

One of the people with whom Sonia most certainly did not get along was sister-in-law Maneka. The two had no common interests, friction was common and there was an infamous quarrel when Maneka complained that her pet dog was not getting its dog biscuits. One of the stories that Sonia herself recounted to a friend was about the time when she and Maneka saw the film Network, about a ruthless, power-hungry woman who as the top executive of a television network uses people to advance her own career and her network ratings. To Sonia, the woman represented evil and she said she was deeply shocked when, after the film, Maneka remarked that she would have loved to have been in the woman's shoes.

Constant exposure to the realities of Indian public life appear to have done nothing to alter Sonia's interests or to extend her horizons to doing something more meaningful than just being by her husband's side. In fact, she is almost exactly like any other upper class Indian memsahib whose interests are confined entirely to the world that is her home. She likes good clothes and nice jewellery, and has a taste for the good things of life even if they don't come cheap. Sonia is also said to be an indefatigable shopper. Friends say she can spend hours browsing around antique shops. Generally she is accompanied on her shopping expeditions by close friends, often one of the Bachchan wives. Rajiv's political life is to her his job, something that she does not really wish to become involved in.

It is this obsession with her privacy and her immediate family that is perhaps the key to her public personality. Friends say that Sonia's reluctance to get involved in any public activity is also because she feels there would be even more rumours about her being the power behind the throne if she played a less passive public role. And there is also the trauma of Mrs Gandhi's assassination. She was particularly attached to her famous mother-in-law, despite the vast differences in their personalities, and was shattered by her death, especially since she was the first to reach the body on that October morning and the horror of that day has never quite left her. She was the only member of the family at home when it happened and ran out when she heard the shots because she thought it was some servant child playing with firecrackers. As recently as last Diwali, she confided to a friend: "I cannot hear the sound of fire- crackers without it all coming back." In an interview to a British newspaper she said of her relationship with Mrs Gandhi: "The first words she said to me were 'Sonia, I'm a mother. Don't be afraid of me. After having brought up two children, I can now understand how much sympathy and love a mother who becomes a mother-in-law needs.' I always gave her understanding and she always gave me love. We never quarrelled. We were very close."

The trauma of the assassination was so severe that it brought on one of the asthma attacks she is prone to and she lost more than 10 kg in weight. It has also made her paranoid about Rajiv's safety. According to people in the know, she was constantly pointing out security flaws during Rajiv's early days as prime minister and she admitted after the trip to the US last year that she had spent it in a state of constant terror. But of late, and despite the October 2 incident, she has learned to be more fatalistic about the security threat and attributes it to the acceptance that what has to happen will happen.

But that does not prevent her from expressing normal maternal concerns about the upbringing of her children and the fact that they have to live in a state of virtual house arrest. However, she does try to make up by being around them as much as possible, especially since they deeply miss seeing their father as much as they used to. As a family they were exceptionally close, and Rahul and Priyanka have taken a long time to adjust to the fact that they cannot live normal lives. In the beginning, they were constantly asking if they could be allowed to go back to school and there is still a certain amount of heartburn over the fact that they cannot accompany their friends to parties and discotheques. On week-ends, they sometimes have friends coming over, but rarely go out themselves.

Friends admit that Rajiv often uses Sonia as a sounding board, trusting her gut reaction about certain people, events and issues.

Sonia's own day consists largely of attending to various chores around the house. Her life even before Rajiv became prime minister was always adjusted to suit his, and now it is even more so. Since she has kept away from Rajiv's political life, her official duties consist mainly of being at his side at official functions or playing reluctant hostess at various official dinners and receptions. As one British paper described her during an official visit to Britain: "She has been in the public eye all week, although few noticed her—beautiful, obedient, discreet and hating every minute of it."

One of the few official duties that she does seem to enjoy a great deal, however, is choosing menus for official banquets in Hyderabad House. According to sources in Welcomgroup, their corporate chef Richard Graham actually prepares the meals but Sonia decides what will be served. During the recent SAARC summit meeting in Bangalore, the final five-course menu for Rajiv's banquet for the heads of state was sent to Sonia for her approval and she requested that the main course be changed to something more Indian. Sonia herself loves good food and she and Rajiv could often, in the days before politics entered their lives, be seen dining at various Delhi restaurants. Their favourites were the Bukhara at the Maurya, the Orient Express at the Taj Palace and the Captain's Cabin at the Taj Mahal. Indeed, Rajiv was once described as a pilot growing plump on his wife's pasta.

Since Rajiv makes it a point to come home for lunch as often as possible, Sonia ensures she is always around since this is her one chance to see him during the day. In the evenings, he prefers to work at home after dinner so that the family can be together. Entertaining on a personal level is restricted to the occasional dinner party for a few close friends every three months or so, and just as occasionally are they able to visit friends on special occasions like weddings, birthdays and anniversaries.

When she has a few moments to herself, Sonia leaves the house to visit an exhibition or goes to the National Museum to pursue, in fits and starts, a course in art restoration. She is said to know a great deal about European art and is a serious museum-goer. Her other real interest is opera, and she can listen to music for long stretches. She is not very interested in books, but does manage to glance through most of the daily newspapers and some magazines.

Sonia's other interests are clothes and cooking. She is also said to have a weakness for Indian textiles and tends only to wear saris that are handloom—cottons and khadi for daily use and silks and brocades to grace grander occasions.

Relaxing at home: rare moments

When in the house or at informal gatherings she likes to slip into western clothes, which are generally bought for her by her sisters or parents who visit from time to time. Although she no longer finds time to do much cooking herself, she still takes a great interest in supervising the kitchen and friends say her favourite concoctions are mouth-watering lasagna and prawns in garlic sauce. Sonia was born a Catholic but is not deeply religious person. In fact, to avoid any religious problems, Sonia and Rajiv got married at a civil ceremony in Delhi.

One of Sonia's distinctive qualities is said to be her generosity. Friends invariably receive presents on birthdays and other occasions and she almost never goes to somebody's house for a meal without coming armed with some gift or the other. She also goes out of her way to help people in trouble even if they are not really close friends. There are innumerable stories of how she has rallied around friends in need.

Initially, her closest friend was Arun Singh's wife, Nina. The two were inseparable and met almost every day, but in recent months there has been a sharp cooling off in the relationship. Friends say that Nina Singh has not been seen in Sonia's house for months. This, however, does not seem to have affected Rajiv's own relationship with Arun Singh. But Sonia's extreme reserve and shyness prevents most people from becoming too close and their circle of friends has remained unchanged since Rajiv became prime minister.

Sonia's closest companion these days is Maria Quattrocchi, wife of the Delhi-based Italian business representative, Octavio Quattrocchi. Her other friends include the wives of the Bachchan brothers, Jaya and Romola, and Amitabh's mother, Teji who she has a close rapport with, Nimal Thadani, wife of a businessman friend and schoolmate of Rajiv's, advertising executive Romi Chopra, Rajiv's pilot buddy Satish Sharma and his Dutch wife, and Indian Express Editor Suman Dubey and his wife Manjulika. Her relations with the Quattrocchis have been cause for as much gossip and speculation as the business successes of other friends close to the Gandhis. Within the Congress(I) there is a great deal of resentment over the access that 'the friends' have to the prime minister, and the access is often through Sonia.

But Sonia has so far shown no desire to distance herself from any of her friends or, for that matter, add to their number and widen her own somewhat limited horizons. She may not be a Raisa Gorbacheva or a Nancy Reagan but she does, in the ultimate analysis, have a duty to perform, even if it is largely for the sake of the public image. Sooner or later Sonia will have to decide what she wants her role to be. She can either disappear completely into the world of shadows and privacy that she has surrounded herself with or step forcefully onto the public stage which, as prime minister, her husband is forced to occupy. In public life, and more so in political life, the middle road is not usually an easy one.

INDO-SOVIET RELATIONS

THE SECOND

SOVIET supremo Mikhail S. Gorbachev's four-day visit to India last week was a world event. Almost without warning, the real significance of the Gorbachev visit exploded like a geopolitical bombshell whose reverberations are being felt and analysed in almost every world capital. Overnight, a superpower and the leader of the increasingly influential Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) transformed what has been a somewhat hesitant and diffident relationship into an aggressive new partnership that could have far-reaching consequences for international diplomacy.

While both sides insisted that what had emerged by the end of the visit was not an alliance in the diplomatic sense of the word, but a deeper and more mutually meaningful relationship based on a brand-new realisation of "intelligent self-interest", there was little doubt that the two nations are now locked in what appears to be an ironclad embrace in almost every sphere of activity.

With the signing of the Delhi Declaration, the two countries announced to the rest of the world that their global interests now coincide more than ever before. Any lingering doubts about the defence relationship between the two countries were quickly dispelled with the Soviets offering—and India accepting—a virtual carte blanche for the procurement of the latest military hardware. In the economic field, India put its eggs more firmly in the Soviet basket and promised to buy not just more capital goods but also consumer items. And, in the area of technical and scientific cooperation the two nations entered a new phase in which the Soviets agreed to ease India into the area of high technology and the 21st century.

Specifically, the agreements include:

► The joint proposal for an international convention banning the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. As a first step, India already has plans to organise an international seminar on the subject early next year in Delhi.

► The Soviets agreed to "open all doors" for Indian participation and involvement in Soviet research programmes in high technology. Academician Marchuk, president of the prestigious Soviet Academy of Sciences and the Soviet Union's top brain in supercomputer research, will be arriving in India shortly to finalise the details.

► The unexpected Soviet offer to build an international space centre in India involving space scientists and researchers from all the leading space powers, which will have the capacity to launch space vehicles and satellites and conduct advanced laser research.

► An array of the most sophisticated Soviet weaponry including the Soviet version of the AWACS, an earlier delivery of the latest MiG fighters, air-to-air missiles capable of countering any foreseeable regional threat, new submarines and long-range naval aircraft.

► A dramatic expansion in economic and technical cooperation which includes new credit worth an unprecedented Rs 2,000 crore, for major projects mainly in the energy sector. Bilateral trade is now poised to go up fourfold in the next six years.

But it was essentially the timing that transformed the Gorbachev visit into what is probably the most major diplomatic exercise in modern Indian history.

With cold and calculated deliberation, the Indian Government used the visit to let the world know that, in a changing security environment, India was no longer embarrassed about holding the Soviet bear's hand in public.

Behind the pomp was the circumstance. There was a powerful compulsion in South Block at this particular moment in time to reaffirm India's relationship with the Soviets. When the Gorbachev visit was finalised several months ago, there were no significant geopolitical compulsions for New Delhi to afford it the kind of exaggerated importance it finally did. Had the visit occurred six months—even six weeks—ago it would have been billed as a "friend comes calling", a confirmation of the traditionally close ties and mutuality of interests between India and its gigantic northern neighbour. But recent events have added a new significance to the Soviet leader's visit that neither side had earlier envisaged.

Few people outside its cloistered confines realise the deep anger and disillusionment with the US that was generated in South Block by the recent visit of US Secretary of Defence Casper Weinberger to the region. Weinberger's visit was billed to be a new phase in Indo-US relations. In New Delhi, he emphasised America's deep and genuine desire to improve relations with India, made encouraging noises on the sale of the supercomputer and even defence equipment, and then at his next halt,

Islamabad, unveiled US intentions to supply Pakistan with the AWACS, the latest M1 Abrams tanks—which can hardly be used on the Afghanistan border—and the improved version of the F-16. In Indian eyes, Weinberger's actions—he had not given a hint of US intentions while in New Delhi—were not just seen as a betrayal but as a major insult. This is perhaps the crucial difference in South Block's eyes; the fact that the Soviets treat India not just as a regional power but as an independent global power. The Americans tend to treat India like an impoverished tinpot nation. In fact, the impact of the Gorbachev visit has not been lost on the Americans. As one senior US diplomat in New Delhi admitted: "A debate has already started within American circles about why we 'lost' India."

The Gorbachev visit and its implications were clearly designed to bring about what one Indian diplomat aptly described as "a sobering effect on capitals throughout the world". By what amounted to a public proclamation that its relationship with one of the superpowers had acquired an international stance, New Delhi was giving out unmistakable signals that it was deadly serious about protecting its global and regional interests.

The current shift in Indian perceptions was best illustrated by the fact that the 15th anniversary of the Twenty-Year Indo-Soviet Treaty of Peace, Friendship and Cooperation passed almost unnoticed two months ago. "The US has done a commendable job of reminding us of that treaty," says K. Subrahmanyam, director of the Institute for Defence Studies and Analyses and a long-time Moscow-watcher. There were, from the Indian Government's point of view, other urgent compulsions for boosting the Gorbachev visit to an elevated level. It was, in its domestic dimension, a deliberate statement directed at the Indian public. The border intrusion by China, the threat of the Pakistan bomb, the AWACS and the militarisation of the region had created a tangible sense of insecurity in the country. The visit was used to give public reassurance that, if it comes to the crunch, India has a powerful friend to rely on.

Even though Gorbachev, in his public appearances, seemed to be lukewarm in his answers to direct questions about the Soviet response to threats on Indian security from countries like China and Pakistan, in carefully-selected forums like the Indo-Soviet Friendship Society, he categorically stated that the Soviet Union would not stand idly by in case of any threat to "India's unity and integrity", adding, "we shall not take a single step in our foreign policy that could damage India's real interests."

It was precisely that awareness—a large majority of the Indian public is currently convinced that another war with Pakistan is imminent—that prompted India to turn the visit into a second honeymoon. This time, unlike previous occasions, India was clearly stating that its relationship with Moscow is to be the fulcrum of its foreign policy.

Gorbachev and Raisa plant a sapling at Rajghat: the new image

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

THAT stand was, somewhat surprisingly, heavily endorsed by a sampling of Indian public opinion on the eve of the Gorbachev visit. Despite the visible western orientation in Indian society, a snap poll conducted by a Sunday paper two days before the Soviet leader's arrival revealed that 93 per cent of those polled considered the Soviet Union as India's "best friend" and, more significant, 72 per cent felt that it was in the country's interest to have closer relations with Moscow as against 16 per cent who favoured closer ties with the US. Further, 68 per cent of the respondents backed India's policy of putting most of her defence eggs in the Soviet basket. The poll was widely seen as a reflection of growing public disenchantment with the US and its militarisation of Pakistan.

The visit was in turn used by the Soviet leader as an extension of his high-profile and high-priority international peace offensive from a new launching pad—India. Significantly, the team of officials accompanying Gorbachev to New Delhi was virtually the same brains trust he had at Reykjavik and which now advises him on policy issues. Having already gained considerable ground at Reykjavik in his role as a crusader of world peace—and in the battle for international public opinion—Gorbachev launched his latest peace missile, the joint call along with India for an international convention to outlaw the use of nuclear weapons. Since India has already sponsored a United Nations resolution along similar lines, New Delhi was only too happy to go along. If the Delhi Declaration does eventually lead to a convention and some kind of general agreement, Rajiv will get much of the credit for having dealt with one of the superpowers on an equal footing on a matter which is of interest not only to Asia and the Soviets but also to Europe and the American public.

Gorbachev's mission also contained a diagnostic element. Together with his key advisers, Gorbachev was here to make an on-the-spot assessment of the Indian leadership, its strengths and weaknesses, and the stability of the country. There has been not inconsiderable concern in Moscow at Rajiv's pro-West image and some criticism, most notably in Pravda last August 14, on his economic policies. Furthermore, Gorbachev does not have any sentimental legacy to fall back on like Khruschev had with Nehru or Brezhnev with Mrs Gandhi. Gorbachev is, in a sense, starting from scratch and he needed to reassure himself that Rajiv was someone he could trust in a crisis. By the end of the visit, however, the Soviets were apparently reassured on all counts.

ON another level, the Gorbachev visit and the new honeymoon with New Delhi dovetails neatly into the new Soviet strategy of projecting itself as a friend and sympathiser of the Third World and painting the US as a threat to Third World stability. In support of this strategy, the Soviets have been quoting US President Ronald Reagan's recent statement that "regional conflicts are more important than arms control". Moscow's good relations with New Delhi are thus a convenient peg on which to hang their new hat considering India's leading and highly active role in NAM and SAARC.

There are, of course, other compelling reasons, apart from purely historical ones, as to why the Soviets need India as much as India needs the USSR. The Soviets have realised fully well that they don't really have many friends in the international arena. Of its three most successful bilateral relationships outside the Warsaw Pact, the two with Cuba and Vietnam, based on costly subsidies, are a drain on the Soviets' already beleaguered economy. The relationship with India, apart from subsidised arms sales, remains economically viable. The relationship also legitimises Soviet relations with the rest of the developing world—the real arena in which its battle with the US is being waged.

In the wider context, Gorbachev has embarked on a totally new concept of "Soviet internationalism". His thinking is a radical departure from previous Soviet leaders: that the only way to counter the American threat was to achieve nuke-for-nuke parity. Gorbachev realised that this was falling into the US trap of diverting increasingly scarce resources away from internal economic development into a debilitating arms race. His strategy is aimed at mobilising international public opinion behind his peace crusade and to indirectly expose the Americans as a warmongering and destabilising force, specially in the Third World arena. The Delhi Declaration was a deliberate—and logical—extension of this strategy. If the US ignores the anti-nuclear convention proposal, it will be in danger of being isolated and branded as an outlaw nation. For Gorbachev, there was no better stage than New Delhi with India having already mobilised international public support for its Six-Nation Initiative on nuclear disarmament.

Gorbachev, however, carefully abstained from any sabre-rattling during the visit. He did not directly attack the US

Sidelights

IN what could well have been a display of Russian warmth Raisa Gorbacheva, in a gesture that is rather unusual in India, grasped National Museum Director Dr Laxmi Sihare's hand and held it for a few moments during her tour through the cultural centre. A completely bowled-over Dr Sihare was stunned by the depth of her knowledge of Indian art and philosophy. He also described her as the "most intelligent VIP I have ever escorted". She did not have the air of the wife of one of the most powerful men in the world, observers said.

The 50-minute tour took her leisurely through part of the pantheon of godheads on display, but the journey was hurried past the Shivalingam, thereby forestalling any opportunity for intelligent questions about this particular object d'art. Soonafter, a sculpture of a "courtesan fleeing from pursuing youths" arrested her attention. She wanted to know why the men were pursuing her. Pat came Sihare's response: the girl was a bit tipsy and the young men were helping her.

■ At the tea-party given for Raisa by Sonia Gandhi to meet the capital's female glitterati were present Amal Allana, theatre personality; Kamla Choudhary, chairperson of the Wastelands Development Board; Sheela Dhar, music expert; Geeta Kapur, art critic and historian; Pupul Jayakar, cultural adviser to the prime minister; and Veena Das, a professor from Delhi University. Raisa chit-chatted about several things. She talked about the Hindi films she had seen. Overheard: "I liked Disco Dancer." With Veena Das, Raisa discussed the role of the woman in the home. She said that even though she has a Ph.D. in social philosophy, it was important for her to "be a woman first" and to provide the warmth needed at home to her husband and children. Her Indian circle was fascinated to learn that she enjoys Indian classical ragas to which she was introduced by listening to Ravi Shanker's music after reading his biography, as well as the works of Rabindranath Tagore.

■ Just before the banquet dinner at Hyderabad House, the prime minister's office called the wives of some of the senior ministers and told them that they should not attend the dinner because more invitation cards than spaces available had been sent out. So it became a question of guess who was not coming for dinner. But the one who did come created an envious stir: Jaya Bachchan, the wife of a junior MP.

■ Except for the lunch at Rashtrapati Bhawan, Gorbachev was not officially scheduled for any other meeting with President Zail Singh. On the eve of Gorbachev's departure, the President, feeling a bit left out, called the CPSU general secretary in his suite at Rashtrapati Bhawan to say goodbye. In fact, in his down-to-earth style, Gianiji even offered to wish the Russian leader farewell in person. But Gorbachev, touched by this gesture, offered to make an unofficial visit to the Indian President on his own. And promptly at 8.30 a.m. on the day of his departure, Gorbachev showed up at Zail Singh's quarters at Rashtrapati Bhawan where the President was waiting with his family, including grandchildren. "I know that you are a believer in communism," Gianiji told his distinguished caller. "But with the peace initiative you have launched, the world will remember you as a man who spread Gorbachevism." The warm and unexpected tribute made the Russian leader blush with embarrassment.

■ Marxist demagoguery, support for the just armed struggles for liberation of oppressed Third World nations and anti-imperialist sabre-rattling, received a deep burial during Gorbachev's Delhi visit. The communist leader, during his speech before the joint session of Parliament, stunned listeners by talking—Vedantic existentialism-style—about "the search for the meaning of life" and the tradition of "the eternal triad: human being, humanism, humanity". Socio-political systems, "ideology, and national and cultural distinctions", he said, must not be allowed to "hamper dialogue". He also referred to Rabindranath Tagore's novel The Home and the World which, he said, had influenced him in his quest for world peace, and Marxism came full circle to Buddhism when the Soviet leader quoted the words of Buddha: "The greatest victory is one in which nobody is defeated and all can share in that victory." This was a testament not only to Gorbachev's sensibilities but also to the meticulous preparation and homework done by his delegation.

■ During the joint press conference of Gorbachev and Rajiv there was at least one embarrassing moment for the Soviet leader. A singularly verbose and loquacious newsman from an Andhra paper asked the visitor a long-winded question which contained several parts and subparts. After the newsman had completed his chore, Gorbachev leaned towards his translators to find out what exactly he had been asked. Then Gorbachev prefaced his answer with the words: "In response to your discourse..." and the audience burst out into raucous laughter. People laughed because Gorbachev, quite aptly, they believed, had characterised the question as a "discourse". But Gorbachev stopped short in his tracks and went red in the face thinking he had committed some unpardonable bloomer. He immediately whispered to those around him whether he had said anything wrong but was reassured that he had not. Perhaps the Russian word for "statement" or "question" is translated into English as "discourse". Little did Gorbachev realise that far from having committed a faux pas he had actually hit the nail right on the head.

■ The Russian delegation brought with it seven plane-loads of foodstuff, security and communications equipment, and 31 cars. For the first time in India's diplomatic history, a foreign dignitary staying at Rashtrapati Bhawan did not use the local staff for cooking food. Barring cooking gas and utensils, everything else was brought from the Soviet Union. All the 10 rooms of the Guest House were taken over by Russian security three days before Gorbachev's arrival. Over 500 security men, including the chief and deputy chief of security, came for the mission. No Indian security personnel and communications experts were allowed into the Russian quarters. Most of the security contingent stayed at the Centaur Hotel, where occupancy suddenly shot up from 20 per cent to House Full status.

■ Almost eight weeks before Gorbachev's visit, the prime minister established a small ministerial committee to prepare a detailed blueprint of the impending visit. It included Foreign Minister N.D. Tiwari, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs K. Natwar Singh and Commerce Minister P. Shiv Shanker. The committee was later expanded to include Finance Minister V.P. Singh, Energy Minister Vasant Sathe, and Steel and Mines Minister K.C. Pant. An informal group of brainstrusters, including P.N. Haksar, Ashok Mitra, P.N. Dar, Mohit Sen, and S. Chakravarty—the country's leading "leftist" thinkers—advised the ministerial group.

■ In order to make Gorbachev's stay comfortable and cozy the Government set up an informal group to redecorate all the guest suites in the annexe of Rashtrapati Bhawan. The group's members included Union Minister of State for Home P. Chidambaram, Sunita Kohli, an interior decorator, and Mrs Natwar Singh. They changed everything—curtains, bedspreads, carpets, and even the wall-paint.

and avoided any public references to Pakistan and China in the Indian security context. If he had wanted to play to the Indian gallery, it would have been the popular thing to do. But his not doing so indicated that the new Soviet international stance is not one of name-calling but based on sobriety and mature statesmanship, designed to attract all nations, regardless of ideology, into his concept of world peace as expressed in Reykjavik, Vladivostok and now—New Delhi.

BUT the dust kicked up by the "internationalising of the relationship" as Gorbachev called it, perhaps deliberately, succeeded in obscuring the bilateral significance of the visit.

► On China, the Soviets assured New Delhi that the rapprochement between Moscow and Beijing has still a long way to go because of the many hurdles involved, but that any major improvement in Sino-Soviet ties would have no military implications for India.

► On Pakistan, the Soviets made it clear that they will have no hesitation in coming to India's aid in the event of a conventional conflict. India repeated its conviction that Pakistan is "two-screw-driver turns" away from nuclear bomb capability. Rajiv told Gorbachev that if India was finally convinced that Pakistan has the bomb it will have to reconsider its nuclear options. The Soviets also assured India that there was no reason to panic over the AWACS, if and when the acquisition takes place. The wide-ranging defence agreement (see page 102) worked out between Minister of State for Defence Arun Singh and his Soviet counterparts in Moscow prior to the Gorbachev visit is intended to provide "adequate counters" to the AWACS.

► On Afghanistan, the Soviets made it clear that they want to pull out of that country but only if their conditions—a pledge that the US and Pakistan will stop military aid to the Mujahideen and the presence of a government in Kabul that is friendly to the Soviets—are met.

There were, of course, points of delicate disagreement, most notably on Gorbachev's crusade for an Asia-Pacific security pact, first spelt out in his now historic speech last July at Vladivostok. The Indian response was not as forthcoming as Moscow would have wished. Rajiv termed it a "good concept" that was

GUEST COLUMN/BHABANI SEN GUPTA

A Different Beginning

THEY had met before, in May 1985 when Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi visited Moscow, and again in October, when he briefly stopped over there on his way back home from the United Nations. But when Rajiv Gandhi and Mikhail Gorbachev met for the third time in New Delhi last fortnight, both had changed and matured, both had learnt from their different experiences with domestic and world realities. Gorbachev had consolidated his leadership in the Soviet Union and cast his charisma beyond the frontiers of his own country. Rajiv Gandhi had lost some political ground at home and had been rebuffed by the US in his efforts to rearrange superpower relationships with India and Pakistan.

By the time the visit was over and the 80-member Soviet delegation, which included some of the Soviet Union's most competent scientists, military thinkers, development economists and political and foreign-policy strategists, took off from the Indira Gandhi International Airport, Indo-Soviet relations had been placed on a different footing. Gorbachev gave Rajiv more than the latter had expected: the status of the leader of a world power. Rajiv gave Gorbachev more than the latter had expected: endorsement of the Soviet position on arms control and disarmament at the Reykjavik summit.

Gorbachev came to the Indian capital not without certain misgivings. A strong rapport had been established between him and the prime minister during their two meetings last year. But since then the Soviets had seen Rajiv flirting with the US, and wondered if he was not moving to a position of equidistance from the two superpowers. Gorbachev, therefore, wasn't sure if Rajiv would endorse his stand at the Icelandic summit and hold the Strategic Defence Initiative (SDI)—or star wars programme—of Ronald Reagan solely responsible for the summit's collapse. Nor was he certain that the prime minister would respond positively to his concept of Asia-Pacific security, which he had outlined briefly, for the first time, in May 1985, while welcoming Rajiv Gandhi at a banquet in the Kremlin.

The prime minister had done his homework well for his meetings with the general secretary. He had been stung by the unfolding integration of Pakistan into a larger, long-term US military strategy for the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean region, by the reliable reports he had received of the acquisition of air and naval base facilities by the US in Pakistan and by the proposals to transfer to Pakistan hi-tech spy and weapon systems through most of the next decade. All this while he had been told by US officials that they were sensitive to India's security concerns and its depleted hard-currency kitty.

> "The visit was significant for Gorbachev accorded Rajiv the status of a world leader while the latter fully endorsed the Soviet position at Reykjavik."

However, in their nearly 10 hours of private conversations, when the two leaders explored almost the entire field of international problems, they found themselves, in the words of a Soviet source, "in complete agreement on nearly every issue".

At the very first meeting, Rajiv described the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 and Indian Independence in 1947 as two parallel historic events of this century that considerably weakened world imperialism. On SDI, Rajiv was as firmly negative as before. Like Gorbachev, he wanted the accord reached at Reykjavik to stand, and to be built upon in further talks between the superpowers. He "Indianised" the Gorbachev concept of Asia-Pacific security. This had been the Indian goal since Independence, he said. India's strivings in this direction were manifest in the Asian Relations Conference of 1946, in the Bandung Declaration, in non-alignment, in Panchsheel or the five principles of peaceful coexistence. The two leaders agreed that progress to that distant goal could only be made step by step, through bilateral, multilateral and regional efforts, roping in all nations, big and small.

The Soviet delegation was also pleased that Rajiv legitimised a Soviet role in building a non-military security system for the Asia-Pacific region: the USSR, he declared in his speech at the banquet on November 25, is an Asian power.

Rajiv's reference to the Indo-Soviet treaty elated the visiting Russians. They were doubtful about how the prime minister would see the treaty, which Moscow always perceives to be the foundation of the Indo-Soviet relationship. In the joint statement issued after their talks in Moscow in May last year, the treaty was described as a contribution to peace and stability in Asia and the world. This time, however, the prime minister placed the treaty in a bilateral, regional as well as global context, which was highly satisfying to the Soviet leadership. He stressed the treaty's edge of relevance in the currently-building security environment in South Asia: a clear message to Pakistan and its patrons that India could call upon the awesome resources of its time-tested friend in the event of a challenge to its frontiers and its independence.

A considerable portion of the talks between the two leaders, and at another level—or several levels—between ministers of the two governments, was devoted to actual exploration of ways and means to elevate cooperation to a higher level, though this would not be easy and will take years to do. Rajiv Gandhi told Gorbachev that there was a good deal in common in what both of them were trying to do in either's homeland; they could learn a lot from each other's experience. Both were trying to accelerate growth and development, both were modernising vast economies, both were fighting inertia, outdated dogmas and attitudes, corruption and routinism.

At one stage in the talks, Gorbachev mentioned that the success of the modernisation and development efforts of the Soviet Union, India and China, countries in which one-half of mankind reside, would mean a tremendous change in the global situation.

Both Indian and Soviet sources pointed out that when the two leaders discussed regional issues—US arms for Pakistan, Afghanistan, Kampuchea, Nicaragua and South Africa—the quest was for constructive answers to the prevailing problems and the emphasis was on finding ways of dialogue and cooperation rather than conflict and confrontation. When China came up for a detailed survey, the effort once again was to explore ways of normalising Sino-Soviet and Sino-Indian relations on parallel lines.

A good summit is over, but its fall-out will have to be watched in the months ahead. The main question that is being asked in the diplomatic circles in New Delhi is whether the closeness established between India and the USSR on major controversial world issues would not chill the Reagan Administration's belated ardour for India's young and supposedly pro-western prime minister.

The Americans obviously did not relish Rajiv Gandhi's endorsement of the Soviet position at Reykjavik, but they were not surprised by it. What caused the most disappointment in US diplomatic circles was the prime minister's categorical commitment to the Indo-Soviet treaty, and his emphasis on its relevance in the context of recent developments in US-Pakistan relations. For Pakistan this had a grim message which that country's diplomats noted with deep concern.

In Chinese diplomatic circles, the summit's importance lay chiefly in what it might mean for Beijing's relations with Moscow and New Delhi, and for relations between India and Pakistan. China isn't going to hug the USSR until the Kampuchean issue is resolved with the withdrawal of Vietnamese troops from that country. Members of the Gorbachev team confessed in private discussions that a Kampuchean breakthrough wasn't expected in the immediate future. Sino-Soviet relations would therefore normalise only slowly and undramatically. Chinese diplomats were curious to know if the summit would lead to a new Indian approach to China. This time will reveal.

required to be studied further. The lukewarm response is understandable since, as political commentator Nikhil Chakravarty wrote: "We can't let Gorbachev run away with our copyright."

THE Indian Government had consistently turned down the earlier Asian Security concept peddled by Leonid Brezhnev. The Brezhnev plan was presented to India on at least four occasions, but New Delhi did not respond mainly because it contained an in-built bias against China, and indirectly, the US. The Gorbachev concept is different in the sense that it calls for the involvement of all the concerned powers, including the US, but India is still not keen to being dragged, willy nilly, into a Soviet-sponsored initiative when it has already launched several initiatives on its own in forums like NAM and SAARC. The two sides also differ on the nuclear disarmament issue in relation to the Non Proliferation Treaty (NPT). The Soviets firmly back the NPT and its attendant safeguards which India believes is discriminatory since it legitimises the right of the superpowers to maintain the nuclear edge while asking the newer nuclear club members to open up their installations to international inspection and control.

But in the present bilateral context, the Gorbachev visit has been a windfall for both sides. According to foreign policy analysts in Moscow, before the impetus given by the Gorbachev visit, Indo-Soviet relations were in a state of stagnation. The political reality is that the close ties between the two countries are often bugged by mutual incomprehension at one level, and indifference and hostility at another. Even at the best of times in Indo-Soviet relations, during the Khruschev-Nehru phase and during the Indira-Brezhnev period, when relations at the top were excellent, there was apathy, indifference and obstruction at lower levels.

The reasons are not a mystery. The incomprehension exists because the mutual perceptions of Moscow and New Delhi about each other are sometimes based on misunderstandings and sometimes on deliberate ambiguities in order to avoid aggravations. The apathy and obstruction comes from officials on both sides. Reports from Moscow indicate that Soviet policy makers believe that a strong pro-West lobby exists in South Block which is hostile to Indo-Soviet ties and has no interest in furthering them. Thus, ideas and projects mooted at the highest levels often get bogged down below. For example, in the last quarter of a century, there has been repeated talk of joint industrial projects between the two countries. The topic always surfaces when the leaders of the two countries meet. But it has never got off the ground till the Gorbachev visit.

Another negative factor is the lack of subtlety and polish on the Soviet side. The mental horizon of Soviet officialdom and intelligentsia is tied up with the West, specially America. Nothing else matters. Once the hullabaloo and rhetoric of VIP meetings is over, their attention reverts to what is to them the more serious part of their foreign policy business: America, Europe and China, in that order, the order which is psychologically real to them.

In that sense, the Gorbachev visit has succeeded in giving a new and more permanent vitality to the relationship. Indian officials involved in the talks and the pre-visit discussions say that there has never been a visit by leaders on either side where the exchanges have been as frank and open-minded. More so, since both leaders have much that is in common. Their domestic compulsions are remarkably similar—the problems posed by a rigid and stifling bureaucracy which has become a major inhibiting factor in their mutual desire to hasten the pace of economic development and keep pace with technological advances in the West. Both have faced resistance in trying to usher in new ideological values. On the political front, both are saddled with a party structure and hierarchy that is unwieldy inefficient and out of step with popular public opinion and current realities. Says former Indian ambassador in Moscow, Inder Gujral: "The difference this time is that Rajiv and Gorbachev are both new faces on the political horizon, they have established a strong personal rapport and both have launched popularly appealing international initiatives. Whatever their apparent ideological differences, they know they can do business together."

The rapport between Rajiv and Gorbachev, evident during their first meeting in May last year, has obviously been enhanced and elevated to a level that transcends the limited bilateral plane. Whatever the eventual nuts and bolts outcome of the visit, the second honeymoon between Moscow and New Delhi promises not only to be more mature and meaningful but also to alter the course of world events.

DEFENCE AGREEMENT

A Buyer's Market

THROUGH two decades of Indo-Soviet defence courtship the mood had never been so amorous. With the paranoia over the arming of Pakistan peaking on the eve of Gorbachev's visit the intensity of the relationship was only predictable.

Even as the shopping list began taking shape (see box) the Russians offered solace for each of India's apprehensions. Said an Indian official: "They had done their homework. They knew our needs till the turn of the century."

When India expressed concern about Pakistan acquiring the Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS), the Russians offered their Tu-124 Moss, a less sophisticated AWACS or their cheaper high-streaking fighters capable of blowing hostile AWACS out of the sky. To counteract the F-16s, the USSR advanced the delivery of MiG-29s by four months. The Russians also offered India more Kilo and Tango class submarines and TU-142M maritime reconnaissance aircraft.

Similarly, both the air force and the army's new aviation corps can look forward to getting more Mi-24 combat helicopters, a deadly force multiplier in land battle, and the Mi-26, the world's biggest transport helicopter, which carries 70 fully-armed troops or two trucks.

The Soviets suggested that the AWACS threat could be knocked out by a fast, high-altitude fighter armed with medium-range missiles. The defence grapevine is abuzz with reports that, rather than offer India the new MiG-31, the Soviets have proposed to sell it a deadly missile which India's MiG-25s could carry to shoot the AWACS.

India, however, wants the latest Soviet AWACS (known within NATO as Mainstay), built on an Il-76 air-frame. The Soviets did not say no but pleaded that the system was still far from perfect.

Even more than the Soviet willingness to sell, what marked a change from the recent past was the Indian inclination to buy. For the past few years, Indian defence planners have made a conscious effort to diversify their sources of arms supply by buying from the West. But since the Weinberger visit to the region in October when the AWACS was offered to Pakistan, India's return to the trusted ally, even if rather hasty, was only to be expected.

"When the needs are pressing and urgent we have no choice but to go to the Soviets for purely economic reasons," says retired Lieutenant-General P.N. Kathpalia. The late General A.S. Vaidya had once eloquently said: "Sir Liddel Hart said that it is only fire-power, and fire-power that arrives at the right time and place that counts in modern war. But in our situation, it must also come at the right price."

Which is what the Russians offer. Besides the fact that it comes on rupee payment, the Soviet equipment costs a fraction of the price of comparable western equivalents. Says BJP MP and military commentator Jaswant Singh: "A T-72 tank in semi-knocked-down condition comes for just Rs 90 lakh. The German Leopard would cost many times more."

Defence sources also say that, contrary to the western suppliers, the Soviets have a vested interest in indigenisation. "The Soviets are not selling arms for profit. So they do not want to indulge in the French bania trick of making their millions on spares and retrofits," explains a senior official. Soviet production lines are overburdened by the demands from their own and the Warsaw Pact forces. They would be happy if India produced its own hardware under licence.

To encourage Indian production, the Soviets are buying some of the avionics produced for transport aircraft at the Hindustan Aeronautics Limited (HAL) factory in Hyderabad. The surprise Soviet decision to buy the light Allouette helicopter of French origin produced by HAL could also be part of the same drive.

Strategically, both the Soviet and Indian threat perceptions point in the same direction. The Soviets worry about being bled in Afghanistan by guerrillas armed in Pakistan and the US-Pakistan-China axis is India's bugbear. Similarly, if the Pakistan-based AWACS gives India sleepless nights, it also makes the Russians feel naked.

And most vitally, if India develops a true blue-water navy, prowling the Indian Ocean up to Sumatra, the doorstep of ASEAN, and reaching the African front-line states, it will fit in with the Soviet strategy. It doesn't matter if India joins a defence pact with them or not. An Indian vessel on the high seas is, after all, a friendly vessel for them. Not surprisingly, the Soviets have been keen to sell their Tu-142M naval reconnaissance aircraft which is acclaimed by Indian officers as "an aircraft which can fly right up to South Africa and back without refuelling".

For the Soviets too, arms supply to India has another crucial purpose. India's use of Soviet arms has provided them vital reassurance, since they are not exactly enthused by the performance of their arms in the Middle East. Says K. Subrahmanyam, director of the Institute for Defence Studies and Analyses: "When the Soviets gave arms to Egypt they became a gift to Israel. The arms to Syria are also a gift to Israel. But we have used the same arms to defeat the same western equip-

SHOPPING LIST

India's current shopping list for the Soviet equipment contains these major items:

SAM-11 surface-to-air missiles: For the forward army units. The SAM-11 has a four-headed multiple launcher, a better radar, a good Identify Friend and Foe (IFF) system and a range of 15 km.

Tango and Kilo class submarines: To beef up the current fleet of eight old, bulky and noisy Foxtrot class submarines. They are quieter, have better range, detection ability and fire-power.

TU-142 Bear maritime reconnaissance aircraft: For the navy's overburdened fleet of three Soviet Il-38s. The four-engined TU-142 is the fastest turbo-prop flying today. It has good electronics and an effective range of 13,000 km. It would be the navy's eyes and ears over the whole Indian Ocean.

Mi-17 and Mi-26 helicopters: The medium and heavy capacity troop-lifters that the IAF needs very badly. Mi-26, which carries 70 fully-armed troops, is the largest transport helicopter in the world.

More Il-76 transports and Kamov Ka-25 helicopters: To strengthen the IAF's long-range troop lifting capacity. Its limited fleet has lately been under pressure because of the frequent airlift of paramilitary forces in and out of the disturbed areas. The Kamovs will add to the navy's anti-submarine muscle.

New missiles and electronics: To help the IAF face the AWACS threat and enhance its electronic counter counter-measures (ECCM) capability.

"By vastly overplaying the friend-in-need theme in relation to the Soviets, we close our options elsewhere. Our failure to buy the TOW anti-tank missile from the US is an example."

ment. It is a happy thought for the Russians." The Soviets also appreciate India's imaginative use of weapons. In the 1971 war, for example, the IAF used the AN-12 transport as an effective bomber and the navy used the defensive Osa class missile boats in a strike raid on Karachi.

On the negative side, the Soviets do not allow the export of arms produced under their licence. They also dislike the feverish Indian pitch to seek armament technology from the West. The ambitious Light Combat Aircraft (LCA) and Main Battle Tank (MBT) projects are seen as part of a breakaway effort. In fact, Indian success on the MBT coincided with the setting up of a T-72 factory at Medak. The Soviets had to be repeatedly reassured the T-72 project would go on as scheduled.

HOWEVER, by now, the Soviets have accepted the Indian quest for domestic production as a fact of life, something admitted by officials accompanying Gorbachev. So they have changed tactics. "They are no longer saying, do not design your own weapons. They are only saying, let us help you design," says a general. Obviously concerned about the reopening of Indo-US defence ties last month with the finalisation of the sale of 11 GE-404 engines for the LCA prototypes, the Soviets wanted to know why India did not come to them for a suitable engine.

Apart from such possessiveness, complications have often arisen with Soviet equipment in the field. Some of this is due to doctrinal differences. The Soviet weapons are sturdy, low on technology and high on fuel consumption. "They make their stuff heavy and strong because they have so much oil. We buy oil with dollars," complains an Indian officer.

On the operational side, the IAF has often felt that Soviet systems do not match up with what the US gives Pakistan. It has had problems with every new Soviet aircraft. When the first MiG-21 squadron was raised in 1963-64, the pilots hated it as it just carried two measly short-range missiles and no gun. But the Soviets accepted India's request to mount an external gun on the fuselage.

Similarly, problems cropped up with the next major Soviet acquisition by the IAF—the Sukhoi-7 fighter-bomber. The aircraft was bought as a post-1965 war replacement and accounted for a bulk of the Indian losses in the 1971 war with Pakistan. Though it was argued that India had tactically misused the aircraft in the more vulnerable ground support role, no further order for it was made.

The IAF's latest acquisitions, MiG-23 variants, have also had problems due to their high accident rate. Two new Soviet AN-32 transport aircraft crashed in March this year shortly after an Il-76 sold to India overshot the runway and was damaged in Tashkent. The incidents caused consternation as the Soviets blamed the accident on pilot error and the pro-West lobby in New Delhi took an I-told-you-so stance on Soviet technology. There was also mutual embarrassment in 1981 when one of the first MiG-25 reconnaissance aircraft bought by India crashed shortly after take-off. It was being flown by a Soviet pilot.

The army had a serious problem with surface-to-air missiles bought in 1977 to defend the air bases in the Punjab sector. Needed urgently, these took nine months to land at Cochin, and when they reached Ambala, the warranty period had lapsed. The deployment had to wait till a new protocol was signed. The Soviets said the Bering Sea froze after the ship's loading at Archangel but Indian officers pointed to carelessness. Ironically, the missiles were unusable for two more years due to their primitive radar and an Identify Friend and Foe (IFF) system which could have destroyed the IAF's own planes.

These are only a few of the instances quoted by the critics of Soviet equipment. Says retired Lieutenant-General I.S. Gill who, as the chief of the Western Command in 1979, wrote a controversial letter to The Times of India criticising Indian reliance on Russia: "By vastly overplaying the friend-in-need theme in relation to the Soviets, we close our options elsewhere. Our failure to buy the TOW anti-tank missile, which we needed, from the US, is an example of this." But he also says that the Russians exercise no influence in our defence decision-making. Gill was director of military operations in the 1971 war and recalls: "There was no interference in the Operations Room though they often passed phony intelligence predicting Pakistani attacks."

As long as the Soviets keep that vital distance, keep selling their arms cheap but without obvious preconditions and keep offering the best in their cupboard, there seems to be no stopping the Indo-Soviet arms relationship from growing stronger. And along with it, doubts will grow as to its likely impact on Indian foreign policy. It is widely accepted that, in international diplomacy, no dependence is as dangerous as the dependence on arms supply. Last week's deliberations are not exactly a step towards dependence. But these would certainly dampen the recent flirtation with western suppliers. Only if India manages to push its own arms development programme while retaining its options on western technology and, at the same time, fulfills its current needs with cheaper Soviet technology, would it be a bargain well-struck.

ECONOMIC TIES

Ambitious Plans

TILL weeks before the Gorbachev visit, Indo-Soviet economic relations seemed to have plateaued, and lost virtually all momentum. As a trading partner, the Soviet Union had been finding it increasingly difficult to offer goods acceptable to India. And its main export item, oil, had dropped sharply in value, leaving India with a large trade surplus. Financial credits extended when Leonid Brezhnev visited New Delhi in 1980 had still not been fully utilised. And with the Soviet Union falling behind in technology, numerous Indian public sector companies that had initially been set up with Soviet help—like Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd, Instrumentation Ltd, and the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC)—had turned to the West for new technical collaborations. Also, all the emerging areas of industrial growth—automobiles, electronics, petrochemicals—were aligned technologically with either the West or Japan. The Soviet Union had no role.

Now, suddenly, things are beginning to look different. Indeed, despite all the national security concerns uppermost in people's minds before the Gorbachev visit, it is trade and economic ties that have witnessed a major breakthrough. The Soviet Union has extended to India credits on a scale that is unprecedented, bilateral trade is now targeted to almost quadruple in just six years, and a beginning has quickly been made in tying up joint ventures between Soviet and Indian companies (including private firms).

The 1.5 billion-rouble credit, in addition to the billion roubles offered last year when Rajiv visited Moscow, make for a total of about Rs 3,000 crore in barely 20 months: twice the sum offered in the previous three decades. Said a senior official in the Ministry of External Affairs: "Their generosity took us completely by surprise, and we had to scramble around to find the projects that could be financed with this credit."

On the trade front, the Soviet problem of finding goods to sell to India had earlier meant that the trade target of Rs 7,000 crore for 1990 would be difficult to meet (mutual trade in 1986 is not expected to cross Rs 3,600 crore). Now, the 1990 target has not only been re-affirmed, but the new target for 1992 is Rs 13,000 crore. To achieve this, all manner of innovations are being considered: greater private sector involvement, co-production arrangements, and fresh Indo-Soviet cooperation in the areas of traditional Russian strength: coal, oil, power and steel. Indeed, five Indian companies have already finalised joint ventures with Soviet firms.

Even Finance Minister V.P. Singh stands to benefit. For, in an unusual decision, some of the Soviet project aid will be used to finance rupee-costs as well. On the one hand, this helps find money for the Tehri hydro-electric project (2,400 MW), which has been stuck for want of funds. On the other, the credit goes straight into the Central budget which has been faced with a burgeoning deficit problem.

So, far from questions being asked about the logic of continuing with the rupee trade arrangements that govern Indo-Soviet trade, and despite the Soviet delegation asking for still further devaluation of the rupee (which India resisted), the Gorbachev visit has resulted in economic ties between the two countries getting an enormous boost. Said an official in the Prime Minister's Secretariat: "This goes well beyond what we had anticipated." Added an official in the Commerce Ministry: "The Soviet Union is planning to step up exports world-wide of machinery and high-value items. We will buy more too."

In the next few years, following from the new agreements, several companies could expect to sign up joint ventures with the Soviet Union. Thus, Chinar Exports (one of the leading export houses dealing with the Soviet Union) now plans to launch a joint venture to make electronic guns for television tubes. Says Managing Director H.S. Sandhu: "The Soviet Government has shown interest. We will use their technology and our labour reservoir to mutual advantage."

Several such joint ventures are in the offing. The India-USSR Chamber of Commerce and Industry, set up earlier this year, has identified over 100 potential ventures. Neftechimpromexport, the Soviet organisation that has in the past helped set up oil refineries in India, has now written to the chamber suggesting that it "investigate the possibilities for setting up production of carbon black" with its collaboration. It has also offered assistance for petrochemical complexes, chemical and fertiliser plants, tyre factories, pulp and paper plants and cryogenic units. The Soviets are also offering commercial rouble loans. And leading Indian hotel chains have been invited to open hotels in the USSR.

The shift towards the private sector, while searching for joint ventures and co-production arrangements, follows an earlier shift towards it for trade purposes. And State Trading Corporation (STC) Chairman Sudhir Mulji confesses: "A great deal of STC business with the Soviet Union has been taken over by private parties in garments, coffee and fruit." This is ironic because STC was set up partly to trade with the Soviet bloc. Mulji now hopes to offer STC's services again: "I am not saying we would like to compete with the private parties to bring the business back to STC, but to look for new areas."

Dr Jayashekar of the Jawaharlal Nehru University points out that the real wooing of India's private sector began some two years ago, when large delegations from the private sector were invited to the Soviet Union. But he as well as other observers have their doubts about how far this process can go—because of the lack of proven Soviet technology in several areas, private sector bias in favour of the West, and the language problem. On the technology question, at least, the Gorbachev drive to modernise his economy may improve matters.

Critics also refer to the questionable nature of the rice trade with the Soviet Union, charging that it is used to channel money to friendly political parties in India, and point to numerous products in which the Soviet Union is alleged to have indulged in switch trade: bought from India against rupee payment and sold in the West in return for dollars. But these charges have never been proved.

Most of the growth in trade in the recent past has been because the Soviet Union has increasingly turned to Indian companies for cosmetics and other consumer goods. Dabur India, for instance, exports Helena Rubinstein eyebrow pencils and blushers, and is now setting up a factory near Delhi exclusively for exports. As much as 40 per cent of exports overseen by the Chemicals Export Promotion Council now go to the Soviet Union. As the Soviet Union gets more prosperous, this can be expected to increase still further. Even traditional exports like tea and coffee now have the Soviet Union as their biggest buyer (one-third of coffee exports go to the USSR). And in the manufacturing sector, entire projects are set up with the Soviet market in mind, a case in point being the Modi tie-up with Xerox.

Inevitably, because the Soviet buyers tend to completely shut off the tap every now and then, fears are expressed about the dangers of such dependence. Numerous units have had to close down in the past because Soviet orders stopped overnight. Said K. Ramani, executive director of the Plastics and Linoleums Export Promotion Council: "In spectacle frames, some Kandla units had to close down because the Russians got German technology and set up their own units." Added the director of an Indian drug firm that exports to the USSR: "The USSR should be willing to sign longer-term contracts, instead of just one-year deals."

The privatisation that has already taken place in Indo-Soviet trade has, meanwhile, built up a considerable business lobby in India that is in favour of expanded economic relations between the two countries. And quite clearly, if the new impetus resulting from the agreements reached during the Gorbachev visit leads to new collaborations and more trade, Indo-Soviet economic relations will be on a firmer footing than had seemed likely till the other day.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Priestly Protests

ANDHRA Pradesh's Hindu clergy had declared it as atmavalokanam day, or a day for soul-searching. November 16, however, saw not tranquillity but loud protestations. At several places, on that auspicious occasion of the full moon, they slammed doors in the face of devotees who were streaming in to worship. The priestly ire was sparked off by the state Government's decision to accept all the 276 recommendations of the Hindu Endowments Commission's report, made public in May 1986. The commission was headed by former chief justice Challa Kondaiah.

At a rally in Vijayawada, temple priests raged that the 1,200-page, three-volume report was a sacrilege and accused its authors of being ignorant of the basic tenets of the Hindu Shastras. The head of the recently-formed Sampradaya Parirakshana Samithi, Tridandi Chinna Srimanarayana Ramanuja Jeer, said: "The report reminds me of the so-called expert who remarked that the Mahabharata stated there was no God."

The three most unpopular recommendations were the abolition of hereditary rights to the post of priesthood and their share in offerings, auction of temple land to raise money for better maintenance, and amalgamation of the Tirumala Tirupathi Devasthanom (TTD) with the Endowments Commissionerate. And even among these, the most hated suggestion was hereditary rights. At the Vijayawada conclave, religious heads felt that it was tantamount to the Government "meddling in the religious affairs of the Hindu community".

A new twist was also added when the secretaries of the Shankaracharya of Kanchi and Jagadguru Bharathi Theertha of the Sri Sharadapeetham issued statements denying that the two religious heads in their depositions before the commission had favoured abolition of hereditary system. They—along with others—complained that their statements were wrongly recorded, sometimes distorted and in one case omitted by the commission.

K. MARUTI RAO

The priests are furious because the acceptance of the Hindu Endowments Commission's recommendations directly hurts

Religious leaders at Vijayawada rally; and (inset) Yethiraja Roy: noisy row

Jagadguru Sri Trivikrama Ramananda Bharathi Swami of Coutrallam Peetham—a former member of the Kondaiah Commission who was later dropped—charged that several suggestions made by him at the second meeting of the commission were not even noted down. Indirectly referring to Chief Minister Rama Rao, whose guru he once was, he remarked: "People talk of the Vedas, Hindu religion and traditions facing dangers. It is like saying electricity is dangerous only if someone tampers with it out of ignorance." Rama Rao, refused to react to these comments.

The commission in its report had stated that the majority—2,190 of the 2,768 surveyed—favoured the abolition of the system of hereditary priesthood and was for the recruitment of priests through employment exchanges. However, Ramanuja Jeer argued that hereditary rights could be suspended only when the priest was unfit to perform his duties or had a bad reputation.

At present only 5,135 of the 32,153 temples in the state have hereditary priests. But it is the bigger and richer temples that stand to lose the most if the report is implemented. In the case of TTD temples, the loss to priestly families is estimated at around Rs 1.20 crore per annum.

State Endowment Minister N. Yethiraja Rao, in a bid to defuse the situation, held out the assurance that none of the priests would be removed but only be replaced by a qualified priest on retirement. Plans are also afoot to set up schools for priests to provide crash courses in order to equip them with the prescribed qualifications as laid down by the commission. Yethiraja Rao felt that the controversy was the handiwork of those who were against the posting of Harijans as priests. "If they say so openly they can be prosecuted under the civil rights laws," he remarked.

The state Bharatiya Janata Party General Secretary M. Venkaiah Naidu, however, blamed the Government for mishandling the situation. Said he: "To gain support, it has permitted an impression to grow that the reforms are aimed at one particular caste. It should have dealt with this socially sensitive issue with tact."

Meanwhile the archakas are planning to intensify their agitation with the support of the Shankaracharyas and Jagadgurus even as the Government is preparing a draft law on temple reforms in the light of the recommendations. Religious passions may be inflamed further when another commission set up to look into the charges of malpractices in the TTD submits its report next February.

P.N. BHAGWATI

ZAIL SINGH

R.S. PATHAK

JUDICIARY

Presidential Tact

MOST members of the public are convinced that the role of the President is purely ceremonial, little realising that his handling—or mishandling—of delicate matters of state can cause considerable embarrassment to the ruling party. In fact, last fortnight, it was presidential intervention which not only salvaged the prestige of the judiciary and the office of the chief justice of India but also saved the Government from embarrassment.

In an unprecedented move, President Giani Zail Singh summoned Chief Justice P.N. Bhagwati to Rashtrapati Bhavan and consulted him on the Government's proposal to appoint Justice R.S. Pathak as the next chief justice of the Supreme Court—a statutory requirement that the Prime Minister's secretariat had incredibly overlooked. The presidential initiative was necessitated when the Secretariat sent the file for the chief justice's appointment to the President minus the recommendation of the outgoing chief justice of India. According to regulations, the Law Ministry sends the final suggestion to the President only after it has solicited the views of the retiring chief justice and the opinions of other senior sitting judges of the Supreme Court.

The process of choosing the new chief justice began in October when the Union Cabinet turned down a proposal to raise the retirement age of the chief justice from 65 to 68. For the last year, the Law Ministry and the Central Government have been examining a package of judicial reforms which included proposals to raise salaries and perks of high court and Supreme Court judges and also the retirement age of the chief justice. While the salary hike was agreed to, the proposal raising the age limit was put on the back burner since Rajiv felt that it would not be advisable to go through the whole exercise of a constitutional amendment required for raising the age limit. Also, it was believed in judicial circles that if the proposal came through then Bhagwati would automatically get an extension before he retired in December and the Government would be open to charges of favouritism.

The President summoned Bhagwati to consult him on the proposed appointment of Pathak—a statutory requirement that the Prime Minister's Secretariat had incredibly overlooked

With the proposal having being rejected, Law Minister Asoke Sen set the ball rolling for the appointment of Pathak, the senior-most judge in the Supreme Court as the next chief justice. On October 16, 1986, he wrote a confidential letter to Bhagwati stating that the Government proposed to elevate Pathak as the new chief justice. While Sen adhered to the procedure in the case of Bhagwati, he ignored Justice O. Chinappa Reddy the third senior-most Supreme Court justice in his consultations. Instead, he sought the opinion of Justice M.P. Thakkar, Justice E.S. Venkatramaiah and Justice Sabyasachi Mukherji, all three of whom concurred with Sen's suggestion that Pathak was an appropriate choice. But Bhagwati himself did not react to Sen's letter till November 12, almost a month later. Meanwhile, the Law Ministry, without bothering to remind Bhagwati or call him over for final discussions, chose to send the file to the prime minister for his approval. The Prime Minister's Secretariat forwarded it to the President.

The file landed in Rashtrapati Bhavan when the President was on a foreign trip. When the file was put up to him on November 12, he noticed the missing recommendation of the chief justice of India. Bhagwati was summoned to Rashtrapati Bhavan and during the half hour discussion, President Zail Singh urged Bhagwati to create a healthy practice by concurring with the Government's proposal which Bhagwati finally did. When he left Rashtrapati Bhavan, it was recorded on the file that the President had discussed the matter with the chief justice who had no objection to Pathak's appointment as his successor. The President then sent the appointment letter back to the Prime Minister's Secretariat with the added note, thus sparing the sight of a lot of red-faces in the Law Ministry and the Prime Minister's Secretariat who seemed to have forgotten the law.

Shady Shares

ABDUL Shamji, Raj Sethia, Mahmud Sipra, are all names of Asian millionaire businessmen who were in dire straits in Britain in recent times. One more name has now cropped up: that of 38-year-old Chander Singh, head of the controversial Ravendale share dealing enterprise.

His two share shops—one located strategically at New Bond Street—were forced to shut down last fortnight by investigating officials from Britain's Department of Trade and Industry (DTI). His share shops offered commission-free dealing in a variety of shares. The DTI's investigations were prompted by a combination of client complaints, late payments and the filing of wind-up petitions against other Ravendale companies. The fraud squad of the metropolitan police is also investigating complaints from dissatisfied clients of city investment centres and Ravendale securities, a former market maker founded by Singh some ten years ago, whilst a private investor is suing Singh's Ravendale group for £450,000 in connection with shares in British Telecom which he alleges that he never received.

THE OBSERVER

BUSINESS

Big bang for Singh's share shops

Singh: 'We'll pay in full'

DTI: Regulation in disarray

A local Sunday paper, The Observer has been campaigning for the last three years over the pitfalls of investing through licensed dealers and Singh's Ravendale share dealing enterprise had come in for special scrutiny. The paper has been served with at least four libel writs concerning Ravendale and its associates. The paper says it is now "vigorously defending the two writs that remain active".

Battle for Shiva

A fascinating courtroom battle concerning the ownership of a peerless Shiva Nataraja idol is currently unfolding at the Queen's bench division at the London High Court. The unlikely contestants for the exquisite mid-10th century Chola dynasty bronze statue valued at over £1 million are the Government of India and the Bumper Development Corporation (BDC), a Canadian oil company. The Union of India and the state of Tamil Nadu are arguing that the Shiva Nataraja statue was stolen from the Arul Thiru Vishwanatha Temple in Pathur (Thanjavur district in Tamil Nadu) in 1976 and allegedly smuggled out of Bombay. The BDC has claimed that they purchased the statue through mediators in London in 1982. The BDC had then sent the statue to the British Museum for cleaning but a lynx-eyed officer spotted it and reported to Scotland Yard. The latter impounded the statue and BDC filed a suit for its return. The Indian Government made a counter claim and is suing BDC and the metropolitan police.

Determined Indian officials are sparing no expense in their bid to win this landmark case that involves not just English law but invokes a complex range of traditions, Hindu law, worship, and Hindu mythology, Indian history and art and international conventions which bar "export and import of cultural property". Giving crucial evidence on behalf of the Union of India is Dr Nagaswamy, acknowledged as one of the foremost authorities on bronzes. People from Pathur village allegedly involved in the theft have been flown in along with numerous idols. A verdict is anticipated next fortnight.

Issue of Verse

A journal devoted to poetry and fiction rarely makes news but an exception was the recent London launch of the Delhi-London Poetry Quarterly (DLPQ) which was attended by luminaries from the rarefied world of poetry and literature. Its imaginatively conceived inaugural issue contains besides established poets from India like Keki Daruwalla, P. Lal and Shiv Kumar, unknowns from across the country like Ameen Merchant, K. Venkatramanan and Suman Kapoor. Its editor and publisher is Gopi Warrier, a management consultant with Macalpine, Thorpe and Warrier(MTW). As with the philosophy of the poetry journal, MTW says it has a genuine social and spiritual concern that commerce and art, industry and individual self were drifting too far apart at a "tremendous loss to the environment and the human beings who lived in it". Warrier points out that the name of the magazine DLPQ, is an "astrological choice"—London ruled by Gemini and Delhi by Sagittarius which have an instinctive natural affinity. They presage the aquarian age. Although this might come as a revelation to the mandarins at the foreign office here and at South Block, the publishers need to be applauded when they say spunkily that they have no interest in making money. What interests them are genuine spiritual movements—Buddhism, Advaita, Tantra and all those writers "whose madness lies in the creative invocation of the ultimate".

Soldiers' Party

RELIGIOUS festivals, traditional weddings, political rallies and Sikh separatist activity—are all fairly routine events in Southall—Britain's best-known Indian stronghold. But next fortnight the west London suburb is hosting an unusual event: a reunion of soldiers of the old Indian Army now living in Britain. Several hundred men who served in Sikh regiments, the Punjab frontier forces and other units will get together with their old mates including British officers for the first time in 40 years. More than 4 million people from India contributed to the war effort in the Second World War, with 2.7 million of them fighting in all theatres in the army, navy and air force. The event is being organised by a special steering group at the request of Indian ex-servicemen; amongst the day's entertainment will be a local high school band which will play tunes like "Bonny Dundee" and the "Lincolnshire Poacher" which the Indian Army later made its own.

HONG KONG INDIANS

The Coming Crunch

A majority of Hong Kong's six million residents find it depressing to contemplate their post-1997 future after Britain transfers it to the People's Republic of China, particularly the 6,000-strong community of Indians holding British passports. Under the impending change, they will be given new British passports but not the right to citizenship, or even the right to reside permanently anywhere else in the world. The transfer of power will leave them stateless. Fears also haunt the 10,000 Indian passport holders who do not fancy living under Chinese rule. The situation could result in an exodus as Special Correspondent SHEKHAR GUPTA discovered on his visit to the colony. His report:

WHEN Great Britain took over the island of Hong Kong on January 26, 1841, the first "British" troops to set foot on Possession Point were Indians. And as the Union Jack went up there were also four adventurous Indian businessmen in the audience.

Hari Harilela, believed to be the richest Indian trader and one of Hong Kong's influential Tai Pans, is heading the legal offensive in London.

They started the first modern business ventures in Hong Kong. Dorabjee Naoroji built up the Star Ferry Company, Oriental Bank introduced banking while three Indians dominated the first governing body of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.

Now, as the British administration begins the process of packing up to leave the island colony in 1997, the descendants of these Indian pioneers, as well as later migrants face a grim irony. The original entrepreneurs of Hong Kong will be the first to flee. "Nobody is saying it as nobody wants to rock the boat. But an exodus is in the making as far as we Indians are concerned," says K. Sital, vice-president of the Council of Hong Kong Indian Associations. Adds Kulwant Kumar, a bank employee: "In a decade, we will become the unwanted children of the world, like the Vietnamese boat people or Palestinians."

Such fears may be exaggerated. But the future beckons darkly to the 17,000-strong community of Indian origin. While the community, working under one of the most liberal economic laws in the world, shares a fear of the communist controls which could be enforced in 1997, the 6,000 who hold British Dependent Territory Citizenship have a special problem. Under the Sino-British accord on the transfer, all the ethnic Chinese in Hong Kong will be granted Chinese citizenship. But the ethnic minorities—the Indians, Pakistanis and Portugese—will be registered as British Nationals Overseas on July 1, 1997 and given a new passport.

The new passport will give the holder the right to travel as a British citizen but no right to abode anywhere. In Hong Kong too, they will stay at the mercy of the Chinese administration. Even this citizenship would cease to exist after two generations, leaving the third generation to seek a nationality for themselves. "People may say it is too far away to bother me. But the very thought that my grandson would be a stateless, rootless refugee gives me the creeps," says a Pakistani executive.

The sense of insecurity has already begun to take its toll. Members of the Indian Chamber of Commerce admit that many Indian businessmen have already begun to transfer their resources outside Hong Kong. A diamond trader invested a million US dollars in the Australian gold-mining business and a Sikh trader moved out leaving just a shell of his export business. "It is reasonable to understand why people are leaving or disinvesting," says Sital. "But they are doing it quietly for fear of annoying the Chinese."

The list of businessmen planning a pull-out includes Indian expatriates like Ashok Sehajwani, owner of a tailoring establishment in Kowloon. He asked: "Though the Chinese have promised not to disturb the economic structure of the colony for 50 years, how can one trust them? They made similar promises in Shanghai but Indians were driven out." He points out that the fear of living under a communist government is so strong that many amongst the ethnic Chinese are planning to pull out. In a survey of ethnic Chinese, conducted by the district board in the Wanchai locality, 63 per cent of the respondents felt the Chinese would not keep their promises on Hong Kong. "When even the Chinese don't trust them how can we?" asks Sahejwani.

Growing insecurity and the steady exodus of Indian businessmen, led Sital to seek help from New Delhi but nothing concrete emerged.

On the other hand, the 5,500-strong Sikh community faces an entirely different problem. Their community leaders have been frequently staging anti-Indian demonstrations, resulting in a situation where it will be hard for several of even the Indian passport holding Sikhs to return to India. Already, the Indian High Commission has impounded the passports of 10 of the more vocal militants while several others have been given six-monthly passport extensions, a ploy meant to keep them on good behaviour. Several Hong Kong Sikhs find their names on the intelligence agencies' wanted lists in India. Said Khalsa Naujawan Sabha Secretary Amarjit Singh: "Impounding passports is the worst they could do. What could they have done if we had British passports instead? We are just paying for being Indian nationals." But whatever he says, a majority of the Sikhs accept the fact that as the curtain is drawn in 1997, they will have no choice but to return to their native villages in Punjab.

Yet a total pull-out is not such a happy prospect for the Indians. "There is no place like Hong Kong for making money and, no matter how much noise people make, not many of them will finally run away," says Ashok Datwani, a garment exporter. Many others are convinced that the Chinese are too shrewd to slay the golden goose. Fears, however, remain. "The local Chinese do not love Indian businessmen", said an electronics dealer, adding, "and once they have their own government, discrimination could begin." Similar fear is expressed by Raghbir Singh Sehrai, owner of Kowloon's Sher-e-Punjab hotel: "We do not mind staying under the Chinese. But the moment we see any assimilation or intermarrying we will run away to India."

BUT those who cannot run away have been waging a relentless battle to avoid statelessness. Leaders of the Indian community have been lobbying from all possible platforms. And both the legislative council and the press have supported their cause: Martin Lee and Conrad Lam, two influential council members, have been speaking on their behalf. "We want justice done to everybody, particularly the minorities. I hope the Indians are given fair treatment," says Lam. The Indian cause has also found support in the British House of Lords. But the problem is in the House of Commons where the Tories have passed a legislation on Hong Kong's future.

The Indian community has also been contesting the case at the legal and administrative levels. Hari Harilela, the richest Indian trader and one of Hong Kong's influential Tai Pans, is heading the legal offensive in London while the Council of Hong Kong Indian Associations is corresponding with the Government. But so far the British Government has not relented except for an assurance by Home Secretary Douglas Hurd, saying that "if circumstances were to change and any British national came under pressure to leave Hong Kong," the Government of the day would "sympathetically" consider whether they can be admitted to the UK.

Similarly, in a letter to Sital, Margaret Thatcher, the British prime minister, responded only with platitudes. "The arrangements we are making will fully honour the undertaking we have given that no British Dependent Territories Citizens in Hong Kong, nor their children, nor grandchildren should fear statelessness, and they will have a place to call home," she wrote. British officials say this should suffice. "The problem with the Indians is that they only want for a home a place that is forever England. That the Tories can't give," said a British official.

Militant poster at a Gurudwara

The British Government argues that the Hong Kong Indians' right to stay where they are is implicit in the Sino-British accord and that any concession to Indians would amount to an expression of distrust in the Chinese. To clarify this the Indian community leaders met Wu Jiatun, the head of the Xinhua office. He stated that the post-1997 fate of the ethnic minorities was purely a British concern. "How can we feel secure in such a situation? We suspect racism behind the denial of citizenship to us while this has been done for people in Gibraltar and Falkland islands?" said K.B. Rathi, general secretary of the Council of Indian Associations.

In desperation, the Hong Kong Indians have turned to New Delhi for support. Sital has apprised Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of their plight. But, while expressing his sympathy, the Government has said that the British passport holders are a responsibility of the UK. Said a Ministry of External Affairs spokesman: "We are still studying the new British laws that affect Hong Kong Indians and the final policy is yet to take shape. But we are not sure what we can do about them."

British passport holders have mooted the plan to develop the Andaman islands as a free port which will attract both Indians and other businessmen who wish to flee a communist Hong Kong. Sital is the main backer of the idea of turning the Andamans into "the Bahamas of the Bay of Bengal". He promises that much of the investment would come from overseas Indians. "Following East Africa, rich Indians have had problems all over the world. They will welcome this kind of return home," he says, adding for emphasis: "The potential is enormous. 30,000 Malayalees are returning from the Gulf every year and you need a new entrepreneurial haven like the Andamans to absorb them and their savings". He points out that the Andamans, astride one of the busiest shipping lanes in the world, could leave other tax havens in the world behind.

In New Delhi, the idea apparently has the sympathy of Rajiv. But officials foresee daunting infrastructural and environmental problems (INDIA TODAY, November 15, 1985). A project of this magnitude is hardly likely to become a reality in a decade. Also it is unlikely that bureaucratic controls would allow the emergence of anything resembling Hong Kong on Indian territory.

But the Hong Kong Indians' only hope lies in London. The Council of Indian Associations is planning to appeal to the European Commission on Human Rights. For the moment the only visible silver lining is a possible Tory defeat in the forthcoming elections. And their fate is thus linked to the political fortunes of Labour's Neil Kinnock, who has announced support for their cause.

The seven SAARC leaders at Nandi Hills

SAARC

Painful Progress

IF there was one stark symbol of the evolutionary problems facing the fledgling South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) at their second summit in Bangalore last fortnight, it was to be found atop the famed Nandi Hills where the seven leaders retired for the traditional retreat. Facing the entrance to Cubbon Hall, the venue of the retreat, was a newly-built tennis court and, in one corner, neatly arranged in a row, were seven pairs of brand-new tennis shoes. The court had been prepared just in case any of the heads of state and governments felt like the extra exercise. In the event, the shoes went unused but served to symbolise the fact that the seven members of SAARC were still not ready to play ball with each other.

The road to SAARC summits are paved with good intentions, but it is the permanent pot-holes that succeed in ensuring that any progress gets bone-jarring and painfully slow. Collectively, the seven-nation body (India, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, Nepal and the Maldives) constitutes the single most populous (997.85 million) and poorest (average per capita income: US $241) grouping in the international community. With two dictatorships, two monarchies and three democracies, it is also the most politically divergent. More important, the two most prominent and powerful members, India and Pakistan, with their ingrained attitude of mutual mistrust and hostility, cannot resist the temptation to use SAARC as a stage for political one-upmanship which does much to dilute the organisation's credibility and long-term effectiveness.

Added to all this is India's current relations with Sri Lanka vis-a-vis the Tamil militants which casts its own shadow across SAARC confabulations and tends to give the impression that the organisation's main appeal lies in the bilateral side dishes rather than the main course. But that, paradoxically, is perhaps SAARC's greatest asset, that it provides an annual opportunity for regional leaders to meet eyeball to eyeball and tackle bilateral differences even though the charter officially discourages such trade-offs.

The fragile balance of regional cooperation will always rest on one hypersensitive fulcrum—the state of Indo-Pakistan relations.

Thus, viewed objectively, the Bangalore summit did emerge with some positive developments apart from the areas designated for enlarging the scope of SAARC. The setting up of a permanent secretariat in Kathmandu means that the organisation is now institutionalised and will perforce have to get down to formal business. Remarked India's Foreign Secretary A.P. Venkateswaran: "As SAARC evolves, it has to add to its activities. In that sense, the Bangalore summit went as well as anybody could have expected." Added his Pakistani counterpart Abdus Sattar: "Within the short time since its inception, SAARC has made impressive progress."

There was also the added drama of the efforts to untangle Sri Lanka's ethnic knot with Indian Air-Force aircraft secretly ferrying in the key players, and, if no solution was found, at least the two sides now know exactly where they stand. In addition, there was also the unexpected bonus from the meeting between Rajiv Gandhi and Pakistani Prime Minister Mohammed Khan Junejo which, if nothing else, at least led to an agreement for the resumption of talks between the two sides on the thorny terrorism issue and, at a higher level, on normalisation of relations. Another positive development was the agreement to evolve a joint strategy on global economic issues at international forums.

But for all that, SAARC is still very much in the experimental stage. The organisation is barely a year old and there is still a conscious attempt on the part of the leaders and the back room boys to skirt around any controversial issues. As at the Dhaka summit, the Bangalore meeting failed to come up with an unanimous definition of terrorism, mainly because of India's stand on Pakistan's alleged training of Sikh terrorists and Sri Lanka's stand on the Tamil militants. Similarly, India's strong appeal for the inclusion of economic, trade and industrial cooperation—a key factor for the eventual growth of SAARC—met with little success because of strong opposition by Pakistan which harbours fears that India's superior industrial and technological know-how will give it an unfair advantage.

Consequently, the summit in Bangalore did not succeed in scaling any great heights in terms of forging tighter bonds of friendship and mutual cooperation—an impression which was further strengthened by the bilateral side-shows that stole the SAARC limelight. But by the end of the day, there was enough evidence to indicate that, with added experience and encouragement, the seven players could eventually get their act together in transforming the organisation into a vital—and viable—entity. The bad news is that the fragile balance of regional cooperation will always rest on one hypersensitive fulcrum—the state of Indo-Pakistan relations.

Saarclights

Bangalore had its fair share of interesting sidelights during the SAARC meet. Samples:

■ Accommodating the seven heads of state and governments posed some tricky initial problems for the hosts, the Government of India, and for Welcomgroup's Windsor Manor where the leaders stayed. The hotel has six deluxe suites. And since seven into six won't go, the Ministry of External Affairs first suggested to Welcomgroup that one way out of the dilemma was to break down a wall so that one of the smaller luxury suites could be upgraded to a deluxe suite for Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi. After much discussion, the problem was solved by Rajiv himself who agreed to stay in the Trafalgar Suite, one of the luxury suites, and leave the deluxe ones for the other six.

Jayewardene with pianist (top); and Begum Yakub Khan with percolator

■ At Windsor Manor every entrance had a metal detector which worked fine except when the cultural troupe arrived to perform for Rajiv's banquet. One of the musicians had packed his instruments in a steel trunk which sent the detector's alarm crazy. Immediately, hordes of beady-eyed security guards, ignoring the poor musician's protests, started to take apart the dholaks. It was only when a senior official suggested that they pass the instruments through the detector minus the steel trunk that the alarm bells stopped pealing.

■ The menu for Rajiv's five-course banquet was cleared by Sonia who approved the rest but wanted the main course changed to something more Indian. So in between the more exotic avacados and mousse was served Murgh Mussalam and Biryani.

■ Begum Yakub Khan, the Pakistan foreign minister's wife, found the south Indian coffee made from freshly-ground coffee beans so delicious that she requested the chef to demonstrate exactly how it was made. Welcomgroup, not one to miss any opportunity, presented her with a coffee percolator and enough coffee beans to last her till her next visit.

■ The most popular head of state at Windsor Manor was Sri Lanka's Jayewardene. On his arrival, he was greeted by a doorman sporting a luxurious, flowing moustache. "I envy your moustache," Jayewardene told the stunned doorman. "I wish I could have been so lucky." Jayewardene, 81, then found a soul-mate in the hotel pianist who had a repertoire of tunes from the '30s and '40s. From then on it was nostalgia time as he had the pianist play old-time tunes at every opportunity. Even when he was leaving, the pianist was brought old to play favourites one last time.

■ It can now be revealed what Rajiv's weakness is—chocolates. The prime minister just can't resist chocolates and his eyes lit up when he saw the basket laid out in his suite. "Look at the chocolates," he told Sonia, who promptly warned him not to over-indulge. His other favourite food, as Welcomgroup sources reveal, is kababs of any kind, as long as they are soft and spicy.

Articulating a Change

ECONOMIC policy has been sufficiently changed under Rajiv Gandhi for it to be described as the "new economic policy". But we have been so conditioned by the notion that India can reform only by stealth that a clear and forceful articulation of the goals, the rationale and the structure of the new policy is still lacking. Without it, the new policy is vulnerable to the frequently-heard charges of incoherence, ad hocism, vacillation and backsliding. Equally, it becomes susceptible to unwarranted ideological barbs that the new policy betrays the objectives and values that animated the old.

In fact, the new policy does not depart from the old in objectives or in broad strategy. Rather, it seeks to change the policy framework deployed to implement the strategy so as to better achieve these objectives.

The principal objective of our planned efforts has been, and continues to be, the removal of abject poverty to achieve minimum living standards for all. The pervasive nature of poverty meant that we had to proceed on two fronts. A direct attack through fiscal expenditures targeted at the poor (on health and education, for example) obviously had its place. But a preponderant reliance had to be placed on the indirect instrumentality of rapid growth to pull even more of the poor into gainful employment. Growth alone could create a substantial impact on the poor; even the direct expenditures could not be continued, leave alone expanded, without the resources that growth must generate.

Attacking poverty through growth, with policies in place to select and influence the process towards greater impact on the poor, thus constituted an activist, government-led "pull-up" strategy, wholly different from the passive, hands-off "trickle-down" strategy with which it is foolishly confused.

The strategy should have worked. Indeed there is much evidence from India's green revolution itself that growth helps the poor. But the evidence is far more dramatic for the rapidly-growing countries of the Far East where the magic of compound arithmetic has produced significant improvements in the real incomes of the poor within two decades. Indeed the astonishing success of these economies prompted Swedish economist Staffan Linder to christen the present the pacific century and to remark that India and China, the two countries that economists had picked as winners and rivals in the '50s, had shrunk by contrast into 'giant insignificance'. What went wrong?

> "The constraints have created a rentier, rather than an entrepreneurial, mentality with this regime of "don'ts", forgetting that the effect of shielding men from the consequences of their folly is to fill the world with fools."

The clue lies in the fact that, while India doubled its savings and investment rates between 1950 and now to well over 20 per cent, the growth rate remained virtually stagnant. The productivity of investments, reflecting the policy framework, was abysmal. A little reflection, buttressed by abundant evidence and analysis, assigns much of the blame to two crippling components of the old policy framework: excessive controls and neglect of foreign trade.

It is nonsensical to monitor and constrain diversification and capacity expansion and to rule out entry by new producers—yet that is what was practised to excess. The constraints have created a rentier, rather than an entrepreneurial, mentality with this regime of "don'ts", forgetting Herbert Spencer's remark that the effect of shielding men from the consequences of their folly is to fill the world with fools. Resources were diverted into directly-unproductive profit-seeking activities where you make a buck by chasing licences rather than by producing, replacing production by what Pareto called "predation". Productivity and innovation cannot be expected to flourish in this sheltered paradise; and they did not.

Closely allied to this folly was the neglect of export markets and their amply-documented benefits for economic performance. India slipped from a leading exporter of manufactured goods from developing countries to having a negligible share by the '80s. South Korea had four times India's exports by 1980 while its value-added in manufactures rose to 60 per cent of ours. Fortunately, the new policy is aimed precisely at cutting these cancers from the body economic. In essence, it seeks extensive liberalisation, internal and external, of the economy so as to secure higher returns on investments, thus reducing poverty faster.

The policy runs against vested interests spawned by the old policy: defunct economists, bureaucrats, politicians, businessmen. It is carried largely by a remarkable leadership that has an intuitive grasp of what needs to be done. Clear and visible victories are therefore the essence of this war of transition. From this viewpoint, the early emphasis on tax reform, not central to the new policy but totally consonant with its preference for pragmatic efficiency over rhetoric, was just right: it yielded increased tax revenues, demonstrating quickly and strikingly that the new policies had a big pay-off.

The credibility so gained will aid in the more difficult task of dismantling controls and opening the economy to regain its traditional role in world commerce. A coherently articulated policy will also permit credibility, so necessary to be retained in the commitment to the transition as the Government must perforce accommodate from time to time to realities by temporary strategic reversals. The alternative is the stark one of continuing our steady decline into comparative economic insignificance on the world stage.

Dr Jagdish Bhagwati, 52, is an internationally-known economist. He is a professor at Columbia University since 1980 and has authored a number of articles and books on the economies of underdeveloped nations.

ROUGH RIDE

THE Modi bid to manufacture 2000 cc cars in collaboration with Volvo of Sweden has run into rough weather. The Government has indicated to the Modis that the 20,000 cars per annum venture will be cleared only if the car is indigenised much faster than proposed and if the Modis accept a 30 per cent export obligation. While the Modis are busy figuring out ways to meet these conditions, Escorts has requested the Government to take a decision on its Citroen proposal before the year-end. The French company has indicated that it would have to consider setting up shop in China if the decision is delayed beyond December. Escorts has also scaled down its annual production programme from one lakh to 50,000 and said that it will sell the car for Rs 50,000, Rs 5,000 more than the price initially proposed, because the value of the French franc has climbed. The Government is expected to decide on clearing these projects only after it announces its new automobile policy in a few weeks.

PROBLEM PLANT

THE Rs 75-crore-turnover Union Carbide India Ltd's (UCIL) unit in Bombay, which has been closed for seven months, seems destined to spend some more time in limbo. With a Union Carbide Corporation team expressing unhappiness with the plant's safety precautions, its scheduled December reopening has been put off further. And though the plant's workers have been getting their salaries, totalling Rs 18 lakh per month, they fear it may be closed down for good. The workers contend that the management is studying a Maharashtra Government circular—sent to many other units also—asking the company to shift out of town. UCIL's homework showed that this could cost Rs 60 crore. Now, a group of plant-level managers has offered an employee takeover. The UCIL's response to the offer remains to be seen.

PUFFING UP TIES

TOBACCO giant Rothmans of the US and Godfrey Phillips India (GPI) have been negotiating a tie-up to launch new cigarette brands. Rothmans already has an agreement with New Tobacco Company (NTC), permitting it to produce cigarettes under the Rothmans and Oxford brand names. GPI, however, has a line to Rothmans through its collaborator Phillip Morris, which has a 30 per cent equity stake in Rothmans. Meanwhile, competition in the cigarette market is hotting up. NTC recently introduced Cambridge and World Cup, while GPI kicked off a brand called Philips in Bombay and testmarketed Action Filter Kings in Hyderabad.

PEGGING PRICES

FERTILISER companies have reacted sharply to an official committee's recommendations that domestic fertiliser prices be pegged at international levels and that the 12 per cent post-tax return on net worth which the industry is entitled to, be lowered. Though the report was sent to the industry some months ago, it recently responded by arguing that the first proposal didn't make sense: input costs are five times higher in India than abroad. Also, foreign suppliers dump fertilisers in India while charging their own farmers up to four times the international price. The industry contended that lowering the officially-fixed rate of return would discourage fresh investment as the opportunity cost of capital is over 12 per cent. The Government's decision is awaited.

SAVINGS SHIFT

MORE and more of national savings are being held in private hands. While the net domestic savings declined as a percentage of the net domestic product (from 17.5 per cent in 1981-82 to 16.1 per cent in 1984-85), the savings of the household sector kept rising: from 9.3 per cent of the net domestic product in 1981-82 to 10.8 per cent in 1984-85. This contrasts sharply with 1970-71, when household savings were 5.6 per cent of the net domestic product—less than half the net domestic savings at 12 per cent.

SHARE SALE

HINDUSTAN Aluminium's (HINDALCO) long-time American collaborator, Kaiser Aluminium and Chemicals Corporation, is pulling out of the Aditya Birla-run company by selling its 27 per cent shareholding. The 20-year collaboration agreement with Kaiser ended a few years ago. The US firm had thought of pulling out then but it was stymied by conditions that the Government placed on the share sale. One of these conditions related to the US company deducting the dividend for the previous year from its sale price, which made the net price unattractive for Kaiser. The US company now plans to offer its 27 per cent equity in HINDALCO to the company's shareholders and has applied to the Government and the Reserve Bank for permission. The Birlas own some 26 per cent of HINDALCO stock, while the public, the financial institutions and the banks hold the rest. Exactly how much they will be entitled to buy is yet to be determined because the Government will have to arrive at an appropriate formula.

SHAW WALLACE

Institutional Muscle

IF high drama was expected, it was missing. To be sure, voices were raised, and charges of foul play were aired. But events moved swiftly as one resolution after another was put to vote, and the truckload of policemen who maintained vigil outside the venue of the three-day Shaw Wallace shareholders' meetings was soon sent packing.

The sensation was to follow. Last fortnight, retired justice B.C. Mitra, who had been appointed by the Supreme Court to preside over the meetings, announced the dramatic poll outcome at Wallace House in Calcutta. Exercising their crucial 33 per cent equity muscle, the financial institutions and banks had ousted chairman and managing director Senapur Panduranga Acharya and three of his colleagues from the company's eight-member board, abstained from voting on a resolution seeking approval for Acharya's remuneration (thereby ensuring that it would be defeated), voted in two more of their representatives on to the board—and kept the Gulf-based Chhabrias and their nominees out.

The institutions' decision could have widespread ramifications. There are several companies with large blocks of foreign shareholdings, and companies have changed hands in the past through the acquisition of overseas shares. But such buyers will now think twice because of the institutional factor, and the fight that can be put up by a defiant local management. Also, companies across the country have been reminded once again of the constant presence of institutional shareholding muscle.

The institutions must have weighed all this in voting the way they did. And the Chhabria brothers could not neutralise their voting power. They had rustled up proxies for 6 per cent of the equity along with the 38.7 per cent they had acquired overseas, but 45 per cent could not carry the day. For the institutions teamed up with Acharya's 16 per cent shareholder support to keep the Chhabrias at bay. Simultaneously, they backed the Chhabrias to oust Acharya and his three colleagues—a strategy that put them at the Shaw Wallace helm. As one observer wryly put it: "It's like the fable of the monkey and the two fighting cats."

The results have to be posted to the Supreme Court and are subject to the court's decision in a case before it, and Acharya and his men will continue on the board till the case is decided. Nevertheless, the outcome of the polling has one clear meaning: the institutions with their four directors have a majority because the board's strength has been trimmed to six. They will do the backseat driving at Shaw Wallace for the moment. Last fortnight, a senior government official maintained that the institutions would be failing in their duty if they had not already decided on a new managing director, but the chairman of one financial institution said that no one had been selected as yet: "There is still time for that. The present board is there till the Supreme Court decides on the case."

The election results also raised another hairy side issue: would Acharya have to repay his salary to the company with retrospective effect from July 1, 1985, when he was reappointed managing director, because the company's shareholders have not sanctioned the remuneration? Explains tax lawyer O.P. Vaish: "Under the Companies Act, he's not entitled to remuneration unless shareholders approve it. So he's technically liable to refund it. But on the general principles of contract, he cannot be deprived of reasonable compensation." If the denouement to the two-year-long battle to control the country's second largest liquor company caught the Shaw Wallace management napping (one company official had confidently predicted victory) Acharya wasn't available for comment. The 60-year-old Shaw Wallace supremo went on leave, presumably after the election results were announced. But at a press conference in Calcutta on the eve of the meetings, Acharya said: "It's the prerogative of the institutions to do what they like."

The Chhabrias, however, had their ears to the ground. They had predicted that the institutional vote would go against them. Said Kishore Chhabria: "This was expected. We had a one-point programme of removing Acharya. Our stand has been vindicated. The financial institutions have acted in a judicious manner."

"I don't think we lost. There can't be two losers. If there had been one ballot-paper, the institutions would have voted for us."

KISHORE CHHABRIA

Certainly, the institutions had agreed days before the meetings began to keep both sides out of the company. "In a situation where you had two warring groups, the company needed stability," explained a government official. He also implied that investigations of the company's affairs had proved damaging to Acharya, while Chhabrias had no manufacturing record worth mentioning in the country. In any event, they faced Enforcement Directorate charges in Bangalore of having violated the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act by colluding with Vijay Mallya of United Breweries in acquiring Shaw Wallace's overseas shares.

Chhabria, of course, has ready responses to this. He says that the two brothers left the country in the 1970s with their pockets virtually empty but now run a Rs 500-crore company in the Gulf. Adds he: "I am only hurt that the financial institutions have punished me before I have been convicted. There is nothing else than the Bangalore complaint against me. The law says that you are innocent until proven guilty." Finally, Chhabria made the apparently astonishing claim that "I don't think we have lost. There can't be two losers. If there had been one ballot-paper, the institutions would have voted for us."

And there hangs a tale. The meetings were called to more than double the company's share capital so that bonus shares could be issued, and to vote on resolutions seeking the ouster of Acharya and his men and their replacement by the Chhabrias and their nominees. When the resolutions pitting Kishore's brother Manohar and a Chhabria nominee against two retiring directors came up for consideration, the meeting's chairman ruled that the retiring director's election would be voted on first; only if he was not elected would the case of the Chhabria nominee be taken up. The judge later reversed his ruling and permitted voting on both the names.

Still, that effectively split the ballot instead of providing a direct face-off between the candidates—and sparked off a controversy on the propriety of the decision. While lawyers argue that a meeting's chairman has a right to regulate its proceedings and that the law requires voting on each director to take place independently, they also aver that polling on a sitting director can only take place after the vote on the challenger is taken. Whatever the merits of these contentions, the Chhabrias could challenge the ruling in the Supreme Court.

The Chhabrias have other options open to them. For one, they can mark time till the next shareholders' meeting which has to be held by the month-end. A more effective proxy hunt could then put them over the magic 50 per cent hump.

A fresh proxy hunt is therefore an attractive proposition, but the Chhabrias may not go down that route. Kishore Chhabria has time and again declared that he will not fight the Government, come what may.

He and brother Manohar could also hawk their equity. There were reports that a foreign multinational had approached them once more to unload their holding, and that the Chhabrias had spurned the offer, partly because they believed that the offer was not seriously made and was meant to test their intentions. Says Kishore: "We won't quit, unless we have to fight the Government." What is clear, however, is that there will be no dearth of offers if the Chhabrias wish to sell, because the Rs 240-crore company is a money-spinner.

Finally, astonishing as it may seem, the Chhabrias could patch up with Acharya. "Why not? I've nothing personal against him. He thinks he's fighting for a cause. We are fighting for our rights. We have to have a coalition management; we can't run the company on our own. I would like to talk to Acharya."

A more likely scenario is the Chhabrias suing for peace with the Government. As they are the first to admit, the Bangalore case could go on for years. The brothers have so far received paltry returns on their Rs 28 crore investment in the Shaw Wallace shares but have had to fork out an estimated Rs 1.5 lakh a day in interest costs alone, and petitioning the Government may be the only realistic course open to them. The Government too may not be able to ignore a 38 per cent block for long and could take any overtures into account while deciding the final fate of the 100-year-old company. If that happens, the Chhabrias could have lost a battle only to win the war.

CAPITAL GOODS IMPORTS

Growing Controversy

IT has a familiar ring to it. A local industry claims that it is being squeezed by cheap imports, the media latches on to the charge and runs a series of horror stories. Finally, the Government appoints a committee to probe into the matter. If that were all, the snowballing controversy over the steep climb in capital goods imports could be dismissed as yet another successful lobbying effort.

But there's more to the drama. In the eye of the storm are key players in the economy—the capital goods industry itself, represented by the Confederation of Engineering Industry (CEI), and the fertiliser industry. And the stakes are high: business worth well over Rs 1,000 crore for manufacturers of capital goods, and the possibility of the bill for six new fertiliser plants that are now coming up along the Hazira-Bijaypur-Jagdishpur route burgeoning by an estimated Rs 240-crore.

At the heart of the furious debate is the low import tariffs for equipment meant for new projects. Last year, the Government kicked off a liberal import regime by drastically slashing the duty on machinery for power projects to 25 per cent and eliminating it altogether from fertiliser equipment. The official intention was clearly to provide competition to a high-cost domestic industry which is widely regarded as inefficient.

The results were eminently predictable. Growing numbers of entrepreneurs began shopping abroad for their machinery (see chart). One index of this: the Government's capital goods committee cleared imports worth Rs 634 crore in the first half of this year, almost 85 per cent of the Rs 747-crore sanctioned throughout the whole of last year. The growth in imports could be much higher because the committee is responsible only for a fraction of the imports.

Predictably, domestic machinery manufacturers are quick to attribute their plight to the mounting imports. Last year, the capital goods industry grew by just 3.5 per cent, almost half the industrial growth rate of 6.6 per cent.

Backing these contentions is a recently released report on the fertiliser and power industries. The CEI-commissioned study suggests that if local capital goods produced for the fertiliser industry are 25 to 189 per cent more costly than foreign wares, the culprit is input prices.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

Says the report: "If Indian producers could get inputs at the cheapest international prices, then they would generally be as cost efficient as foreign firms."

What is more, alleges the report, domestic equipment buyers tailor their tenders so as to favour foreign firms. As an example they mention that while inviting bids for certain equipment, the state-owned Engineers India Ltd (EIL) specified a length of experience in building the equipment that no Indian firm possessed.

The press, in turn, speedily picked up the charge and fired some salvos of its own. A financial daily alleged last month that companies such as Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd (HAL) and the National Thermal Power Corporation (NTPC) met the statutory requirement of advertising in government journals without providing adequate time to Indian suppliers to respond to the tenders.

Some of these allegations are true and some are not. An EIL official privately admitted that company executives tailored advertisements so as to favour foreign suppliers. "They can then get trips overseas," explained the official. But spokesmen of the other two companies dismissed the charge. HAL's Finance Director C.V. Nagendra claimed that he had documentary evidence showing that his company's advertisement had been available to the public well in time. Added an NTPC spokesman: "The allegation that bidders did not have enough time is not true. We advertised in the newspapers as well as the journal."

Such matters are, of course, a side-show to the fierce controversy, and the CEI report homed in on the principal problem by presenting a case for higher customs duties (25 per cent for fertiliser equipment). But the case has not gone unchallenged. The fertiliser industry, the chief beneficiary of low customs duties, quickly lobbied with the Government, pointing out that a duty hike would push up the cost of each fertiliser venture by around Rs 40 crore. Last fortnight, Fertiliser Association of India's Executive Director Pratap Narayan contended that far from netting the Government revenue, a tariff would cost it dearly because bigger project bills would lead to higher interest and depreciation charges. In turn, these would push up fertiliser production costs. Since the Government fixes the industry's profits using a complex formula that takes such costs into account, the Government would have to fork out fatter subsidies to fertiliser manufacturers. B.N. Puranmalka, managing director of the Birla-run Indo-Gulf Fertilisers and Chemicals, which is putting up one of the six new fertiliser plants, echoes the point when he argues: "The suggestion to impose a duty is very dangerous. If the cost of equipment goes up, the subsidy will go up."

have taken place, it is not due to the removal of customs duty but for other reasons. It is either the capital goods industry's delivery schedules or the technical specifications that are inadequate," says Narayan. Further, fertiliser industry professionals claim that proposals to import various types of equipment are thoroughly vetted by government committees which take the indigenous supply position into account before clearing them, and that removing the excise on local machinery would do more to place them on an equal footing than slapping an import duty.

The Government, however, buys only some of these arguments. A senior government functionary said last fortnight that imports had surged not because of the duty structure but because foreign bilateral aid was tied to the import of capital goods. The official further added that the rise in imports indicated that companies were investing more, and that loopholes existed in official import clearance procedures. "We are thinking of closing the loopholes. But the capital goods industry has operated in a protected environment till now. It should have some protection, but the protection should not be open ended," said the official.

He also confidently asserted that the controversy would be happily resolved in the next few months. If so, come budget time, both the fertiliser and engineering industries may be in for a capital surprise.

MAHANAGAR TELEPHONE NIGAM

Public Call

THERE'S good news ahead for telephone subscribers in Delhi and Bombay: push-button telephones are round the corner; so are bills that list the duration and time of calls, and perhaps even improved services. Better still, the telephone waiting list of 3.7 lakh in the two cities could disappear by 1990—if the whopping Rs 1,200 crore needed for the hefty investments is forthcoming.

Last fortnight, Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Limited (MTNL), the telephone corporation which the Government launched last April for Bombay and Delhi, was readying to raise Rs 150 crore from the public, the first in a series of ambitious fund-raising drives. The money is meant for revamping the telephone system and buying new equipment.

For starters, orders have been placed for push-button instruments that will replace rotary dialling telephones from next March. Initially, only 30 per cent of the 10 lakh subscribers in the two metropolises will get the new telephones because production is a constraint. And the fortunate few will be the big companies and those living in areas where the traffic density is high. But all the old telephones will be eventually phased out on the ground of inefficiency. Argues M.P. Shukla, MTNL managing director: "Push-button instruments will help eliminate wrong calls because people often do not dial properly with rotary dial telephones."

Also in the pipeline are Rs 15 crore worth of detailed billing systems, which are to be imported. Likely to be installed at telephone exchanges before the middle of next year, they are meant to cut the spate of complaints about wrong billing.

Calls could be put through more quickly: over the next three years the two cities will have only digital electronic exchanges. To usher in fault-free lines, cables are to be protected from the ubiquitous digging by enclosing them in concrete ducts. Better material is to be used in line joints, usually a potential trouble spot, and some exchanges at least will be connected by optical fibres.

Closer home, attention is finally being paid to MTNL's own shortcomings. It has hired four consultants to recommend steps to revamp the telephone agency, provide incentives to employees, trim redundant operations, and improve its public image. "We asked the consultants to implement their reports and accept a penalty of 1 per cent of their fee for delays. One of them demurred but finally came round," says Shukla.

These are certainly ambitious plans, and the financial outlays to implement them are equally ambitious. MTNL proposes to more than double this year's Rs 176 crore investment to Rs 450 crore in the next two years. Where will the money come from? The Government has before it a proposal to jack up telephone rentals and tariffs, and telecommunication department officials argue that the rise in tariffs has not kept pace with soaring costs. The present tariff rates bring in returns of around 13 per cent on the capital invested, and officialdom would obviously like to see this go up.

Even as the Government ponders on whether to hike rates, MTNL is banking on its public issue being heavily oversubscribed. The corporation has the telephone department's past image to contend with, and its big plans plainly hinge on its ability to convince the public that it intends to ring in new times. Whether it can, eventually, is of course the big question.

GAIL

Problems in the Pipeline

The pipeline near Jhabua

WHEN the Government formed the Gas Authority of India Limited (GAIL) in August 1984 and entrusted to it the management of the ambitious Rs 1,700-crore Hazira-Bijaipur-Jagdishpur (HBJ) gas pipeline, the Petroleum Ministry must have heaved a sigh of relief for it was killing two birds with one stone: creating an independent body to take charge of all gas supplies produced from the country's oil and gas fields, while also making one agency responsible for the largest national gas pipeline project. But even after two years of shouldering this responsibility, GAIL has drifted into the unenviable position of not being able to deliver the goods on either front. Its first major assignment—overseeing the construction of the 1,758-km-long pipeline—is way behind schedule. And all the signs point to continuing delays.

The pipeline project received renewed media attention on October 17 when the then industry minister Narain Dutt Tewari visited Petlavad, a tiny hamlet near Jhabua in Madhya Pradesh to inaugurate the pipe laying. According to the Government's own figures, about 150 km of the pipeline should have been laid since then. But now two months later all that is in place so far is the less than 200 metres of pipeline which was lowered into the trench at the time of the inauguration.

Notwithstanding the hoopla accompanying its creation, the stark fact is that GAIL, which has already spent about Rs 700 crore on the HBJ project, continues to remain virtually a paper organisation with no senior identifiable person responsible for calling the shots. It has been without a full-time chairman or managing director for the last couple of months when H.S. Cheema, who had worn both hats, was moved out. Even though the Government has been looking for a replacement there have been no takers so far. As one senior official put it: "The project spells trouble and no one seems to want to put his career on the line." In addition, GAIL has no director of personnel, and the finance director is serving on a three-month extension.

GAIL, rudderless and adrift, could play havoc with the economies of multi-thousand-crore fertiliser and power projects expected to depend on the pipeline as their prime source of energy. According to the original contract with the Franco-Japanese consortium led by Spie Capag, the first fertiliser unit—National Fertilisers Ltd at Bijaipur—is scheduled to receive gas from the pipeline by March next year. But if the concern expressed by some of GAIL's senior officers, including "The initial problems are over and work is going ahead full steam."

General Manager R.P. Madhekar at a recent closed-door meeting about the lack of progress on the project is any gauge, it is unlikely that the deadline will be met. The last confidential monthly progress report prepared by GAIL paints a dismal picture about welding activities. The first phase of the schedule calls for the completion of welding and coating on about 641 km of pipe by March. So far, only about 15 km is complete.

Nonetheless, spokesmen for Spie Capag express the confidence that they can meet the target dates for the completion of the first phase. Says Christian Pellet, area construction manager posted at Baroda: "We shall put everything at our disposal to complete the job in time and we will do it by all means." Echoing him is W.M. Drope, assistant construction manager of pipelines at Ujjain in charge of the last 320 km of the first phase: "Spie Capag has no intention of going back on the contract." He argues that what matters are the final date of completion.

BUT this same confidence is not shared by others involved in the work. Says an official of Dodsals—the largest subcontractor for Spie Capag responsible for laying the pipeline in over half of the distance to be covered during the first phase: "We have not been able to get customs clearance for certain key equipment and it will be a little tricky to comment on the realistic date of completion." Vital equipment such as welding machines, and even camping gear is stuck at Kandla and Bombay ports. As a result, more than 100 French and Japanese technicians, "are still stranded in Baroda while they should have been in the fields". But Pierre C. Capo, vice-president of Spie Capag, emphasises that the initial problems are over and work is "going ahead full steam".

Customs delays, however, are not the only impediment in the path of the incipient scheme. The project has also been crippled by the slow acquisition of heavy machinery needed for earth-moving as well as highly complex coating and welding jobs. This is because the purchase contracts for most of this equipment, to be procured from abroad, have been delayed. The laying of the pipes in itself is not the end of the journey. After the pipes are put into the ground, they have to undergo a series of scientific tests in order to determine their strength and use worthiness. With the initial work so far behind, the testing—which is a must—is expected to lead to even further delays.

Concerned over the delay and the heavy penalty clauses involved in the agreement with the Government, the consortium is now moving ahead with a part of the job without having the approved drawings and blueprints from GAIL. It is also seeking permission to waive certain checks and balances stipulated in the original contract, in order to speed things up. Some waivers have already been granted. For example, GAIL engineers have already granted a temporary waiver for the stress-testing of pipe joints which is a time-consuming process. Project officials admit that while this would quicken the pace of the pipe laying it would certainly compromise the safe and effective working of the system. But it reflects the desperation of some of the project managers who feel that if they are unable to complete the first phase by the onset of the monsoon there will be another built-in three-month delay to tide over the monsoon period when all work is expected to come to a standstill.

There are other indicators that the project will be hopelessly behind schedule. In order to operate the pipeline, a massive amount of civil construction work has to be undertaken to house various operating units like compressor stations, telecommunications operations, and safety control monitors. These projects, internal government documents show, have not even come off the drawing-boards. One senior civil engineer of GAIL pointed out that it will take at least eight months to a year to complete the construction after final approval of drawings, and another three to four months for the installation of the equipment.

Unused pipes stacked at site

PRASHANT PANJIAR

While the tardy progress of the pipe laying has become cause for grave concern, the readiness of GAIL to operate it also raises an equally important question.

While the tardy progress of the pipe laying has become cause for grave concern, the readiness of GAIL to operate it also raises an equally important question. Laments a member of the GAIL Officers' Association (GOA) which enjoys near-total membership of all the technical and administrative officers in the organisation: "We expect that the senior management will try to commission the project as early as possible to earn mileage for themselves but that will eventually be at the cost of safety, security and efficiency."

GAIL records reveal that as against the required manpower of 868 in the month of August it is still continuing with only half of that strength. Of these, about 260 are Class I officers making the organisation top-heavy. The field staff is still negligible. The personnel frustration and low morale within GAIL is evident from the fact that, since its inception, about 50 officers—one-fifth of the staff—have quit the organisation. Currently, while GAIL has been recruiting trainees, it has not hired any junior level staff to perform lower level supervisory and field duties.

"We are aware of the situation and the matter is under consideration by senior authorities," comments an official spokesman for GAIL. But with all the problems the project is facing and no adequate preparatory measures still in sight to meet them headlong, it is becoming frighteningly apparent that the nation's first major gasline project may wind up becoming a costly pipe-dream.

THE MARKETS

Low Point

THE bottom virtually dropped out of the market last fortnight, even as confusion reigned following fresh raids by tax authorities, and the market remained closed for several days. Virtually every index of share prices showed dramatic falls, registering the lowest levels of the year, and there were few buyers left on the market.

The official Bombay stock exchange index of equity prices lost 20 points in a single day, dropping to a new low of 519.99. The Economic Times index crashed in the first three weeks of November, coming down from 494.8 to 449.3, well below the previous low-point of the year (466 shortly after the budget).

Leading shares lost heavily. Bajaj Auto, a high-flying scrip in recent weeks, lost Rs 425 and slumped to Rs 4,325. Numerous shares were at—or close to—their lowest points in the year. Tata Steel touched a new low at Rs 972, Larsen & Toubro was at Rs 90, Ingersoll Rand at Rs 245, Hindustan Dorr-Oliver at Rs 280 and Mahindra & Mahindra at Rs 40. In the downbeat commercial vehicle sector Telco lost further ground to close at Rs 525, only marginally higher than its low-point for the year. Only few shares gained ground.

Inspite of the dismal losses there were no signs of any possible bail-out by the financial institutions. And while a technical correction because the market is now over-sold could signal a slight recovery, there is little reason to hope for an improvement in the over-all mood of the market. The Government, while clearing a host of applications for fresh share and debenture issues, seems unconcerned about what the present state of depression could do to the capital market as a whole. With several newly issued scrips available at a discount, it remains to be seen what fate will meet the scores of companies now asking investors to cough up cash.

The biggest two new issues this month are by Reliance Industries (Rs 400 crore in convertible debentures at an attractive conversion ratio) and Indo-Gulf Fertiliser (a total of Rs 280 crore in debentures and shares). With both companies approaching investors simultaneously, the question is which company will do better. Reliance offers more attractive prospects of immediate gains, while Indo-Gulf makes sense as a long-term investment. But it remains to be seen whether there is enough cash going around for both companies to rake in as much as they would like to. There are several smaller issues too on offer, some attractive (like Vareli) and others not so attractive. If current form holds true, several of these companies may fail to raise the money which the Government has allowed them to. If that does happen, the capital market boom will have been well and truly punctured.

ALL infrastructural indicators, besides cement and crude petroleum, are showing double digit growth. This suggests that 1986-87 should be a good year for growth. Prices have also begun to decelerate. The stock-market is not reflecting the economy's health because of its institutional problems.

All data are seasonally adjusted. The current trends are computed on the basis of six months' (weekly data) or two-years' (monthly data) figures. Quarters in text refer to the calendar year quarters.

The last few weeks have shown a healthy deceleration in the rate of inflation. 1986 should end with around 5 per cent inflation.

Signs of deceleration are present in consumer prices as well. The third quarter had an inflation rate of less than 4.5 per cent (annual).

Steadiness is the hall mark of the present monetary policy. This should increase prospects of growth, with reasonable price stability.

The stinginess towards the private sector may have deleterious effects. Credit has been lagging behind the growth in money supply.

The export trend rate does not adequately reflect the pick-up in exports. The export promotion policy may be begining to show results.

Foreign exchange reserves are holding reasonably steady at a level sufficient to pay for over four months of imports.

Share prices are still in the doldrums, reflecting not the prospects of the economy but institutional problems pertaining to the share market.

Gold prices may now have entered a bullish consolidation phase. However, they show a respectful growth since end-June 1986.

Celebrity Advertising

MARSHALL Mcluhan once remarked: "A celebrity is not famous for something he has done, but famous for being famous." This is specially true when we focus on the current advertising arena. We have with us today a host of celebrities who will, after half a decade, be remembered for the television commercials that they made and very little else.

When I joined advertising in the late '50s one of the very few major brand products that rode on 'Celebrity Advertising' was called 'The beauty soap of the Film Stars'. That line is older than anyone in advertising today and Lux Toilet soap is the longest running, most consistently successful case of celebrity advertising in India. For a long time it was the only one.

We have come a long way since that age of innocence. In the '70s the great cricket explosion began with live telecasts of Test matches and the shot-gun excitement of one-day internationals. The cricket star became an overnight celebrity and photographs of Gavaskar, Kapil Dev and Sandeep Patil blossomed in middle class living-rooms like so many household gods. The '80s witnessed the unprecedented spread of the celebrity into every field of life. Singers, dancers, film directors, journalists, actors, editors, stage directors, society women, writers, fashionable restaurant owners regularly and indiscriminately peddling anything that pays them: from tea and ceiling fans to pan masalas and mosquito repellents. The phenomenon of the celebrity rat-pack can be looked at under three heads:

Relevance: One can see both context and relevance in a health drink (Viva) using a sportsman's endorsement (Srikkanth) or for that matter an Oxbridge educated Nawab (Pataudi) whose refinement and impeccability of taste make him vouch for a suiting as 'a way of life' (Gwalior). Such correspondences are accurate and verifiable. The essential characteristics of the spokesperson are meaningful by way of an exact match with product type and quality. But what can be the added value of Shafi Inamdar selling vests or say 'Khopdi' (the lush in Nukkad) promoting a brand of tea?

There appears to be little available data on the effectiveness of celebrity advertising in India. But there is an accumulation of data abroad. In a paper published in the Harvard Business Review, David Ogilvy who has considerable experience in this area, writes: "On the average, commercials built around celebrities were not notably successful in changing brand preference. Twenty one per cent fewer customers reported a change in brand preference influenced by celebrity commercials, compared with the average change for all commercials studied. However, when measured for viewer's ability to recall a commercial 24 hours after seeing it, celebrity commercials scored well above average: 22 per cent more respondents. Why this difference of 21 to 22 between brand preference and recall? We suspect it is because many such messages focus attention on the celebrity rather than on the product." One suspects that a similar situation is not unlikely to exist in the Indian context today.

> "In celebrity advertising, the practitioner goes beyond the legitimate creation of wants and ambitions which leads to human growth, and presents instead a dangerous, vapid day-dream of instant success."

Credibility: A related issue is the question of the credibility of celebrities. Writing in Ogilvy on Advertising, Ogilvy says: "Viewers guess that the celebrity has been bought and they are right." The exception is when experts endorse a product, that is, when there is a reason for consumers to believe that the person is qualified in some way to speak about a particular product. As might be expected, a study (Hershy H. Friedman and Linda Friedman in the US) clearly shows that there is significant product-endorser interaction. Obviously then, a housewife is likely to believe Tarla Dalal talking about a cooking medium but there is not much she is likely to do after watching Sridevi plugging CEMA bulbs.

Selectivity: One great reason for failure in brand recall is the current overuse of certain celebrities. Did I see Gavaskar in the commercial for Lipton Tea? Was it Cherry Blossom Liquid? Or Dinesh Suitings? Thums Up? Silver Plus?... A single spokesman endorsing just one product can, if correctly positioned, produce fantastic brand identity and result in the creation of a celebrity where none such exists. The first recorded case of good advertising at heavy pressure giving birth to a celebrity can be seen in the triumphant march of Lalitaji endorsing Surf. In sizeable sections of north and especially north east India today, nobody believes her to be an advertising agency 'creation'. She is taken to be a real flesh and blood person who embodies Wisdom and Authority. Letters are written to her and her advice sought on matters as diverse as family, marriages and local politics.

Advertising is often accused of creating unnecessary wants, increasing consumption which erodes precious natural and environmental resources and of corrupting the public taste. In the case of the 'nine days wonder' celebrity, such criticism runs dangerously close to the truth. For, in celebrity advertising, the practitioner goes beyond the legitimate creation of wants and ambitions which leads to human growth, and presents instead a dangerous, vapid day-dream of instant success. This is neither implied nor stated, it is there and proved. The presence of the instant celebrity bears mute testimony to the possibility of 'rags to riches' in months. At this point advertising skirts dangerously close to the kind of moral degradation produced by the worst commercial cinema. Advertising never corrupted anyone, at any rate nobody who was not already eager and waiting to be corrupted. But some advertising may bring a man to the brink of deluding and therefore, ultimately of corrupting himself.

KUMAON AND GARHWAL

The Male Migration

PERHAPS it had once seemed a passing phase, this moving from the mountains to the plains in search of work. But today it is an established tradition in Uttar Pradesh's hill regions of Kumaon and Garhwal. Particularly after Independence, the stream of migrants has grown so forceful that it has clearly begun to alter the economic and social face of these mountainous regions.

Principal Correspondent SREEKANT KHANDEKAR and Chief Photographer BHAWAN SINGH recently spent more than a week meeting villagers, officials and academicians in five of the state's eight hill districts to find out why people desert their homes in such numbers. His report:

THIRTY-four-year-old Raghubir Singh looks out of place. With his leather shoes, terrycot trousers and waistcoat, he stands out among the villagers who huddle around him to say goodbye. His mother is in tears as she alternately hugs her son, daughter-in-law Godambari and their two kids. She is not sure when she will see them again.

Raghubir first left his village in 1968, when he was 16. Today he is an electrician in Delhi. But even after 18 years in the capital, his heart is still in his village in Pauri Garhwal district. "I was forced to leave. After all, what other option did I have? But I will return one day," promises Raghubir, who talks like a city man.

It is a tearful scene that is repeated in innumerable places every day across Kumaon and Garhwal (50,000 sq km of mountainous territory with a population of 5.5 million). There are no precise estimates, but there is no disputing the fact that no other area in India has seen such a large-scale emptying out of males in recent times as Uttar Pradesh's increasingly barren hills. The area's agriculture stopped supporting the growing population long ago, jobs are scarce in the hills, and the region in any case has a tradition of enrolling in the army and police forces in large numbers. So the migration continues.

The census figures do not entirely reflect this picture: the 1981 census said there were 1,000 males to every 962 women in Kumaon. But another survey says the outflow of men is so great that in the age group 15 to 50, women outnumber men 1,404 to 1,000.

In places, the ratio may be even more lopsided, as in the case of Kanduli village in Pauri Garhwal, 8 km from the nearest road: 16 entire families have left the village and many of the remaining 60 families have their menfolk working in the plains. The result: among the 325 people that remain, there are only 26 able-bodied men. The rest are either elders, women or children. Says Gyan Singh, a local shopkeeper: "The truth is that all the smart and hard-working people choose to leave this place."

It is the local variation of the brain drain. Harinder Kumar Joshi, bright, 17, and the village's only resident now in the 12th standard, for instance, intends to learn shorthand and leave as early as he can. Out of 14 students in his class in a nearby village, half a dozen already talk in terms of going out.

The situation is not much better elsewhere. Says Trilok Singh, 80, a comparavely well-off farmer from Sasbhira village in Almora dis-rict: "I didn't have to leave my illage because there was no eed to. My family of 10 could ve off our fields." Today his ur sons and their families are Delhi. Three of his four sons-law also work in the plains. et he adds: "We in Kumaon e lucky: the terrain in Garh-al is much harsher."

Pithoragarh district pro-des the most graphic statis-s of the extent of this migra-n. Here, as elsewhere in the hills, a job the armed forces is perhaps the most ught after. Says a district official oudly: "As many as 387 local boys have ed fighting for the country; 52 of them ave been awarded for bravery so far, and at includes one Mahavir Chakra and 24 ir Chakras. How many districts in India n rival that record?"

Today, the district—with a popula-n of just over five lakh—has 20,000 en serving in the armed forces; over a ousand get recruited annually. An-her 12,000 men are with the state police nd paramilitary units, the second most opular place of employment. For good easure, Pithoragarh has 28,000 pen-oners, while another 3,000 women get idows' pension. Probably every second third family in the district lives on onthly money orders.

And as time has gone by, the people have become increasingly dependent on what is known as the money order economy. Just how much of a difference having a family member outside makes has been brought out in a study of 200 households made by S.S. Khanka, a lecturer in Kumaon University. Khanka found that in 66 households with one migrant each, the per capita income excluding remittances was a mere Rs417. But when remittances were included, the per capita figure shot up by 64 per cent to Rs686. In households with more than one migrant, the jump was dramatic.

The figures of remittances are mind-boggling especially if one considers the backwardness of hill territories. Mukul Sanwal, director of the Administrative Training Institute at Nainital, recalls that even as early as 1973-74, remittances—including pensions—brought in about Rs 4.50 crore annually to Almora district. In Pithoragarh district the annual remittances from army, paramilitary and police personnel amount to Rs 10 crore. Pensions bring in another Rs 5 crore. In addition, what people in the private sector send home is anybody's guess.

Migration has been accentuated by two other reasons. One is the demonstration effect—youngsters look up to those who live outside and come home with money, dressed well: that they may be night watchmen living in congested city quarters does not matter. Growing education—the literacy rate in the eight districts is 40 per cent—has increased awareness of the outside world.

The flight of men has created an extraordinary—and contradictory—si-

In his youth, Trilok Singh and his family could live off the fields. But times have changed: his four sons and their families reside in the plains.

tuation. Labour rates have shot up and range from Rs 15 per day in some pockets to Rs 20 in other places for unskilled workers—and yet, there is often a shortage of workers in a region where unemployment is commonplace.

Retired Brigadier Parmanand laments that skilled workers—tanners, masons, blacksmiths, carpenters, among others—are impossible to find. He says that his son, a civil contractor, recently had to get masons from Bareilly, 250 km away, at the rate of Rs 55 per day, higher than in many cities.

THE truth is that manual labour has come to be looked down upon so that people are embarrassed to be seen at it even when the wages are good. Madhavanand, 36, sabhapati of Almora's village Gwalpajena, explains why: "Life here is hard. If a young educated man has to fight the soil, his heart is not in it. They want to make their future in the city: that they may end up washing dishes is irrelevant. At least the city gives them hope of great things they could do."

The real brunt of the hardship that the migration of men has brought, ironically, is borne by the women left behind. The few men left behind aren't really of much help, as they themselves admit without much shame. Their work normally ends after ploughing the fields.

For women it is a constant grind in a day that will begin at six in the morning and may well end at dusk. A woman of Kanduli describes her routine in October: she wakes up at six to attend to the cattle; comes home to cook food; from eight to two she helps her husband in the fields with the ploughing; from two to six she harvests the standing crop; then it is back home to cooking and minding the children. In fact, there is such an acute shortage of hands that in rare cases Garhwal even sees the extraordinary sight of a woman tilling the fields.

But there is little anger or frustration evident among women at the merciless toil they are subjected to—and the fact that their men folk don't help out as much as they could. Kheema Devi of village Maregaon talks without emotion about bringing up the children and managing the household while her husband Ganga Singh was away in the army for two decades. She says that she has to walk four to eight kilometres one way to get a back-breaking load of fuel wood but is surprised at the idea that her husband—now retired—could perhaps help with this heavy job. Similarly Kamla Devi, a young woman from Kanduli simply says: "All this has always been the woman's work. How can I ask my husband to do it?"

The reason for this apparently indifferent response can only be that, over the decades, women have simply become resigned to their lot. So much so that they no longer even question it.

Interestingly, the vacuum left in the work force has now led to another migration, that of Nepalese into Garhwal and Kumaon. They have traditionally always come after Diwali, but their numbers are rapidly increasing though there are no estimates. K.S. Dhariyal, additional district magistrate, Pauri Garhwal, confirms this trend. Indeed, across the region most of the labour seen working on roads is Nepalese. He says that in many government projects it is so hard to find Garhwalis willing to work that very often, it is the Nepalese who end up benefiting

"We put up notices in vilen that doesn't get a re-

also the increasing depen-

Madhavanand of Gwalpajena says: "Youngsters want to make their future in the city: that they may end up washing dishes is irrelevant."

MOST soldiers make it a point to keep in touch with the village: this helps them when y retire and return, often decades after y first left home. Soban Singh, who put 24 years in the army and lives in a age on the Nepal border, says he never lly forgot his roots because he came ularly to visit his wife and children o had stayed back.

But not everyone is so fortunate. hawan Singh, of village Dalwadi in amoli district, was out most of his life. not only fought in Africa in World War ut also joined Azad Hind Fauj and later the Uttar Pradesh police and the Central Reserve Police. Sitting at a tea shop he said that "the village has changed totally in the years that I was away".

An official describes the problem: "For years they have followed their officers' orders, led a regimented life. Now, suddenly, they have to issue orders themselves. They are too straight in their dealings for civilian life!"

According to Sanwal, who has had several postings in the hills, more than 80 per cent of the land holdings are of less than two hectares and the density of population per hectare of cultivable land is four times that in the plains. Worse, irrigation covers less than 10 per cent of farming land which itself is often none-too-productive.

It isn't as if funds haven't been forthcoming: in the Sixth Five Year Plan alone about Rs 1,000 crore were set aside for the hill districts. But the bureaucracy has tended to spend it on projects in comparatively developed areas as against places that really need it.

Admits an official in Nainital: "In inaccessible areas spending the budget actually becomes a headache because of the topography and transportation problems. So, to prevent funds from lapsing, the standard shortcut is to spend the money instead in an already developed area."

Besides, all projects haven't necessarily helped everyone. For instance, the region is peppered with drinking water projects that have turned into white elephants. Even roads haven't been an unqualified boon: they have brought goods from the plains and killed the market for local craftsmen.

In village Maregaon, near Pithoragarh, for instance, 35 Harijan families—mostly cobblers—have few buyers for their traditional leather shoes because rubber slippers have beaten them out of the market. Similarly, in Pauri Garhwal district's village Timli, tailor Saatan, a patient of asthma, lives in abject penury because mass produced readymade clothes from outside have taken away most of his traditional clientele.

At what point will this flight of men stop? There are no clear answers. The only thing that emerges clearly is that the model of planning adopted hasn't worked entirely. The state Government needs to reassess its strategy instead of thoughtlessly pumping funds into the hills in the name of development.

DOORDARSHAN

Too Much to Swallow

IT is the hour of the sundowner. The scene: a verandah. A woman and three men waiting. In walks a perky Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose—more stocky and jocular than the textbook Netaji. He announces the recognition of the Indian National Army (INA) by Japan, Italy and Germany, the handing over of the Andamans to the INA and the addition of Rs 20-crore to the Azad Hind Fauj Fund. Then Netaji calls out: "Abid bhai, drinks..."

The camera cuts to Colonel Dhillon picking up a glass of orange juice. An incredulous Netaji turns to him: "Santre ka..?" Dhillon replies: "Maine kasam khai hai ki jab tak Hindustan Azad nahi hoga, mein sharab nahin peeyoonga." (I have vowed not to drink until India attains independence.) Netaji pats him on the back: "Bravo." The camera focuses on the tray of long-stemmed glasses with red, orange and hazy yellow liquids. Netaji waves the waiter towards Captain Lakshmi Sehgal (etiquette oblige). She picks up a glass of the yellow stuff. So does Netaji.

THIS was just a flash: Netaji picking up a glass and sipping from it. But those 20 seconds in the abruptly terminated Raj Se Swaraj TV series—on the INA court trials—may have altered the course of Doordarshan's bumpy history. It certainly led to the baptism by fire of Ajit Panja, the new minister of state for information and broadcasting.

The minister—who is ironically from the land of Netaji, as is Director-General of Doordarshan Bhaskar Ghosh—had to tender an apology in Parliament. So contrite was Panja towards irate West Bengal politicians that not only was the series yanked off the air after the fourth episode, he also promised to remove for eternity all traces of the offending scene. A video tape showing Netaji with a glass could not now even be kept in the archives of Doordarshan's Mandi House.

The Doordarshan top brass has obviously been given draconian guidelines. Says Ghosh: "The utmost care will have to be taken in portraying any national public figure. The minister has said that the director-general shall personally satisfy himself that no distortion or disrespect creeps into the telecasting."

The hullabaloo was actually nothing but a storm in a glass of juice. Apple to be precise. It would all have been quite funny had the implications not been so sobering. Had the actors picked up glasses with tomato juice, had the series been in black and white, there would not have been this absurd reaction. It was the tricky colour yellow that did it.

But apples have led to many a fall; things were never the same for Adam after that bite. And things won't be the same for the makers of the series, noted theatre personality Amal Allana and her producer-husband Nissar Allana, who are reluctant to be drawn into the controversy. The fates of the fifth episode of the INA trials and the Bhagat Singh trial are now uncertain.

In the hysterical reactions following the telecast, there was the inevitable mixing of emotion with fact. Most of the vociferous MP's had not even seen the offending episode. Those 20 seconds had been retold with such imagination that many MP's believed that drunken scenes had followed, with Netaji putting his arm around Lakshmi Sehgal and leading her to the dance floor. Opposition to the series snowballed to the extent that some newspapers in Bengal demanded Ghose's resignation.

Interestingly, a Calcutta newspaper opinion poll showed that while 90 per cent of the respondents felt the episode should not have been telecast, only 8 per cent had actually seen it. Also, most felt that even if Netaji did drink, he should not have been shown as doing so.

So the real question is not whether Netaji drank or not. Doordarshan will now have to project not what is the truth but what is perceived as the truth. Although Prem Sehgal, one of the INA accused, writes: 'Netaji always joined in for toasts on official occasions,' the INA leader can never be shown drinking.

Bipin Chandra, historian at New Delhi's Jawaharlal Nehru University says that in all this controversy what Netaji stood for has been forgotten. "We know for certain that Motilal Nehru drank, but that did not mean he was any less a leader. No good historian would want to know whether a historical personage drank, ate beef, prayed or had women friends. To me Netaji's greatness lies in his patriotism and sacrifices."

Doordarshan, however, will now take a tiny U-turn: even the approved series will now be brought back and re-examined with nit-picking care. Inevitably, living personalities will be put in cold storage and any depiction of modern heroes like Jayprakash Narayan, Sardar Patel and Annadurai will have to be put through mental detectors of sorts.

Fuel line to the front line.

Mid-air refueling may be the most demanding mission a pilot—or a plane—can take on. When one plane has to refuel different types of aircraft at different speeds, the demands multiply.

Which may explain why there are so many C-130 Hercules tankers in service around the world.

The KC-130's four turboprops give it the power to carry a 56,000-pound fuel load on a typical mission, and all the speed it needs for in-flight jet refueling. At the same time, the proven handling characteristics of the Hercules aircraft make it steady and stable at the lower speeds and altitudes required in refueling helicopters.

There's very little downtime with a KC-130. When there are no refueling missions scheduled, it can convert to a freighter in hours, and airlift 40,000 pounds of cargo to the undeveloped air strips other planes can't get into or out of.

At least seven of the world's air forces are flying the C-130 Hercules tanker today, and more have included it in their planning. They've learned that it delivers a lot more than fuel. It delivers confidence.

CSIR

Testing Time

THE Council of Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR), is currently engaged in an exercise of introspection and self-appraisal. After 44 years of indifferent research and poor performance, the council and the Government have finally woken up to the need for a revamp. Departments and research monitoring cells are being reorganised, projects languishing are being revived and unviable ones are being discarded.

This welcome change would not have occurred had it not been for growing criticism of the council, the most vocal of critics being none other than Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. Addressing a conference of scientists, Rajiv held their poor showing responsible for the country's increasing dependence on foreign technology. "Our present day technology," Rajiv acidly remarked, "is totally based on imported know-how and we are not even making a good paper-clip."

The criticism is valid. The technologies developed by CSIR have failed to find favour in both the public and private sector. The Government's liberalised technology import policy has only made matters worse. The council released 58 processes to the industry in 1983; the number had shrunk to 40 by last year. The number of projects released for production by various laboratories in this period also decreased from 56 to 24. However, a senior CSIR scientist reasons: "Companies want quick results and so they import technology rather than wait for so long." Further, premia and royalties received by licensing of CSIR know-how have fallen from Rs 125.78 lakh in 1983-84 to Rs 62.11 lakh in 1984-85.

The poor standard of research can be further gauged from the fact that in 1983-84, 13 of CSIR's 39 laboratories did not develop even a single process worth filing for patent. The Industrial Toxicology Research Centre and the National Botanical Research Institute, both in Lucknow, have failed to file even a single process for patent since 1983, though their combined expenditures go beyond Rs 500 lakh a year. In 1983-84, 68 design patents were filed for acceptance by CSIR, 26 were accepted.

The number of unfinished projects meanwhile keeps increasing. While in 1983-84 there were 393 unfinished projects their number rose to 557 in 1984-85. New projects have suffered in the bargain. CSIR cut down the number of new projects from 155 to 112 in the same period.

Largely responsible for this is the failure of scientists to keep their deadlines. Even when they do manage to develop a technology, they fail to upgrade it to the factory stage, leaving it unviable and impractical. The standard excuse is the lack of resources.

CSIR lab; and (inset) Mitra

The CSIR, over the years, has become unwieldy, lacking an effective co-ordinating body to give it cohesion or direction.

The level of mediocrity can be seen in the relatively negligible number of national honours won by CSIR scientists. While half the recipients of the prestigious Shanti Swaroop Bhatnagar Awards for research in science way back in 1962 belonged to CSIR, there was only one CSIR recipient among the 10 awardees in 1982 and just one out of 11 in 1983.

Those who do want to do something find their creativity stifled as a result of delays in getting financial support, failure to import the necessary research equipment, misuse of CSIR's autonomy by some directors and stalling of projects. A scientist working on low temperature, multi-dimensional systems at the National Physical Laboratory (NPL), Delhi, laments: "We needed a helium container for our research, which had to be imported. But it took well over a year to get it. The firm to supply the equipment is chosen after a global tender—not on the basis of quality but because its rates are the lowest. Our resources are so limited that we have to make compromises."

In 1969 NPL scientists developed general purpose cathode ray tubes. But the project was shelved till recently, despite the fact that a hefty chunk of foreign exchange could have been saved if it had been allowed to go through.

No wonder then, that CSIR has failed to attract bright scientific brains. Says J. Sen, an electrical engineering graduate: "Nobody in our batch wanted to work with CSIR and preferred to go abroad because of the better research environment." Out of Sen's 40 batchmates, 25 have already gone abroad.

More than anything, it is the size of the organisation that defeats its purpose. In its futile attempt to encompass every ambit of science, the CSIR has kept expanding over the years until it has become mammoth and unwieldy, lacking an effective co-ordinating body to give it cohesion or direction. Its 39 laboratories staffed by 18,203 scientists and 5,942 administrative personnel, has an annual expenditure of about Rs 130 crore. Justifying this, CSIR Director-General A.P. Mitra argues: "The CSIR has given the country a wide scientific base from which to build on further." But a scientist of the council said: "the CSIR tried to achieve the impossible task of doing everything together with its limited resources and failed."

The Government has only now started taking steps to reorganise CSIR, beginning with the replacement of Dr Vardarajan by Mitra. A review committee to look into the working of CSIR has been set up under the chairmanship of A.Hussain. Ironically Mitra has been left out of the committee, giving him no chance to voice his opinion on the organisation which he ostensibly heads.

WHAT'S HAPPENING TO INDIA?
Punjab, Ethnic Conflict, Mrs. Gandhi's Death and the Test for Federalism
by ROBIN JEFFREY
Macmillan
Price Rs 110; Pages 213

WHAT is it about the Punjab problem that has made it the most persistent of India's political crises since independence? In Mizoram, after years of turmoil and insurgency, the rebels have finally surrendered their arms. And although a certain unquiet still hangs over Assam, the situation is no longer as explosive. But the Punjab problem continues to take its deadly toll. While political leaders struggle to stem the rising tide of violence, analysts search among the debris and bloodshed for reasons why.

There are no easy explanations but a relatively unanimous one is the theory that it was the inherent medievalism of the Sikh religion which suddenly surfaced and caused all the trouble. Even Rajiv Gandhi appears to subscribe to this view and has often remarked that modernisation is the real solution to India's communal problems. What is interesting about Robin Jeffrey's book is his theory that it was modernisation rather than medievalism which was responsible for the explosion in Punjab.

Jeffrey, who has held a research fellowship in Indian history and is senior lecturer in politics at La Trobe University, Melbourne, believes that narrow ethnic identities can often be heightened by improved communications. He argues that political factionalism and religious schisms that seemed to have awoken in everybody in 1984 had always existed in Punjab (as in the rest of India); the only difference was that they could be magnified thousandfold by the power of communications.

He points out that when Bhindranwale arrived on the scene, three out of five Punjabi men could read and over 95 per cent of the villages were linked by proper roads. And he made full use of this fact: all his speeches and interviews were taped and many were filmed; and the swords gave way to Sten guns.

Writes Jeffrey: "Punjab's factional struggles, time-honoured, long deadly, yet held in check by the narrow horizons of peasant life, were swept into an open sea of mass politics. The innovations accompanying the green revolution brought a keen sensitivity to outside economic forces. And with it, they brought increased travel to foreign places and regular mobility within Punjab. They brought buses, motorcycles and modern weapons. They brought schools and history books and newspapers and produced youths who had not just the ability, but the time to read them."

According to Jeffrey, what happened in Punjab is more than likely to happen in other Indian states that acquire similar standards of living and access to modern communications. The author, who skims through Sikh history, bringing in the rise of the Akalis and the creation of a separate Sikh identity, provides a valuable account of recent events in the chapter Explosion. Those who hold the Akalis, Bhindranwale and the Sikhs in general responsible for everything that has gone wrong in Punjab, may find Jeffrey's analysis slightly sympathetic to the Sikh view, but they would do well to read the book anyway; an important point he makes is that the right political decision at the right time could have prevented the explosion. He points out the error of allowing thousands of Sikhs to be humiliated by policemen in Haryana only because Mrs Gandhi felt the Asian Games were more important. He also blames her for not trying hard enough to solve the problem through talks.

Of the abortive talks in November 1982, he writes that electoral and international considerations influenced Mrs Gandhi's talks with the Akalis, and he also criticises her for turning every subordinate into a message boy. "Her attitude towards her negotiator, Swaran Singh, is revealing. He appears to have believed in early November that he had built a genuine agreement with the Akalis, but this was scuttled by the changes that appeared in the statement to Parliament. Journalists at the time wrote that Mrs Gandhi 'developed cold feet' and 'reduced Swaran Singh to a messenger'." Mrs Gandhi is also accused of having more 'sinister' designs in mind: the Hindu vote. Jeffrey says she calculated that regional, anti-Congress forces in states like Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka and Jammu & Kashmir could be made to look anti-national and that the "Congress(I) could portray itself as the protector of long-suffering Hindu India living on the Gangetic plain".

T.S. BEDI

Sikh militancy: amplified by mass communication

Jeffrey believes that if India is to survive as one country the answer is genuine federalism rather than centralisation of the Mrs Gandhi kind. Delhi will have to realise that 730 million people cannot be governed from the prime minister's house. In a postscript written in November 1985, the writer concludes optimistically that Rajiv Gandhi has shown himself to be different from his mother, and the evidence of this is the signing of the Punjab accord at a time when the Punjab problem should really have been more intractable than it ever was during Indira Gandhi's time.

VOCATIONAL STUDIES

A Dismal Failure

EXACTLY 20 years after the Kothari Commission on Education drew up the "blue-print" for vocational education in the country the only thing blue about it are the faces of educational planners who speak of its implementation in unprintable terms.

What is printable is shocking enough. The grandiose scheme, during this period, was supposed to lure one million, or 50 per cent of the students seeking admission to colleges, into job-oriented courses. Last year only 72,000 or 2.7 per cent of the total of two million high school students enrolled in job-oriented courses—a far cry from the ambitious target of 50 per cent. And while most of the students in these courses were learning, they were certainly not earning.

In most states hardly one out of four students who passed such courses got jobs. The rest remained either unemployed or went back to colleges thereby defeating the very purpose of vocational courses. In the Ministry of Human Resource Development, Professor Ashoka Chandra, technical educational adviser, admitted: "What we are running today is an apology for a vocational education programme."

The ministry has plenty to be sorry about. More than a decade ago, the Government had taken the decision to introduce vocational courses for students passing their secondary school examination (tenth standard). But till recently, only six states and three Union territories ran full-fledged courses and only now have the other states woken up. Currently, of the total of 14,000 high schools in the country, only 1,900 offer vocational courses with Tamil Nadu accounting for 1,000 or over half of these.

Even in states like Tamil Nadu that took it up in earnest there is hardly any uniformity with courses sprouting up haphazardly. At the National Council of Educational Research and Training (NCERT), Professor Arun K. Mishra, head of the department of vocationalisation, points out: "There is an alarming variation in the course design from state to state and often in the same state." And what is worse is that, with a few exceptions, most of the courses are not linked to job prospects in the state. Most schools running these courses suffer from a lack of trained teachers and facilities for practical training. Nor has vocational education been geared to cater to the unorganised sector which employs the largest work-force.

Ironically, Karnataka is regarded by planners as a "model state" for vocational education. But its example is hardly encouraging. Although it claims that it did a district-wise survey on employment potential, when it came to deciding which courses, experts allege that the Government ignored its results and went ahead with its own list. And while some courses like building construction technology, electrical repairs and banking proved popular, others like fisheries, crop management and laboratory technicians drew poor response.

And the Government did not modify its recruitment rules to help students. For instance, the Health Department till recently preferred to take in raw recruits as basic health workers and ran its own training programme ignoring students doing similar vocational courses in high schools. In fact the situation got so serious that students doing vocational courses in sericulture, recently formed an association to fight for employment reservations. Said the association's President Kunte Gowda: "It is ridiculous. People who don't know a silkworm from a paper worm are appointed demonstrators and operators in government silk farms. But vocational students who are thoroughly trained in silk farming are shown the gates."

Most of the states have similar experiences to narrate. In Tamil Nadu, which boasts of the largest number of vocational institutions in the country, the programme has met with "mixed success". Officials admit hardly 25 per cent of the students doing courses actually got jobs. And those who were unemployed found themselves stranded. Although they were technically eligible to get back into degree courses the subjects offered were different, making it difficult for them to cope. After the students protested the Government formed a high power committee that recommended "vertical mobility" into universities for those doing vocation courses. The result: 60 per cent of the students doing vocational courses now rejoin college thereby defeating the very purpose of the programme.

Maharashtra was wiser. It decided from the start that its vocational ses would not "lead students to a alley", as K.C. Gedam, the director of tional education, puts it. The courses so designed that any student doing could rejoin college easily. That t cutting down the vocational con- in such courses by half—from a al 60 per cent of the teaching time to 0 per cent. The state now admits that 2 per cent of the students doing tional education get jobs and the rest n college.

VEN students seeking self-employ- ment after vocational courses found the going difficult. In Karnataka culture students complained that ks were reluctant to hand them out s for silk farming. Syed Asadulla, cipal of a vocational college in akapura, said bitterly: "We just train n and leave them on the road. They e nowhere to go. The idea of voca- al education is fine. But it has appar- y failed in the field."

Probably one of the most important ons for vocational education's dismal ormance has been its lack of accep- ce among parents. Most parents are not convinced, and rightly so, that ational education would give their dren a bright future. In Bombay, her Deniz, director of the Agnel tech- al complex, which runs several voca- al courses, said: "Parents want their dren to be either doctors or engineers it's quite a job convincing them to put r children into vocation courses. Their tude has to change."

TV repair course: wasted effort

Adds V.C. Kulandaiswamy, vice-chancellor of Anna University: "The attitude is that if you don't get a job in the organised sector you are unemployed. We have to change that." He points out that it is really the unorganised sector that could provide employment for students enrolled in vocational education courses. While the total labour force is around 240 million in the country, the organised sector accounts for barely 20 million.

But probably the most serious problem has been the lack of effective management of these courses by the various state governments. The states have preferred to give more emphasis to Industrial Training Institutes (ITI), polytechnic courses and engineering colleges that in reality duplicate efforts towards vocational education. While graduates of the ITI's and polytechnic courses find immediate employment as apprentices in the industrial sector, no such preference is given to students enrolled in vocational courses. They don't even come under the purview of the Protective Apprentices Act.

In most states, the vocational education programme is run by the Directorate of School Education which hardly has any time to keep a strict vigil over the programme. Says Professor Mishra: "There is plenty of ad hocism in the management of these courses. There is no overall policy guideline and the states neither have a data base nor projections of the manpower needs. Consequently there is no correlation between demand and supply."

And the state Government has always been tight-fisted with its funds for vocational courses. Karnataka, for instance, spends only Rs 1.63 crore on vocational education as compared to its total expenditure of Rs 429 crore on education.

Despite these handicaps many courses have been successful. In Tamil Nadu, for instance, the nursing courses are extremely popular. At Madras Avvai Home, one of the earliest institutions to start such a course, honorary secretary Mandakini Krishnamurthy said: "What is encouraging is that almost all of our students have managed to find employment." Adds S.P.Vathsala, a former student now working in a hospital: "My vocational course was what laid the foundation for my career."

But these are just a few silver linings in the otherwise gloomy picture of vocational education in the country. The Union Government is now making a determined bid to brighten up matters. In its National Policy of Education released last May it set a modest and probably achievable target: vocational courses would now cover 10 per cent of the higher secondary students by 1990 and 25 per cent by 1995. In the next four years, the Ministry of Human Resource Development plans to pump in Rs 400 crore into vocational education that would help in setting up, on an average, 10 additional institutions in each district in the country.

The ministry also plans to set up a Joint Council for Vocational Education which would act as the apex body for policy planning and coordination of vocational education at the national level. In addition, government recruitment rules are to be modified to give weightage to vocational education students. As Anil Bordea, additional secretary, says: "We know why we failed earlier and it would be ridiculous to fail again."

Designer's Dream

THE Indira Gandhi National Centre for Arts, which was allotted 25 acres of prime land along the lush India Gate Lawns in Delhi last year, was plunged into controversy last fortnight over its International Architectural Design Competition for the centre. The ambitious competition, with big prize money, attracted architects from the world over. It received 926 applications, 620 from 36 overseas nations. Finally 194 submitted detailed designs for assessment. Following a meticulous screening process, five winners were announced by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi who, Oscar-ceremony-style, opened sealed envelopes containing the names of the winners.

The coveted first prize of Rs 10 lakhs went to Ralph Lerner, director of graduate studies at Princeton University, New Jersey, USA who will also be awarded the Rs 60 crore contract for the design and supervision of the centre. The second prize of Rs 5 lakh went to Gautam Bhatia of India (see box), and the third, of Rs 3 lakh, was shared equally between Francoise-Helene Jourda of Lyons, France, Alexandros Tombazis of Athens, and David Jeremy of London.

The fact that four of the five prize winners are foreigners invited the immediate wrath of their Indian counterparts. Fumed one: "We're not designing a skyscraper stretching into the clouds where the westerners would have an edge; we're designing a building depicting Indian culture." Most architects said in interviews that there was no need to spend precious foreign exchange when designs as good or even better could be procured in India. But Kapila Vatsyayan, secretary in the Department of Art and Culture, who is also the operational head at the centre, brushes off this criticism saying: "Take the logic one step further. They are trying to say that Indian architects should not take part in any international competition abroad."

The other points on which the competition is generating a lot of heat in the capital's advancing winter are:

► that the jury did not include some of the best Indian architects: Charles Correa who was initially involved in the project was inexplicably dropped;

► that the competition did not draw the better known names in Indian and international architecture;

► that the jury's decision was influenced greatly by the superior materials used in the display models of foreign entries;

► that the competition was restricted only to the affluent. Being a one-stage competition it involved an expenditure of a minimum of Rs 40,000 by each contestant to prepare models and design sheets according to the criteria laid down in the competition rule book (which itself was priced at an exorbitant Rs 500). If, as the jury report indicates, there were four clear stages of screening, it would have saved a lot of money if display models and expensive elaborate layouts were called for only at the later stages.

"The debate is too late, they should have spoken up when we announced the competition last year," says Vatsyayan. As regards dropping Charles Correa from the jury, the irrepressible Vatsyayan adds: "If I want to be a minister and I am not made one, it does not mean that I have been dropped." Correa, she asserted, was in the discussion group for the project, but when the prime minister selected the names for the jury, he picked Achyut Kanvinde and Balkrishna Doshi as the Indian architects.

Kapila Vatsyayan and Pupul Jayaka were the other Indian members bu Jayakar was later replaced by Habi Rehman, a reserve member. Those fron abroad included James Sterling from th United Kingdom, Fumihiko Maki fro Japan, and Olufemi Majekodunmi fro Nigeria, who was the nominee of th International Union of Architects.

On the national front, some of th better-known names who sent in entrie were Raj Rewal, who designed the Asia

GAUTAM Bhatia, incorrigibly irreverent at 34, is better known for his articles on architecture than for architecture itself. He tripped into architecture because he failed in medicine. "I keep blaming the buildings that housed the medical laboratories in the university (in Washington) for my failure in medicine," he says. "I used to keep staring at them all day." He completed his Masters in architecture from the University of Pennsylvania, but soon tired of what he calls "catalogue-shopping" architecture in the West. He came back to India to dabble in mud. As project architect for a rural mud housing scheme under the Naujhil Integrated Rural Development Programme in Mathura district, Bhatia has no major buil ing to his name so far and has had all th time for critiques on "Punjabi Gothi and "Bania Baroque" architecture.

mes Village in Delhi, Jeet Malhotra, o worked with Le Corbusier and is now f architect of the New Delhi Municipal poration, Sumit and Suchitra Ghosh o won the prestigious contract for the Bahadur Shastri National Academy of ministration recently, and Roopak N. thari of Kothari and Associates.

On the international scene, the en- nts included Henning Larsen from nmark, who won the Aga Khan award the secretariat building in Saudi Arabia, Frank Woods, partner in Chamberlin, Powell, Bon and Woods of the UK, who designed the Barbican complex in London, William Porter of the US, who is the head of the Joint Harvard-MIT programme for architectural studies, Minoru Takiyama from Japan, Sumet Jumsai from Thailand, and several well-known names from other countries like Sweden and Australia. Says Ranjit Sabikhi, professional adviser for the competition: "Even if some big names at home did not take part, we are thrilled with the response as a whole."

The basis on which Ralph Lerner's model was chosen is spelt out in detail in the jury report. According to them, what stood out in his design was his absorption of the vision that Edwin Lutyens had in mind when he designed New Delhi. In his dossier accompanying his model, Lerner says Lutyens' Delhi had "an unusual and somewhat paradoxical pairing" of a tradition of treating Delhi as an extensive garden with blocks treated as individual parterres and the tradition of monumentality and axiality presenting a clear hierarchical organisation of various buildings.

"The architectural point of departure for our project is the juncture of these two traditions," says Lerner. The model draws its styles from various forms of traditional and historical architecture in India, including those of the Mundeshwari Temple at Ramgarh, Brihadisvara Temple at Tanjore, Keshava Temple at Somnathpur, Lingaraja Temple at Bhubaneswar, and the Fatehpur Sikri, Mandu and Gopuram forms. "The architecture," he says, "reiterates the role of the centre whose purpose is to encompass all arts across boundaries of time, region and social grouping."

The centre will be divided into five major courts clearly demarcating the different activities for which the centre is being created. The Kala Nidhi would have a reference library with a national data bank and informatics system on art and culture, the Kala Kosha would have the infrastructure for research studies aimed at creating an encyclopaedia on the arts, the Kala Darshana would house the National Theatre and a number of venues for projecting visual arts, the Janapada Sampada would document and project folk and tribal arts, and the Sutradhara would be the administrative and policy-making wing of the centre.

Each of these, according to the Lerner model, would be ranged along the axis parallel to Rajpath and, though monumental in scale, will be scattered across the sprawling lawns.

Lerner will soon be awarded the contract for the architectural works at the centre, according to the competition rules which even specify that if for some reason the contract is not signed within a year of the announcement of the results, the first prize winner would be compensated with a sum equivalent to the value of the first prize.

But the question being raised today is whether Lerner or Bhatia, who have not really built any major buildings so far, would be able to carry out a project on this scale. Scuttling these doubts, Malay Chatterjee, associate professional adviser for the competition, points out that some of the best Indian architects began with competitions that they won in their mid20s. "That is what competitions are meant for," says Sabikhi. "To unearth unknown talent."

However, the competition rules provide an escape route if the going gets too hot: if the first prize winner is unable, for reasons of distance or inexperience, to satisfy the jury of his ability to carry out the work, the jury may require him to collaborate with another architect of their approval. And should the architect fail to abide by the provisions of the contract, the promoter reserves the right to engage the second prize winner in consultation with the jury.

jury appreciated his "original and rmal approach". In his presentation, tia invited the jury to imagine that path is a river and that the centre s the form of "a journey along the river" using symbols like the street, the ghats lining the riverfront that is Rajpath. His buildings are viewed as a kind of stage set awaiting a cultural scenario. His project merges partially sheltered indoor spaces with semi-outdoor areas which then flow into completely outdoor places with steps leading down to the "river-side". His project was rushed—he began only in August—and in his hurry his display model could only be in cardboard as against the fancy materials used by the others.

But it was his vivid imagination that cornered the prize. And today, this imagination is running wild thinking of what to do with his windfall prize money. No sound investments in architecture, he says emphatically. "Maybe I'll fund my way through another attempt at medicine, maybe I'll use it to fund my planned audio-visual spoof on Delhi, maybe I'll just rush down to the first Maruti showroom."

CABLE TELEVISION

The New Frontier

ATOP a multitude of high-rise buildings in Bombay, the clusters of TV antennae are no longer visible. In their place is a single master antenna, a sign of the spread of another kind of television: cable TV. With all the ritzy residential areas in south Bombay already wired up for cable TV, the craze is now spreading north and into the suburbs. In new buildings in the suburbs, builders have installed concealed cable TV networks with master antennae, sometimes linking up entire residential complexes with a single system. "This is a new trend," says builder, Vijay Raheja. "The cables are concealed, it looks better, and the flat buyers find it an attractive proposition." Moreover, in the unending quest for entertainment on TV, yet another technological marvel has emerged: the satellite dish antenna.

In the five years since cable TV—which is actually a misnomer for closed circuit television networks—first started, it has spread its tentacles to numerous buildings in exclusive residential areas of Bombay. For three to four hours in the evening, subscribers are provided with escapist entertainment, ranging from Hindi and Hollywood films, Pakistani TV serials, American and British sitcoms and soap operas. Pirated videos of Hindi films are shown surreptitiously, as being illegal they cannot be shown so freely, and these are the most popular.

Says Kamlesh Bhatia, who used to work for a cable TV company but now owns his own Trance Vision Company. "In the suburbs 50 per cent of the people cannot understand imported English-language programmes. In the absence of Hindi films, comedies are the most popular, followed by thrillers." Adds Omprakash Behl, former vice-president of the Colaba and Cuffe Parade Residents' Association: "Now that Hindi films have stopped at Cuffe Parade, people are grumbling about the other programmes on cable TV. Not everyone can understand Urdu in Pakistani TV serials and parents are worried about the sex and violence in English films. Some even wanted cable TV disconnected because of its effect on children."

But the thirst for entertainment continues and there's always a technological solution at hand. So now it's the satellite dish antenna, the webbed, saucer-shaped contraption seen so far only on Doordarshan Kendras, AIR stations and diplomatic and military installations. Companies in Delhi and Bombay have begun manufacturing the dish antenna for residential buildings, and among the two public sector concerns, ECIL and Keltron, who make this special antenna, the latter is selling it to the public. Says Siddharta Srivastava, whose Cable Video Corporation is one of the two big cable TV companies in Bombay: "I am concentrating on dish antennae now. The demand for these in India is outstripping supply ten to one."

Cartoon by AJIT NINAN

Srivastava is already exploiting the potential for dish antennae in remote parts of Gujarat. He has installed a dish antenna linked to a cable TV network in Pardi and in the Ambuja industrial township, and is working on another order from a second industrial township in the state. In Bombay, where the local Doordarshan telecast is dominated by Marathi and Gujarati programmes, the advantages of investing Rs 30,000 in a dish antenna are obvious: viewers can skip the Bombay Doordarshan telecast and tune in directly to the INSAT-1B satellite for Delhi Doordarshan.

But this holds out a special threat for Doordarshan. In 1990, the Eurosat Communications Satellite is to be launched by a West European consortium to beam down programmes to west Asian and African countries and viewers across western India will be able to receive Eurosat programmes with dish antennae. Japan plans to put up three Direct Broadcasting Satellites in 1991 beaming free English language software. This transmission will be aimed at India, and will be received clearly with a dish antenna. Already dish antennae can receive programmes from a Soviet satellite. There are also reports that the US armed forces programme showing X-rated films meant for the Diego Garcia naval base can be received by dish antennae in Kerala. So Doordarshan might find itself being wiped off the screens of many Indian idiot boxes.

Even though the Government undertaking Keltron, is selling dish antennae to the public, the Union Government cannot ban their use. "It can only levy a fee on the antennae. For instance, if you have a radio you can listen to the BBC and the Government cannot stop you from doing so," says lawyer Ashok Desai. Doordarshan could meet the challenge from cable TV companies in Bombay largely because of the regulation prohibiting private companies from laying cables on government land. As a result, cable TV networks have remained closed circuit TV networks, with their reach restricted to individual buildings or apartment blocks with common boundary walls. But at least two cable companies are planning to introduce a computerised video text service to business offices at Nariman Point, breaking up their operations into five clusters to avoid trespassing on public land.

Already, an American multinational bank has introduced a computerised financial information service to its clients, with the cables being provided by the Mahanagar Telephone Nigam. But the question—as was asked in Parliament —is: how does the Information and Broadcasting Ministry plan to meet the challenge from foreign satellite programmes?

SHYAM TEKWANI

◆ On his own, he couldn't even make it to Madras. But last fortnight, 12-year-old P. Radhakrishnan of Madurai not only talked his way to Madras, but all the way to the United States. And won the gift of the gab—a free trip to the US—in a 'Talk Your Way to America Contest' organised by Air-India in Tamil Nadu. The sprightly, eighth-grade lad chattered for 10 minutes without break on 'Travel is Education' and parried the interjections without batting an eyelid. It was his fluent English and ready repartee that impressed the judges. Asked what he'd do if he landed in New York and found his baggage missing, the brat replied: "Impossible! That can't happen on Air-India." Thus providing the bottom-line for their next ad.

Radhakrishnan: talk show

◆ Shefali Mehta, 11, and Arpita Sood, 10, are two pert little things who go to Delhi's Springdale School (grades six and five), are avid followers of Buniyaad and Enid Blyton, and talk nineteen to the dozen. Last fortnight, the two girls were singled out among the 4,500 students of their school to welcome Mikhail S. Gorbachev and Raisa Gorbacheva. "I'm learning Russian at school and my teachers said I'm bold and talkative; so they selected me," said Mehta, who earned notoriety at the age of six when she jumped on to the stage at a function to shake hands with then president N. Sanjeeva Reddy. Sood, however, knows no Russian. "But my teachers wanted someone pretty and full of life." So they went all dolled up in lehenga and chunni with Rajiv Gandhi—"who teased us all the way"—garlanded the Soviet leader and First Lady, were kissed by Gorbachev, left lipstick marks on the chubby Soviet cheek and were rewarded with a box of Russian chocolates. "But this wasn't my happiest day," Mehta said. "My happiest day will come when I am great and I am garlanded."

Sood: aquatic justice

◆ It was not one dance but many; not one dancer but four of them. Last fortnight in Secunderabad, North met South like never before when four greats of classical dance joined hands—and feet—and left a trail of Golden Steps in an unprecedented fusion of dance forms. There was Sanjukta Panigrahi of Odissi as Rukmini, Saswati Sen of Kathak as Satyabhama, Vani Hassan of Bharat Natyam as Krishna and Bala of Kuchipudi as Narada. The ballet, Krishnaparijatam, was set to Carnatic music and, while keeping each style distinct, achieved a rare synthesis of mudra and movement. The dancers and their gurus—Kelucharan Mahapatra, Birju Maharaj, Kalyanasundaram and Vempati Chinnasatyam—stayed together for a week to produce what the die-hards called a "khichdi" and what Panigrahi described as "rice, sambar, curries and rasam served on a plantain leaf".

◆ Who exactly is to blame for the Indian fiasco at the Seoul Asiad? The answer to that is yet to be found, but a pointer to it came last fortnight from Anita Sood, seven times national freestyle swimming champ who was rejected by the Indian selectors for the tenth Asiad. Reason: they wanted fresh talent. Well, last fortnight Sood made them hang their heads in shame when she left such seasoned swimmers as Pallavi Shetty of Maharashtra and Bula Chowdhary of West Bengal gasping for breath at the 42nd Senior National Aquatics Championships held in Ahmedabad. Sood surfaced with five gold medals to reassert her status as the top-notch freestyle woman swimmer of the country. Said the smiling mermaid after the show: "I only had a point to prove and I have proved it." Justice, they say, is sweet. But aquatic justice is sweeter still.
